REPORT.

THE SELECT COMMITTEE appointed to Inquire into the RECEIPT, ISSUE, and AUDIT of PUBLIC MONIES in the EXCHEQUER, the PAY OFFICE, and the AUDIT DEPARTMENT, and who were empowered to Report their Observations, together with the Minutes of Evidence taken before them:——HAVE considered the Matters to them referred, and have agreed to the following REPORT:—

YOUR COMMITTEE have proceeded in the inquiry confided to them, and have taken much Evidence; but adverting to the importance and extent of the subject, the incomplete state of the inquiry, and the advanced period of the Session, Your Committee consider that they will best discharge their duty by laying the Evidence before The House.

THE RIGHT HON. SIR F. T. BARING, BART., IN THE CHAIR.

The Right Honourable the Lord Monteagle of Brandon; Examined.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

26 May 1856.

1. Chairman.] WHAT Office do you hold?—I am Comptroller of the Exchequer.

2. When were you appointed to that office?—At the close of the year 1839.

3. Under what Bill were you appointed?—Under the Bill of 1834.

4. That Bill was the first Bill that created and regulated the office of Comptroller of the Exchequer, was not it?—That is the Bill which is at present the governing Bill; there were previous Acts which existed bearing upon the transactions of the Exchequer; there was also the general usage of the office, it being a common law office, and existing antecedent to any statutable regulations; but the Act of 1834 may be considered as the governing statute which now regulates the Exchequer.

5. The Act of 1834 got rid of the old Exchequer, and replaced it by the Comptroller of the Exchequer, and the regulations of that Act govern the practice of the Exchequer?—They are the regulations as prescribed by the statute, but the Committee in viewing the statute itself, will see that it continues the former usages, distinctly recognising them as such, and in describing the duties of the office which I have the honour of holding, it transfers to me the duties which theretofore had been performed by the Auditor of the Receipt and the Clerk of the Pells, which were the two officers in whom were vested specially the duty of control in the old Exchequer. Those duties are by the Act of 1834 continued and transferred to me. See § iv, by which "all the powers and authorities now vested in the Auditors of the Exchequer or Clerk of the Pells, either by law or usage, shall, from and after the commencement of this Act, be transferred to and vested in the said Comptroller, subject to the provisions of this Act, except only so far as any of such powers or authorities are or shall be by this Act controlled, diminished, or varied."

6. What are the functions and duties of the Comptroller-general under the Bill?—The main object of the Bill (founded as it was upon the Report of a Commission on the Exchequer of the year 1831, of which I believe the Chairman and other Members of this Committee were Members) seems to me to be the control over the issues and expenditure; above all over the latter, with a view to the enforcement of the responsibility of the Executive Government to Parliament in adhering strictly to the appropriation of public money voted for the purposes for which grants were made by Parliament. In answering the question put to me, I may state that the functions prescribed by the Act seem to me correctly set forth in the Report of the Commission on the Exchequer: "The Exchequer is the great conservator of the revenues of the nation. It does not exercise any authority over the administrative departments of receipt, nor over the departments of payment any further than to guard against the illegal application of any portion of the public income. The constitutional functions of its officers, who hold their situations for life, are to provide for the safe keeping and proper appropriation of the public money. For this purpose it is charged with the receipt of the revenues, which are vested in its name, and deposited in its care, until issued under the authority of Parliament for the service of the State, and it is armed with a power of denying its sanction to any demands upon it, from whatever Minister or department they may be made, unless those demands are found in accordance with the determinations of the Legislature. 'To examine in detail,' says Mr. Ellis, the clerk of the pells, 'the ancient authorities upon which the constitution of the Exchequer of Receipt and Issue in its regulations and practice rests, would answer no useful purpose. It is sufficient to observe that it is coeval with the Norman Conquest; that it has been from its earliest institution looked to as a check upon the Lord High Treasurer and a protection for the King, as well as for the subject, in the custody, payment and issue of the public money. The business of the Exchequer, in its simplest form, is the receipt of the public money, and the issue of the same under orders from the proper authority; the second branch, that of issue, further involves the most important duty of control, while both require in a matter of such national and historical importance, the duty of record.'" It was founded upon that Report that the Bill was introduced. The question referring to the mode in which the Bill carries out those functions I may allude to the §§ x, xi, xii, and xiii, as conclusive.

26 May 1856.

7. The question was what you considered were the duties of the Comptroller-general?—The main duties are those duties of control laid down in the recited sections; to prevent, under any possible circumstances, the diversion of monies from the uses to which they are appropriated by law.

8. The passage to which you have referred divides the duties into those of receipt and issue of the revenue?—Yes.

9. Confining yourself to the duties of the receipt of the revenue, will you have the goodness to state what revenues you receive at the Exchequer?—The duties of Customs, of Inland Revenue, which comprehend the branches of Excise, Stamps, and Taxes, and now the property tax in addition; the Post-office revenue;—the hereditary revenues, the land revenues, distinguishing the lesser branches;—the Queen's revenue under the first designation, and, further, a vast number of payments coming under the head of repayments of advances of imprest monies, and small payments of different descriptions which, under different authorities, are paid in, being, or including a variety of payments paid chiefly through the Paymaster-general.

10. The Customs and the revenue departments are paid not through the Paymaster-general, I believe, but direct?—They are paid direct. The great branches of revenue, as well as some other heads of revenue, are paid direct by their receivers-general.

11. Is the Woods and Forests paid direct, or how is it received?—The Department of Woods and Forests is now divided under two heads, the Office of Works and the Office of Woods and Forests. The mode of paying in, differs in those two departments. The Office of Woods pay in direct; the Office of Works pay through the Paymaster-general by an arrangement made of late years. When it was at first proposed to pay it direct through the Paymaster-general, looking, as Comptroller-general of the Exchequer, at many of the Acts, I considered that the money was directed to be paid by the Office of Works itself; I therefore refused to receive that money when tendered me by another hand. After some consideration and discussion (I think there was some correspondence with the Treasury (26, 29, 31 August 1853), which can be referred to), I acquiesced in the wishes of the Treasury to receive it through the Paymaster, provided he recorded upon the face of the instruments, that in making that payment, he acted as agent and on behalf of the Board of Works, giving, at the same time, evidence of this fact. I therefore continued my obedience to the obligations of the Act of Parliament, although the Paymaster became the person acting on the behalf of the Office of Works.

12. Will you have the goodness to state to the Committee how the payments are are made on the part of those Revenue Boards which pay direct into the Exchequer?—There has been a difference of practice within a short period upon this subject, and it may perhaps be useful, especially in reference to the Exchequer Act, to state what the previous mode of paying the revenue was, and what the present mode of paying it is, and to refer the Committee to the statutable authority, which justifies the alteration that has been made.

13. How was it paid in when the Bill of 1834 first came into operation?—When the Bill of 1834 came into operation a provision was made by law for the payment of the revenue; it prescribed that all money should be paid into the revenue through what was termed a specification paper. To make it clear, I will assume that we are dealing only with the Excise department; the Receiver-general of the Excise was required to bring to the Comptroller-general of the Exchequer a paper, called a specification paper, stating the amount which, on a given day, he was prepared or directed to pay; upon receiving that paper, and on the same day, for despatch was essential, the Comptroller-general signed that paper, authorising, by his signature, the receipt of that money by the Bank; so signed, the officer of the Excise took that paper back to the Bank, and the money was paid thereon; without the authority of the Exchequer it was not receivable; the Bank then signed a receipt at the bottom of the specification paper for the amount of the money so paid; this paper was executed in duplicate; one copy of it was sent back to the Comptroller-general, who thereby assured that the proper sum directed to be paid had been paid, that it had been carried to the account of the Exchequer, and that for it he held the Bank receipt, signed an acquittance to the party, which was handed over on the following day (a duplicate of it being kept), and this acquittance, which was in itself a full and entire discharge, charged the Comptroller-general with the amount thus received. I hold in my hand the form of the acquittance, which I produce, and which will show the Committee how the matter was worked; such was the former mode.

14. What is the present mode of receiving the money?—The present mode, so far as it relates to the receipt of the revenue, is a simplification of the former practice, diminishing trouble; I think not diminishing security, and altogether, so far as it relates to the great Revenue departments, it is a decided improvement. The specification paper is entirely dispensed with, and consequently the Receivers-general of the Excise, acting, I presume, under the orders of their Board, and in concert with the authorities of the Treasury, pay over to the Exchequer account a certain amount; the amount they are directed to pay; the Bank receives without any direct authority from the Exchequer. In the evening of that day, the Bank return to the Exchequer a certificate on account that they have received so much. There is no acquittance given thereon, such as existed under the former system, and in this respect I think the present system, though in other respects an improvement, is somewhat defective. There is no personal acquittance given by the Comptroller-general to the party who has made the payment, but in lieu of that, at the end of the month there is a general certificate furnished from the Exchequer to the Audit Office, informing the auditors of various sums which during the course of that month had been paid to the Exchequer account, and giving the auditors authority consequently to credit the accountants to that amount. The absence of the Exchequer acquittance to the accountant is more a matter for the consideration of the accountant himself than for the public; but I observe in one of the papers that are laid before Parliament, it is assumed that the object of that acquittance was to protect the public from giving a double credit for the same payment. I consider the object of the acquittance to have been clearly the satisfaction of the accountant, that on the very day, the moment that he paid over a given sum, such as 100,000*l.*, to the public, he should have in his pocket a full, entire, and sufficient discharge for the money that he had paid. It also raised the charge against the Comptroller-general under his own hand. I conceive such to have been the important objects, and I think that the Exchequer acquittance might be restored without any possible inconvenience, and with some advantage to the public, and a clear benefit to the accountant.

15. Since the year 1834, there has been a change as to the amount of the revenue paid into the Exchequer. At the present time the gross revenue is paid into the Exchequer, before 1834 only the net revenue was paid in. Has there been any change in practice in consequence, and will you state what the change has been?—I assume that the question refers, not to the Act of 1834, but to Mr. Gladstone's Act, passed in 1854, and which had in view the payment into the Exchequer of the gross revenue, providing for the payment of the public service by votes in Parliament and issues out of the Exchequer. That Act of Parliament will speak for itself if it is referred to. That Act, I presume, is founded upon the principle laid down in the Report of the Exchequer Commission of 1831, which states that all public monies should in the first instance be paid into the Exchequer, and that the gross receipts of public money, whether arising from taxes or any other source, should be placed without deduction in the custody of the Exchequer, and be accounted for to Parliament, whose authority should be necessary for the appropriation of the whole. That principle is acted upon to a certain extent in the Act to which I have referred, but it is not carried into full effect according to the terms of the Exchequer Commission Report; neither do I think that under any circumstances it would have been practicable to have carried it into effect in the manner originally recommended.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

16. At the present moment the mode of payment is the same, but a larger amount is paid in; is that so?—The present system is as follows: Applying my observations still to the Excise department, which will make it clearer, the same thing mutatis mutandis applying to other departments; the theory contained in that report would be that the whole Excise revenue should be paid in to the Comptroller-general's account, and that the whole of the expenses of the Excise should be paid out of the Comptroller-general's account after a Parliamentary vote, and under Royal and Treasury Warrants, and that so, the service was to be answered. Now that is not quite the case; I believe that the payments for the revenue charges continue to be made very much as they were before; and indeed at the time of the introduction of the Bill the Minister who was responsible for the introduction of that Bill did not hold out to Parliament any expectation that the whole gross revenue could be paid in to the Exchequer by the Receiver-general of the department. I can speak absolutely with respect to my own office, but as I am asked now a question which relates somewhat to the practice of other offices, I can only put it subject to the correction of those who know better. The Excise revenue is received by its own department; its payments for the expense of collection are paid, as they were before, out of the gross revenue as it is received; but under the new system a vote is taken for the expense of the collection, and therefore the payment out of the gross revenue is in the nature of an advance, and not, as before, of a final payment; when that payment has taken place, there is an issue made from the Exchequer to the Excise department, which is more an issue of account than an issue in reality. The Exchequer are called upon to place at the disposal of the Excise money nominally to pay their salaries; but those salaries have been already paid out of gross revenue, and the money so advanced one day for the supposed payment of the expenses of collection is brought back to the Exchequer in a day or two as revenue from that department, when it is in truth merely the return of what was issued 24 hours before. When I say "money advanced," it will be understood that this is done by transfer, and not by issues of cash. It would be absurd if there were remittances made from Aberdeen or Bristol or Liverpool to London, and then remittances made from London to Bristol or Liverpool or Aberdeen to pay the expenses. But I hold in my hand a document, for the accuracy of which I can vouch, showing the expenditure for the revenue departments, the amount of each vote, the date and amount of each issue from the Exchequer, and the dates of payment, or rather of repayment, of certain corresponding amounts into the Exchequer account under the same heads of revenue. Now I find, illustrating this statement by the case of the year to March 1855, the amount of vote for the Customs was 840,743*l.*; the issue from the Exchequer for December was 406,649*l.*; when so issued nominally for payment of the expense of collection, the sum was returned; the sum issued for the payment of salaries, &c. on December 4th, was returned as revenue on December 6th, two days after the issue. It is impossible that this issue could have been applied during this interval for the purpose of making the payments in question. Those payments had been previously made; the issue was to repay the department the amount which it had already paid out of gross revenue. For the coast guard, I perceive at the same time, an issue was made on the 4th of December of 214,000 l.; this was repaid on the 6th of December. It was physically impossible that the same issue could have been employed to have made those payments. In the Inland Revenue the first issue was made on November 23d for 313,390 l.; the repayment was on the 24th of November, the day following. The Post Office advance of the 11th March 1856 was repaid on the 12th, precisely and accurately the same sum.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

26 May 1856.

17. In these cases, whether the sum has been paid in advance or not, the gross sum appears in the Exchequer accounts?—The gross sum appears in the Exchequer accounts, and ultimately the process, though the complicated one, which I have described, comes very near the result of paying the whole amount into the Exchequer, and paying out by vote. The only difference is, that the advance is made out of the gross revenue to pay the expenses, and that advance is repaid by the sum voted, and subsequently repaid to the Exchequer; therefore, after the last operation, it settles the account, but with three operations in place of one.

18. And it brings the expenditure under the vote of Parliament?—That portion of the Parliamentary control considered to be the most important one, is answered, for no farthing ought to be payable for the expenses of collection of the revenue except that which has been so voted.

19. Payments are made into the Inland Revenue Office; before the money comes comes into the Exchequer, has the Exchequer any knowledge of what is the sum actually received by the department?—No, I have no official knowledge whatever of it; I only take cognizance of that which is paid into my account. It does not come under the 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 15, the Exchequer Act. If there is a statutable payment, or one by a Treasury regulation which ought to come in to me at a given time, and which does not come in, I have then the knowledge that something is withheld, and I can act upon that knowledge. But in respect to the payments out of gross revenue, I know nothing of them, so far as the Exchequer is concerned.

20. When we talk of payments to the Exchequer, of course no actual money is paid into the Exchequer, it always goes to the Exchequer account at the Bank?—I am very happy to be able to say that neither money goes in as money, nor is money paid out as money; the whole is done by account, by orders upon the Bank, for credits in England and transfers in Ireland made to department of payment; there is no such thing as the payment or receipt, or the issue of a single farthing in money from the Exchequer.

21. Returning to the former question, is there any check whatever at the Exchequer, or any knowledge of what payments may be made out of the gross revenue before the payments are made into the Exchequer?—None whatever.

22. Take the case of the purchase of an annuity out of the Excise revenue, was any sum issued from the Exchequer on that account?—No, for the best reason, that no money legally applicable to such use had come into the Exchequer; and if there had been a payment out of the Exchequer without there having been a previous payment made in, there would have been no possibility of making a balance; but it never was paid in, never was paid out, and therefore I knew nothing about it till I found it reported in the balance sheet laid before Parliament as an issue.

23. The Committee is speaking of the redemption of an hereditary pension, which appears in the account of the balances of the public money at the end of the year?—That transaction appears upon the face of an account, "No. 2, Balances of the Public Money;" it is what is called the balance sheet. This account commences with an account of the balances in the Exchequer on March 1855. It states the amount raised within the year, Funded Debt, Exchequer Bonds, Exchequer Bills, Exchequer Consolidated Fund Bills, making the sum of 49,000,000*l.* On the other side it gives an account of the issues, and it concludes with an Exchequer balance on March 1856 of 5,600,621 l. Now, amongst the issues appears 'Redemption of Hereditary Pensions, 213,000 l." When I read that account, I interpreted it to mean as it began with a balance in the Exchequer, and closed with a balance remaining in the Exchequer, that such issue must have been an issue which came out of the balance in the Exchequer. I had not recollected any such transaction, and I therefore inquired into the fact, and found that no such issue had taken place from the Exchequer; therefore this account is to be understood in the sense of not relating to the Exchequer. Of that payment I had no knowledge or cognisance whatever, until I saw it in that printed account.

24. Is there a power still existing with the Treasury to pay sums out of the gross revenue before the amount of the revenue is paid into the Exchequer?—That power still exists, though limited by the Act of 1854. If you mean by that how I should have acted upon a demand from the Treasury, or Royal order, or a Treasury warrant desiring me to make an issue to pay that 213,000 l., I should have declined making any such payment, not considering it to have come within the powers of the Exchequer Act.

25. If the Treasury or the Inland Revenue Department had made any payment whatever out of the gross revenue, deducting it from the gross revenue and paying in to make a surplus, would there have been any power in the Exchequer either of knowing that such a payment was made or of stopping such a payment?—None whatever; no Royal order could have been issued upon that subject; every Royal order rests upon a vote of Parliament, and there was no vote of Parliament to justify this payment.

26. That payment appears in this balance sheet not in a way in which you would think correct; but would it have come before Parliament in any shape till the publication of the finance accounts?—No, I do not know that it would, unless the fact had been made public and the account had been specifically moved for in Parliament, or the fact had been communicated by a declaration of the Minister; but when the question is put to me with regard to my not considering the account as correct, the Committee will allow me perhaps once for all to state, that when I say I object to any practice, and speak of inconveniences arising from it, I hope I may be understood as casting no kind of reflection of a personal nature upon any of the parties who may be engaged in those matters. When I say that a payment may be incorrect, I simply express an individual judgment; it is the opinion that I may entertain; but it means no reflection upon any of the parties concerned.

27. Sir H. Willoughby.] The receivers-general of the different departments, pay the public monies into the Bank of England?—Yes, as far as England is concerned. The mode of payment in Ireland differs somewhat, but only by the necessary variation in the analogy of the two countries; in essence it is the same.

28. Can you state whether any sums of money remain in the hands of those receivers-general, for any length of time, and for what length of time?—I speak now rather in reference to my older experience as connected with the Treasury and the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer. As Comptroller-general, I have already stated that I know nothing of these transactions, till the money comes to my own account. But my recollection (which will be corrected by members of the Committee present) is that the amount of money left in the hands of the receivers is regulated by the Treasury, and by Treasury orders given to the Revenue departments, and that those orders are so carried into effect, as to prevent the accumulation of an inconvenient balance lying idle in the hands of the receivers-general. All the changes of late years have tended to diminish such balances, and to bring up the payments to London with rapidity.

29. Do you know whether such balances, whatever they may be, are deposited in the Bank of England?—The receiver-general's balances in London, for the Excise revenue, are deposited in the Bank of England, and his payments to me as Comptroller-general are made by transfers from his own account as Receiver-general to my account as Comptroller-general, but the amount which is left in his hands is a matter for the Treasury to regulate, and is not brought within my cognizance by law.

30. Mr. Henley.] I think I understood you to say, that you knew nothing of the amount of revenue received by the various public departments, other than what was paid into your account at the Bank of England?—Nothing more than that; we are talking of the amount of Exchequer revenue. There are sums which may be paid over, of which I have cognizance, before they come to me; of course I may know some of the regulations under which they are paid, and the statutes under which they are payable. If they are not paid to me, but to others, they may be paid in at the time before I receive the revenue; I know by law what time they ought to be paid in, and therefore what time it may be presumed that they are paid in, but that is inference, not official knowledge.

31. Whether the gross revenue of the Customs received is 21,000,000 l., or 21,500,000 l., you know nothing; all that you know is whether 21,000,000 l., or 21,500,000 l. may have been paid into the Exchequer?—Precisely, such is the present law. I have only cognizance of that point upon which my duty attaches, and that applies by law to Exchequer payments only, over the issue of which I exercise control.

32. Mr. Williams.] Your Lordship has stated that it is not practicable to carry out the recommendation of the Commission of 1831, to pay the whole amount of the taxes into the Exchequer, and you illustrated that by stating that amounts were paid for salaries and various other objects in a country town, and that the amounts were paid out of the revenue received in that district and not remitted to the Treasury as money, but afterwards remitted in the shape of receipts and payments?—Not quite that. If the gross revenue were paid into the Bank of England, remittances would be required to the country, to pay the expenses where they had accrued.

33. You mentioned in one case a sum of 300,000 l. having been paid in that way without coming through the Exchequer; I presume that the revenue in such places is received in small amounts every day, more or less, as compared with such a sum as 300,000 l.; then must not a considerable sum remain in the hands of the collector of that district for a considerable time to meet such payments as those?—The case which the honourable Member has put, combines two parts of my evidence, which he will see ought to be distinguished. The payment of 300,000*l*., hypothetically supposed as made out of Excise revenue was assumed to be payable out of London revenue, out of the receiver-general's fund here. The difficulty could not arise with respect to a case which would be an impossibility, namely, that of paying out of local revenue so very large a sum as that stated. The observation which I took the liberty of making, was to show the difficulty, inconvenience, and expense which would arise out of remitting the whole of the revenue to London, and then remitting back from London to the outports the amount that might be required to satisfy the revenue charges in distant places. I was examined on this subject before the Committee upon Miscellaneous Services, which sat, I think, in the year 1848, and I gave very full evidence upon that subject, which was practically speaking repeated by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gladstone), in his speech upon the introduction of the Bill referred to, in which I understood him to state, that while he wished to approach as nearly as might be to the payment of the whole revenue into the Exchequer, he could not without great inconvenience remit the whole money to London, so as to make the transfer to the Exchequer when he was subject to the liabilities of paying it in the country. No doubt the honourable Member is quite right in saying, that for the purpose of making those local payments, there must be for a time somewhat larger balances kept in the hands of the local receivers. That is quite true, and the Government, I presume, and I have no doubt, balanced one inconvenience against the other inconvenience; and in reference to that consideration, I think the decision of the Government was right, and was strictly in accordance with the evidence which many years ago I had the honour of giving; in 1848. These payments, though voted, are paid locally by advances out of gross revenue. This practice continues.

34. Your Lordship is no doubt aware of the recommendation of the Commission of 1831, and there was, I think, in 1841 or 1842, another Commission appointed consisting of men of high practical knowledge of these matters, who reported on that particular point, and they stated most distinctly that they saw not the slightest difficulty, but, on the contrary, they considered that it was imperatively necessary to carry out a correct system of keeping the public accounts; that the whole of the money should be remitted to the Exchequer; and that the payment should be made in the country districts, precisely in the same manner as all mercantile transactions are carried on?—I am not familiar with the second Report to which reference is made.

35. It was with reference to the Ordnance Department more particularly, but they investigated the system generally. There was Mr. Harris and Mr. Anderson and Mr. Thomas, and one or two others upon that Committee, who are considered highly practical men?—It is far from me to undervalue the authority of the gentlemen whose names have just been given; but I still think, as I thought then, that Mr. Gladstone has made the nearest approach that he could make to the payment of the whole revenue into the Exchequer. At the same time I repeat now what I stated in the year 1848, that the object recommended in the Exchequer Report to be sought for is the payment in the whole, and paying out what is wanting by Parliamentary vote, so far as the same is practicable and consistent with the public interest. But I believe that the inconvenience to which I have alluded is such as to make it nearly impossible.

36. Sir J. Graham.] The words of the Report of the Commission of 1831, laying down the general principle, are these: "We think that no portion of the public treasure should be arrested, on any plea or pretence whatever, on its way to the Exchequer, and that no portion of it should be issued from the Exchequer without previous Parliamentary sanction." To that principle you give your adherence?—I adhere in the strongest way possible to the abstract principle. But in the same Report that the Right honourable Baronet holds in his hand, he will observe that that Commission, of which he was a member, considered that there must be exceptional cases, and held out those exceptional cases as matters that must be provided for.

37. Your Lordship was examined before the Committee upon Miscellaneous Estimates in 1848, and gave the detailed evidence to which you have alluded, with respect to the exceptional cases such as they presented themselves to your mind, and to those exceptions, and to that evidence you still adhere?—I still adhere to them; I may take the liberty of stating that when I first read that Report of 1831, I saw the difficulties of carrying into effect the full recommendation, and at a meeting of Lord Grey's Government with the Commissioners themselves who signed that Report; those difficuties were, at Lord Althorp's desire, explained by me to those Commissioners, and those Commissioners came without any doubt or hesitation to the opinion, that it was not expedient to carry into effect that recommendation in the Bill which was then about to be introduced; therefore, it was omitted in the Bill which the Right honourable Baronet himself introduced into Parliament. But to the opinions then stated by me, re-stated in 1848, and repeated now, I give my most entire unqualified assent, confirmed by experience, that revenue as far as possible should be paid in, and that the expenses of the revenue, as far as is possible, should, as far as susceptible of estimate, be all estimated for, and paid under the authority of Parliament; I also adhere to the exception to the rule, admitting, however, that such exception ought to be viewed with suspicion, and only to be applied when a case is distinctly made out to warrant its application.

38. In answer to Question 2574 before that Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates your Lordship gave this answer, with reference to adherence to the strict principle of all monies, without exception, being paid into the Exchequer: "It would be attended with very great inconvenience to individuals and to the public, and the loss of time in the remittance of the public money first to London and thence its remittance back to the outports for revenue payments would be very great." A document has been sent to all the Members of the Committee which is headed, "Papers relating to the Re-arrangement of the Services charged on the Gross Revenue Consolidated Fund and Annual Votes in Supply," and I find in that document, under the signature of Sir Charles Trevelyan and Mr. Anderson, on the 1st February 1853, this comment upon that answer of yours: "This question and the answer to it, supply the clue to those imaginary difficulties and inconveniences with which the question of the payment of the gross revenues of the State into the Exchequer is associated in the minds of those who have hitherto resisted the measure. Can they seriously imagine that the progress of improvement in the Government service has been so slow that the ordinary facilities and securities for the remittance of money, so familiar to the commercial community, are still unknown or unpractised in the revenue departments, or that the pecuniary intercourse between the different branches of the Government is still of that primitive kind that the gross revenues could not be paid into the Exchequer without sending up to London from all parts of the kingdom the gross sums collected, and transmitting back from the Exchequer to the country the sums required for the payment of the local charges of collection? It is needless to say that the supposition would be entirely erroneous; indeed the system which it would be necessary to adopt if the charges of management were provided for by annual votes of Parliament is already in operation in the revenue departments all over the kingdom for other voted services; thus they pay monthly allotments of pay to seamen's relatives, remittance of wages and prize-money, half-pay of army, navy, and ordnance officers, military and civil pensions, and allowances of all kinds, and various other services; these are all the subjects of annual estimates and votes, and they are paid in every part of the country by the local collectors of revenue out of their current receipts." Does that argument adduced by Sir Charles Trevelyan and Mr. Anderson in favour of strict adherence to the most rigid principle at all shake your opinion with respect to the exceptional cases?—With great deference to the Right honourable Baronet, I doubt whether it does affirm the principle as strongly as he imagines it to do; on the contrary, it justifies the payments out of current receipt or gross revenue; it affirms the principle of applying the system which now prevails, and which did prevail, and which I believe must still prevail; that principle affirms the payment out of the gross proceeds, and the repayment of the sum which has been so disbursed. That paper was written, as I believe (for it was new to me till within the last few days), before Mr. Gladstone's change of the law in 1854. Mr. Gladstone's change brought the act of collecting the revenue under the control of Parliament. Now I think that what is anticipated and recommended in his speech, is what is now practically done. That is, at Liverpool, for instance, the Excise revenue is employed for the payment of Excise salaries; a sum voted is subsequently issued, and the amount which at Liverpool has been paid for Excise salaries is issued from the Exchequer to the Excise, and the same sum as a third operation is repaid to the Exchequer as Excise revenue. It is not to be imagined from that, I presume, that Sir Charles Trevelyan and Mr. Anderson recommended that the money shall be paid to the Bank of England in London, and remittances shall be made to Liverpool to pay Excise salaries; they still assume that the Excise salaries are to be paid at Liverpool, but that the amount of those salaries should be repaid subsequently by the Exchequer to the Excise, and ultimately be again repaid by the Excise to the credit of the Comptroller-general. That recommendation was identical, as far as I can understand it, with the explanation of Mr. Gladstone, for he stated that the mode of payment would continue the same, although the principle of account would be different. I believe those were his words.

Exchequer

39. Whatever may be the purport of that comment, adverse to your view with respect to the remittance of the public money, first to London, and thence back to the outports for revenue payments, that the inconvenience would be very great, is your Lordship of opinion that the Act of 1854 passed subsequently to that minute drawn by Sir Charles Trevelyan and Mr. Anderson, does fulfil all that in your opinion can be safely done with respect to the remittance of the gross revenues, and does satisfy also in your opinion the comments of that memorandum?—I think the Act of Parliament does not quite adequately describe the practice, without taking the commentary of Mr. Gladstone in introducing it as an explanatory context, because the Act of Parliament itself does seem to me to make provision for the local payments, but it was expressly and repeatedly stated at the time, that the local payments would continue the same as they had been before. I think that a party reading that Act for the first time would imagine that it was intended to pay in and to issue out the whole to and from the Exchequer. Now what is done is this, out of gross revenue the salaries are paid. There is a vote taken for the payment of the salaries. When those salaries are so paid out of gross income there is an issue made by me to the amount of the salaries, and subsequently the issue so made to the department by the Comptroller-general is repaid to the Comptroller-general himself, and to the Consolidated Fund. It is a complicated system, but it carries into effect what Mr. Gladstone explained as his object, though it does not realise the system of some of the advocates for the change. The payments continue unaltered, but a Parliamentary control is given over the total expense, and the system of account is varied likewise.

40. The Committee are aware of your Lordship's view with respect to the exceptional cases and the necessity of meeting them, and the Act fulfils and satisfies your view in maintaining the exceptions; but does it appear to you also to fulfil and satisfy the desire expressed in the comment upon your evidence by Sir Charles Trevelyan and Mr. Anderson which I have just read to you?—If the opinion of those gentlemen meant that the former system should be adhered to in local payments out of gross revenue, and that a vote should be taken and the issues out of the vote should be returned again to the Exchequer, it fully satisfies that view to that extent; my view was that all that could be estimated for might be provided in supply, they assume that my view and their view did not correspond in this respect. I advocated, as they too advocate, Parliamentary control in matters susceptible of estimate. I deprecated that which I consider they deprecate, the possible remittance of money to all the outports to pay salaries, the revenue collected in those outports having been previously remitted to London; I do not think there is any difference in that respect, but I cannot consider the present system as realising what is termed the gross and net principle, which I still consider incapable of being realised.

41. With your Lordship's combined knowledge of the working of the Treasury, and subsequently of the Exchequer, are you of opinion that there has been done, with reference to payment in of revenue, all that can be safely done, due regard being had to the promptitude and efficiency of the public service?—No, I do not.

42. Wherein is the deficiency?—I do not think that the law can be in a right state, or that the practice under the law can be correct, if it admits of the payment of such a sum as 213,000 l. out of gross revenue, which is the sum stated to have been so disbursed after the passing of Mr. Gladstone's Act as compensation for the hereditary pensions; I do not think that would come under any exception or be justified on any principle; it is withdrawing from the vote of Parliament and from the cognisance of those who should be responsible for the legality of those payments a very large sum. Now if that is consistent with the present state of the law it is quite clear to me that the law is defective; there is no motive of convenience in it. There is no question here of remitting to Aberdeen or John o' Groat's House revenue for the purpose of paying people there. This is therefore a payment out of gross revenue which, if it is justifiable and warranted by Mr. Gladstone's Act, shows me that that Act is in its present form defective.

43. The Act to which you have just referred is an Act passed in August 1854, intituled, "An Act to alter the mode of providing for certain Expenses now charged upon certain branches of the Public Revenues and upon the Consolidated Fund"?—Yes, that is the Act to which I refer.

44. Having looked into the subject narrowly, do you think that the payment to which you have just referred, and which you think irregular, is consistent with the letter of the enactment of 1854, or is in violation of it?—That is a legal question, upon which I should hesitate in pronouncing an opinion; but I can only say that if that payment had been required to be made by me at the Exchequer, I should have felt that I could not legally have made it. Supposing the whole gross revenue paid in to the Exchequer without exception, carrying into full effect the theory of the advocates of the gross and net principle, if I had been asked at the Exchequer to issue this money, it is quite obvious that I could not legally have paid it. Whether it is lawful to pay it out of gross revenue as the law stands is a matter which does not relate to me as Comptroller-general, and I therefore hesitate in giving a legal opinion.

45. The Act of 1854 did not go the full length of the rigid principle, it provided for exceptional cases; according to your view, that Act being in principle correct, does it in your opinion provide as for an exceptional case for such payment as that to which reference has been made?—I do not think it does. But touching upon this subject, I must be allowed to say that there is a precedent in which a payment was made, in the year 1825, under similar circumstances; I mean the redemption of a pension payable to the first Lord Melbourne, father of the head of the Cabinet of 1835, which was dealt with in the same way as these pensions have been commuted in 1856. That, however, was before the establishment of the Exchequer Act, and it was also before the passing of the Act by Mr. Gladstone, to which reference has been made.

46. Two Acts of Parliament, with reference to the Exchequer, have passed subsequently to that transaction to which you have referred in 1825?—Yes.

47. And the legality or regularity of the transaction in question will turn upon the construction of those two Acts?—Certainly it may do so, though, as I have already stated, I must abstain from giving any legal opinion.

48. What is the construction which you put upon them?—I unhesitatingly put a construction upon my own Act, which regulates my own proceedings, and I state that I should not have felt warranted in directing such an issue. But with respect to the authority of the Treasury to make the payment, that is a point of law upon which I should feel it somewhat presumptuous in me, not a lawyer, to pass a clear judgment; but my own opinion is, that it was a mistake of practice, adopting one precedent, which I think a bad one, and not adverting to the precedents of an opposite kind, some of which were in my own time, whilst I was Secretary to the Treasury, under Earl Grey and Lord Spencer; some will be found subsequently, and some preceding my time, in which another and a better principle was adopted.

49. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Will you state what that principle was?—I will state my own case, which is the simplest one. In settling the Civil List of William the Fourth, with which I was to a considerable extent entrusted by the Cabinet, as the Right honourable Baronet opposite knows, under the direction of Lord Althorp, I found that there were several small pensions which were charged upon the old Civil List, and it was, I think, very wisely felt that it was expedient to buy up those small pensions. The Committee of 1831 made that recommendation, and the Committee recommended also that there should be an inquiry into the origin of those pensions and their legality before they were bought up, resolving that where the titles were established, it was desirable that they should be commuted and extinguished. The Committee upon the Civil List in 1831 report, that where a satisfactory title to these small payments is shown, "your Committee are of opinion, that the propriety of extinguishing these small claims by the payment of an adequate compensation, should be considered, with a view to the simplification of the public accounts, and to the relief of the several departments from the inconvenience, expense and delay incidental to" the payments of these small sums. Two pensions had been granted, granted, which are of historical interest; one was in perpetuity to the heirs of Colonel Fairfax, and the other to the heirs of Nicholas Yates; they were for services rendered to Charles the Second. Another Committee sat in the year following, and in reference to those pensions they state, "The House will recollect that the Committee of 1831 recommended the extinction of such of those small payments as could be commuted for a reasonable sum. Under this recommendation, the Treasury have laid before The House estimates for the extinction of the perpetual annuities paid to Fairfax and Yates, for which consequently no other provision will be required." The terms on which the commutation is proposed, will be found in the Miscellaneous Estimates. I laid an estimate on the table of The House, for the amount necessary for commuting those pensions, and on my motion as Secretary of the Treasury to Lord Grey the sum was voted; it is contained and provided for in the Appropriation Act of that year, 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 96, s. 19. The commutation was thus effected, but effected, as I have shown, with the cognisance and approval of Parliament. That is the first case; there are other cases of a more important kind. There are the cases of the former payments to the Duke of Grafton, 43 Geo. 3, c. 156. There are the payments for the prizage and butlerage of wines in Ireland to Lord Ormond, 46 Geo. 3, c. 94, and 50 Geo. 3, c. 105, and in England to other persons similarly interested; there are the payments for the extinction of the coal tax called the Richmond Shilling, under the authority of the 39 Geo. 3, c. 84, and 39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 43. In all those cases the commutations were made subject to Act of Parliament, and in no case except the case of 1825, do I observe that the course taken has been the same taken in the present instance.

50. Sir J. Graham.] Fixing your attention for the moment upon the most recent purchase since the passing of Mr. Gladstone's Act, if that Act permits such a purchase, is it your Lordship's opinion that the relaxation in favour of the exceptional cases has been too great, upon the principle of paying the gross revenue from the revenue branches into the Exchequer?—If that purchase out of gross revenue is warranted by the legal force of that Act, that Act is in my judgment defective, because not only was there my case in 1831, but there was a subsequent case, establishing the same principle, when Parliament was called upon to give powers to extinguish certain small charges upon the land revenue, and that was done by Act of Parliament giving the Treasury the power of extinguishing them; but giving that power, subject to a limitation that they were not to exceed 10 l. a year.

51. Your Lordship, although an advocate for the relaxation of the strict principle with respect to the payment of gross revenue into the Exchequer, would be of opinion that the relaxation has been carried too far, if under the Act of 1854 such a transaction is admissible?—Certainly; if it is legal under that Act, upon which I was asked to pronounce an opinion, but declined doing so; I stated, however, that it was warranted by the precedent of 1825, but how far it is warranted by the law as it stands, taking the subsequent enactments into account, I declined venturing upon a legal opinion.

52. Mr. Wilson.] You stated the Act which had in view the payment into the Exchequer of all monies; I suppose by that, the Committee are to understand by your subsequent explanation that there is no provision in the Act for all monies being paid into the Exchequer, but that it shall be a matter of account, so that the account shall show the gross receipts, and the full payments?—I take the Act with Mr. Gladstone's explanation, in which he said distinctly that the old system of payments shall be continued, but that the system of account shall be varied; this was as relating to the charge of collecting the revenue only.

53. Is there anything in the Act at all that infers that payments shall be made into the Exchequer?—The object of the Bill I understood to be to approach as nearly as you could to the payment in of the gross sum, and to the issue out of the sums required for the public service. That was the explanation, but it was stated by Mr. Gladstone not to amount to any obligation to pay in the whole gross sum, leading to the consequence of being compelled to remit money for the payment of the revenue charges.

54. Was not that rather the effect of the Bill than the provisions of the Bill?—I cannot separate it's effect from it's provisions.

55. Were not the provisions of the Bill explicitly for the purpose of taking off the gross revenue certain payments, and paying them by vote of Parliament, which before that period had been paid from the gross revenue?—No doubt it was to a very considerable extent; and there was no difference made by the Act or the Schedules in respect to the pensions under consideration, which were left still payable out of the gross revenue.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

26 May 1856.

56. Is not this a correct and proper description of the Act which you hold in your hand, that certain charges had been before that time payable from the gross revenue before it reached the Exchequer, and the object of that Act was that those charges should not in the future be paid from the gross revenue, and that certain charges upon the Consolidated Fund should be taken from the Consolidated Fund, and annually voted by Parliament?—No doubt that was the general object of the Act.

57. And indirectly by that means monies which had been paid for the expense of collection and other purposes prior to that Act, would become payable into the Exchequer?—Certain of these monies became payable into the Exchequer.

58. Those payments being transferred from the gross revenue to votes of Parliament, was not the indirect effect of that, that those monies became payable into the Exchequer?—Yes, provided the charges had been paid out of the votes.

59. And therefore, though there be no clause in that Act enacting that the gross revenue shall be paid into the Exchequer, the circumstance of removing those charges formerly paid from the gross revenue has indirectly that effect as far as the Act goes?—Yes, it has indirectly, circuitously, and in a complicated way.

60. Those payments which were legally payable from the gross revenue before that Act, and which were so to be transferred, were scheduled in the different schedules attached to the Act?—Yes.

61. And therefore all legal payments payable from the gross revenues prior to that Act of Parliament, and not scheduled in that Act, were exempted from its operation, and were, as in former times, payable from the gross revenues?—No doubt, but this was in abandonment of the strict net and gross principle; the payment of this pension is an example, having been paid out of the gross revenue before the passing of Mr. Gladstone's Act, Parliament not having transferred it by the Act either to the Consolidated Fund or to the Supply. This pension as an annual payment continued legally payable out of the gross revenue after Mr. Gladstone's Act, in the same way as it had been before. My evidence did not shake that principle in the slightest degree; it referred exclusively to the commutation of the pension for the sum of 213,000 l. without a Parliamentary authority.

62. The pension itself was by Act of Parliament chargeable upon a particular revenue; it was an hereditary pension, and assignable like a freehold property?—Yes, I believe so.

63. Can you quote any precedent whatever for the redemption of a pension which was chargeable upon a specific revenue under an Act of Parliament, of the like kind which was paid by a vote of Parliament, and not paid out of the revenue upon which the pension itself was chargeable?—I will refer to the cases, and mark how far they support the one view of the case or the other; I shall first consider the perpetual pensions on the land revenue in 1853, which were redeemed by Act of Parliament. There being certain pensions at that time chargeable upon the land revenue, by the 16 & 17 Vict., to facilitate the redemption of certain charges on the hereditary possessions and land revenues of the Crown, the Commissioners of Woods were authorised to purchase from any ecclesiastical person or body any perpetual pension charged on the land revenue not exceeding 10 l. per annum, provided that if the purchase-money exceeded 100 l., the previous authority of a Treasury warrant were first given; that sum, I presume, to be paid out of land revenue.

64. What Act is that?—The 16th & 17th of Victoria, chapter 56; a Parliamentary sanction was thus obtained with a restriction put upon the action of the Government, by restraining purchases to pensions not exceeding a given amount.

65. The restriction put upon the action of the department not exceeding a given amount; if it exceeds the amount they must have the sanction of the Treasury?—The Commissioners of Woods were authorised to purchase from any ecclesiastical person or body any perpetual pension charged on the land not exceeding 10 l.; but even in that case a Parliamentary authority was given, and a Treasury warrant required where the price exceeded 100 l.

66. Sir

66. Sir J. Graham.] That Act was passed the year before Mr. Gladstone's Act?—Yes. Then the purchase of the pensions of Fairfax and Yates was made out of vote of Parliament.

67. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Was that a Civil List pension?—It was originally a Royal pension, but charged on hereditary revenue.

68. There were no means of redeeming that pension without the authority of Parliament, were there?—The authority of Parliament might have been resorted to to charge it upon land revenue of the Crown, but it was redeemed out of a Parliamentary vote.

69. Without the authority of Parliament the Government could not have redeemed it?—I contend they ought not to have done so.

70. Not being charged upon any specific fund, but being a Civil List pension, it was not competent to the Government to redeem the pension without the specific authority of Parliament?—It was not an ordinary Civil List pension, payable out of the granted Civil List, though it was a Civil List pension, payable out of hereditary revenue. It was in perpetuity chargeable upon certain funds. Charles the Second, by letters patent, granted to Fairfax and his heirs an annuity of 100 l., and charged it upon the revenue of Customs at Hull; in the very loose practice of those days it was so charged; but, however, on the accession of James the Second, by letters of Privy Seal of 1686, Colonel Fairfax being then dead, it was discovered that though the term of grant was a perpetuity, yet being upon the Customs revenue, it only enured for his Majesty's life, a Privy Seal was issued reciting that as the Customs granted by Parliament for his late Majesty's life were not legally charged with the pension, it should be issued out of any money not appropriated by Parliament, that was out of the special revenue of the Crown. In the other case, James the Second, by letters patent, granted, I rather think in consideration of Yates's fidelity, the sum of 100 l. a year; that, unlike the former, appears rightfully charged; it was a perpetuity upon the possessions of the Crown; both of those consequently, if the principle of 1825 be correct, might have been made matters of charge upon the hereditary possessions of the Crown; but the course that Lord Grey's Government took was to prepare an estimate and to get the authority of Parliament for the redemption, even in a case where such commutation had been twice recommended by Select Committee, and the redemption took place by statute.

71. Mr. Wilson.] Therefore, in point of fact, they were redeemed from a fund different from that upon which they were chargeable?—Yes; but one out of which they could have been legally paid.

72. That is, being chargeable upon the land revenue of the Crown, Lord Grey's Government induced Parliament to pay them out of the public Exchequer?—Precisely so; because at that time the arrangements made with the Crown depended upon the principle of continuing on the Civil List nothing but what concerned the service of the Crown itself, the amount granted for the Civil List being proportionally reduced; consequently a provision was to be made aliunde for other charges, and for these pensions amongst them.

73. Then with regard to land charges or annuities chargeable upon land revenues, is it not the case that Parliament has no right to deal with the fee-simple of that property; does it not require an Act of Parliament to deal with the fee-simple of that property; and are not the public only in the capacity of life renters, having therefore no right to deal with the property itself, except by a distinct Act of Parliament, or the consent of the Crown?—One or the other. There are, however, provisions in the land revenue which permit sales, exchanges, and purchases out of a capital fund, without more specific Parliamentary authority. Then the next case to which I wish to call the attention of the Committee is the Act of the 43 of George the Third, giving to the Duke of Grafton a commutation upon the prizage and butlerage of wines. The Act of the 46th of George the Third was passed to confirm an agreement entered into with the Duke of Grafton under a former Act for the purchase of the rights in consideration of an annuity for 6,870 l., charged on the Consolidated Fund, the amount being calculated on the average of the net receipts for the 12 previous years. This annuity was payable to the Duke of Grafton and his heirs male, and there was a provision for the redemption of the whole annuity, or of one-third previously to that year at the desire of the Duke of Grafton. This provision was carried out as a redemption by the issue of 49,133 l. from the Exchequer, out of supplies, the purchase of one-third part the annuity; 86,435 l.

26 May 1856.

out of supplies in 1815 for the purchase of the remaining two-thirds of the annuity, all authorised and confirmed by Act of Parliament.

74. That annuity of the Duke of Grafton's was in point of fact a tax; he was in the receipt of a tax levied upon certain commodities to a certain extent?—Yes.

75. It was not charged upon any branch of the revenue going to any department, but it was the right to collect a charge himself independent of any branch of revenue upon those articles?—It was a grant payable to a subject in the shape of a tax payable by the subject. This was redeemed by the application of the Government to Parliament for an authority to carry that redemption into effect.

76. In the case of the annuity of the Duke of Grafton there was no fund out of which that pension could have been redeemed, out of which the capital value of the income could be paid, excepting by a vote of Parliament?—I do not know that it could have been done in any other way, except by statute. I do not know what the fund could have been, excepting, undoubtedly, that under the looser practice of earlier times there have been transactions out of gross revenue that, I think, might have warranted the application.

77. That income of the Duke of Grafton's was no part of any public monies otherwise collected on the part of the Crown?—No, it was a duty granted by the Crown, but a duty of the nature of a tax paid by the subject; the commutation of that was made by Parliamentary authority.

78. It was a right to tax?—It was a right to tax, or to receive the proceeds of a tax.

79. Chairman.] Upon what was the annuity charged when it became into an annuity?—I think it is all found in the recital of the 43 Geo. 3, c. 156, which Act authorised the Treasury to treat, but by section 4 no contract was valid without Parliamentary confirmation. This was given by the Act of 1806. The consideration paid was charged upon the Consolidated Fund, and issued out of the Consolidated Fund. This latter charge was redeemed in 1815.

80. Mr. Wilson.] It was the repeal of a small tax which was payable to an individual, and that individual was compensated by a sum of money paid out of the Consolidated Fund with the consent of Parliament?—Yes.

81. Sir H. Willoughby.] Was not the prizage and butlerage upon a part of the hereditary revenue of the Crown?—I believe it was: but that is a matter of of legal antiquarianism. I have no doubt, however, that those grants were grants of rights which previously belonged to the Crown. Then there is the case of Lord Ormond. He, in like manner, had his rights of prizage and butlerage of wines in Ireland. In 1806 the Act of the 46th of George the Third passed, enabling the Treasury to contract for the purchase, with the same proviso that the contract should not be binding until sanctioned by Parliament. Under the Act of the 50th of George the Third the contract was confirmed, and an issue of 216,000 l., Irish currency, was authorised to be paid out of the Consolidated Fund in Ireland.

82. Mr. Wilson.] That again is a similar case?—I do not believe it is distinguishable from the other. The case of the Richmond Shilling is another case; that was a duty of 1 s. 8 d. per chaldron granted on all coals exported from the River Tyne; it was granted by letters patent, dated in the year 1676, to the Duke of Richmond and his heirs. In 1799 the Act of the 39th of George the 3d authorised the Treasury to contract with the Duke of Richmond for the purchase of his rights, and to grant to him and his heirs out of the Consolidated Fund a compensation by way of annuity. Then the fourth section provides that the annuity so granted should be subject to redemption, upon such terms as should be agreed on by the Treasury and the Duke of Richmond. The 39th and 40th of George the 3d confirmed that contract and agreement subsequently made, and charged one annuity of 19,000 l. upon the Consolidated Fund from the 5th of July, with a similar power of redemption as in the case of the Duke of Grafton's annuity. One-third of this annuity appears to have been redeemed previously to 1805, another third by issue from the Exchequer of 146,000 l. out of supplies, and the remaining third by the issue of 200,000 l. out of the supplies of 1824. It should be observed that the duke's interest on coals was charged with the payment of an annuity of 5,000 l. to Sir Thomas Clarges, his heirs and assigns. Under the Act of the 39th of George the 3d the payment of that annuity was transferred, and was charged upon the Customs Department. I have not the particulars of the case of Lord Melbourne immediately at hand, but but I know that that case was founded upon the principle of purchasing up the annuity without any distinct Parliamentary authority.

83. With regard to the Duke of Richmond's pension, it was merely a charge which one subject had the right by Royal grant to make upon certain other subjects of the realm?—It was a tax upon coals out of the Tyne granted by the Crown, which, I believe, the Crown had a power to grant, otherwise I cannot assume that Parliament would have indemnified the grantee.

84. Therefore when Parliament interfered, it did so for the relief of one class, that is the coalowners in the Tyne, and compensated the person who was supposed to have a legal claim upon their commodities?—Perhaps I may state the case of Lord Melbourne, because it is of a different character. It is now before me. This is the case of 1826. There is no statement that I can find made to Parliament of that payment, except in the Finance Accounts. In that respect it differs from the present payment, in which the payment of the 213,000*l.* is laid unequivocally before Parliament in the balance sheet, although after the purchase; but I find that in the Finance Accounts of 1824, there is a statement in respect to the Excise revenue, out of which Lord Melbourne's payment was made, of 1,500 l. for pensions. I find that in the year 1827 Lord Melbourne's pension is reduced to the amount of the quarter due in April to 750 l., thereby showing that in the intermediate time that pension had been purchased or extinguished. It is subsequently stated in the Finance Accounts, "the purchase of an annuity of 1,500 l. per annum payable to the Right Honourable Lord Melbourne, 30,000 l." They had both been reported to Parliament, the one in the Finance Accounts in 1825, in the case of Lord Melbourne, and the other in the balance sheets, in the case of the Duke of Grafton and Mr. Eyre, in 1856.

85. I speak of Lord Melbourne's pension now only. There was no announcement to Parliament of the purchase of Lord Melbourne's pension, except the Finance Accounts for the year in which it was made?—None.

86. That is the only pension to which you have now adverted, which was chargeable upon any branch of the public revenue?—I am not quite prepared to say that.

87. Any one that you have alluded to?—I am not prepared to say as a matter of law what the prizage and butlerage of wines constitute.

88. You are not prepared to say that any of the pensions to which you have adverted, where Parliamentary action was taken before they were redeemed, were chargeable upon any of the great public branches of the revenue?—I am not able to answer that question.

89. Lord Melbourne's case is the first that you come to which clearly was charged upon one of the large branches of the public revenue?—Yes, it appears to have been chargeable upon the Excise; but whether it was chargeable upon the hereditary Excise, or upon the general fund of the Excise, I cannot say; it appears to be stated differently in the Treasury Minutes of 1825 and 1826; the first states the hereditary Excise, the second the Excise generally. The former description I should imagine to be correct.

90. At the period when it was redeemed there was no distinction, the Excise was consolidated into one general branch of the revenue?—Yes, but only during the life of the Sovereign; at the time of its being granted, I am clear that it must have been chargeable upon the hereditary Excise, because the same principle that was applied to the small pension which had been charged originally to Fairfax upon the customs of Hull, found to be illegal, and corrected by charging it upon the unappropriated monies, namely, the hereditary monies, would perhaps have suggested some similar change.

91. Then the next pension which you find purchased, of which any Parliamentary record now is given, consists of two pensions in the year 1853; are you aware of pensions having been redeemed in that year; Lord Cowper's was one?—There was a net pension in that case chargeable upon the Excise of 1,593*l.* 16*s.*, redeemed for 43,000*l.* In the Finance Accounts for the year to the 5th of January 1854, it appears amongst the payments out of the Excise revenue in its progress to the Exchequer, "purchase of Earl Cowper's pension, 43,000*l.*"

92. That was in 1853?—That was in 1853.

93. And that was paid out of the gross revenue the same as the pension of 1826 of Lord Melbourne, and the same as the pensions which we have been discussing, which have been recently redeemed?—So it appears from the documents which I have read.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

26 May 1856.

94. And that, like the others, was chargeable upon the Excise revenues?—Yes; there was a pension, this authorised by a Minute of the Treasury to be paid from the capital of the revenues, of 1,503*l.* net, payable out of land revenues to Lord Cowper, and charged on hereditary revenue of North and South Wales, authorised by Treasury Minute, 5th April 1853, to be redeemed out of the capital of land revenues. This did not appear on balance sheet or Finance Accounts; but I believe there is a Parliamentary authority for making purchases out of the capital account of land revenue.

95. There were two pensions redeemed in 1853 according to the Finance Accounts before Parliament; the one chargeable upon the Excise, the other upon the land revenue, and both were paid out of the land revenues before they reached the Exchequer?—One out of land, the other out of Excise revenue.

96. In the introduction of the Act of 1854, which had for its object the removal of certain charges then existing upon the gross revenue of the Consolidated Fund to annual votes of Parliament, the charges for the Schomberg pension and the Duke of Grafton's pension were not scheduled?—They were not, being thereby still left legally chargeable upon the gross revenue as annual charges.

97. You have adverted to the speech of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, and have partly construed the meaning of the Act by that speech; are you aware that the Chancellor of the Exchequer distinctly stated that he left those charges, and did not put them upon the schedule of that Act, because he had then opened a communication with those parties for the redemption of those charges, and therefore, as they were about already to be redeemed from the revenues, he did not think it necessary to make them part of that Act?—I remember a statement being made in respect to these pensions; but I do not recollect that such was the motive for not making them part of the Act. That might have been the case.

98. You do not remember that the Chancellor of the Exchequer distinctly stated that it was in view to purchase them, and that that was the reason why he did not put them upon the schedule?—He stated something on the subject, but I do not recollect distinctly what; but I am certain that they were left chargeable upon the gross revenue of the Excise as a legal annual charge not affected by the direct enactments of the Act of 1854. Therefore any argument which is derived from that circumstance to warrant their purchase out of gross revenue is a perfectly sound argument, so far as proving the legal title as an annual charge, but it proves no more.

99. Therefore it follows that whatever was legal with regard to the purchase of those pensions prior to 1854, remained equally legal with regard to the purchase of those pensions after 1854, nothing in that Act affecting the purchase of those pensions?—Nothing in that Act affected the purchase of the pensions further than the general intentions expressed by the Government of bringing all payments out of gross revenue more under the cognizance of Parliament in the shape of estimate and of vote than had been previously done.

100. Were not those questions distinctly limited by the schedules that were attached to that Bill?—The questions as to the power of paying were limited by the schedules of the Bill in so far as provisions for certain charges were made by supply; others were placed on the Consolidated Fund; and all that were not so provided for remained as they had been previously, that is to say, chargeable upon the gross revenue; such was the position of these two pensions. As annual charges, their title remained unchanged.

101. Therefore, no effect could be produced by that Act of 1854 upon any payment which was previously legal, excepting with regard to those schedules in the schedules of that Bill?—None in the direct provisions of the Act, according to my belief; if it were legal to pay them as annual pensions, irrespective of that Act, that Act did not make it illegal to do so, with or without Parliamentary authority.

102. You have been asked whether, if a payment of that kind could be made notwithstanding the Act of 1854, by the action of the Treasury alone, you should consider that that fact would prove that the Act is not sufficient for the objects for which it was intended?—That question was put, not with reference to the legal import of the Act, but as to the objects for which it was intended; in my judgment, the object for which it was intended was to bring everything under the cognizance of Parliament, except the exceptional cases that were referred referred to in the report of the original commission; this is not one of those exceptional cases.

103. Then no payment could possibly be made by the Treasury out of gross revenue now, unless it were a payment which is legally chargeable upon the revenue before that Act, and not included in the schedules of that Act, and the power of the Treasury with regard to any payments made out of gross revenue, must necessarily be limited by the charges legally made upon gross revenue prior to that Act, and not included in the schedules of that Bill?—Yes; it is clearly limited by that.

104. Therefore, no discretion lies with the Treasury to make any payment out of gross revenue, excepting those powers which it had prior to 1854, and in those cases which were not included in the schedule of that Act?—I consider that the Treasury are left with full power of making repayments and drawbacks, and allowances of that kind, because they were legally payable before, and are not included in the schedules of the Act as provided for on the Consolidated Fund or Supply.

105. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] The effect of the redemption has been to put an end to a payment out of gross revenue?—Yes, subject to the exceptions stated.

106. Mr. Wilson.] And to render it necessary for the amounts of those payments to go into the Exchequer?—Yes, so far as these pensions are concerned.

107. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Therefore this redemption was, in fact, a measure carrying into effect the policy of the Act; the policy of the Act being to extinguish annual payments out of gross revenue?—In that sense it was, but that does not touch the question of whether the interposition of Parliament was or was not necessary to justify the redemption by a gross payment out of revenue.

108. Mr. Wilson.] You have used the expression with regard to that payment of "illegal and incorrect," and in illustration of that you said that had you been required to make that payment out of the Exchequer you certainly would have refused to do so?—Yes, in reference to the construction of the Exchequer Act, and to my duties as Comptroller-general.

109. Is not the power of the Exchequer limited to payments which are made under a direct vote of Parliament, or charged by Act of Parliament upon the Consolidated Fund?—That was the precise meaning of my answer. All payments from the Exchequer require either a vote of Parliament and Ways and Means Act to supply the means of paying it, or an Act of Parliament charge on the Consolidated Fund, together with the ways and means for defraying it. A payment of this description could not have recited any Act of Parliament, for there was none; it could not have recited any charge upon the Consolidated Fund, for there was none; therefore the payment from the Exchequer would be absolutely illegal, and Royal Orders or Treasury Warrants on the subject would have been absolute nullities, if they had been issued.

110. Therefore, though it may be that payments from the Exchequer for a hundred purposes would be incorrect and illegal, it does not follow that the same payments are illegal if paid by the Treasury?—Certainly not; there is nothing truer; for example, no Exchequer authority is required to pay back drawbacks; that rests upon the authority of the Crown, carrying an Act of Parliament into effect.

111. With regard to the Act of 1854, are there not other charges which are still left chargeable upon the gross revenues, and which were not scheduled in that Act, such as the daily expenditure on the part of those departments?—There are some other charges upon those departments which were not touched by the Act, but I cannot designate them as daily expenditure.

112. Is there not a large amount of superannuation allowances?—Precisely so.

113. Do you see any reason why those superannuation allowances should not be voted by Parliament, the same as the superannuation allowances of all the other departments of the State, and that the monies now paid on their way to the Exchequer, or in account, should not be voted by Parliament, and the monies go into the Exchequer?—No earthly reason, where it can be shown that the superannuation allowances and retired allowances in question are on the same title and stand precisely on the same footing with the superannuation allowances which are now voted. It was not from any difference of opinion with respect to the obligation and duty of voting such superannuation allowances as I have described, that I should have suggested changes in the first Bill of 1854, but it was because there was no enumeration of those allowances, and consequently there might have been included under the one form charges of a totally different character. The amended Bill was brought in by the House of Commons, I presume, upon the recognition of that distinction, but the superannuation allowances, so far as they are similar to the other superannuation allowances, might be advantageously voted, and ought to be so, I think.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

114. Are you not aware that there was in the Bill, as it went from the House of Commons, in the Schedule, a provision that all the superannuations of those public departments should be voted and included in the current expenses of the departments, and that it was struck out in the House of Lords?—Yes, but there was a report of the House of Lords upon the subject, explaining the reason of the objection raised to that Bill. The Report is communicated to the Commons; there was such a provision in the original Bill. There were two Bills introduced; the first Bill introduced by the Government, placed these allowances upon the supply votes. The objection raised was, that there was no schedule of those allowances; I for one could not know what they were, and authentic statements were made showing that allowances were comprehended under that designation which were not all superannuation allowances held upon the same terms. There was one special case, which was a commutation for a surrender of a freehold office, as well as for service, and it was thought unwise to violate the principle of the Bill by providing in the same way for such a special grant, and for allowances of a totally different character. That led to the alteration of the Bill. It was lost on its return to the Commons. The Government introduced a second Bill, from which those were excluded, and that Bill passed into a law.

115. But the second Bill that was introduced was introduced as a matter of form, because the first Bill really could not be passed; the Bill was lost in the House of Lords by the alterations which were made, and it was necessary to introduce a second Bill in conformity with the alterations made in the House of Lords?—Yes; therefore I have given the reason of those alterations.

116. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Do you think it desirable that that distinction should be maintained, that the gross charges of collection and management of the revenue should be annually voted under the provision of the Act of 1854, but that the charge for superannuations and pensions of the departments of Customs, Inland Revenue, and Post Office should not be voted by Parliament?—So far from approving of the law as it now stands, I disapprove of it. All that was wished or required was to show that those superannuations were all of the same character as those which are now provided for upon supply. The Government Bill recognised the distinction, but it did not carry it into effect.

117. Mr. Wilson.] The words in the Schedule, as the Bill went from the House of Commons, stood thus, under the head of Customs, "Charges of collection and management of the revenue, superannuations, pensions, &c. Customs." The words, "Superannuations, pensions, &c.," were struck out in the House of Lords?—Precisely so.

118. Do not the superannuation allowances which are now voted by Parliament, contain, with regard to all other public departments, everything that is granted by way of annual compensation for loss of office, as well as the ordinary superannuations under the Superannuation Act?—They do; but they may not be all ejusdem generis with these allowances. There is the word "Pension" there, and it ends with the extraordinary words et cætera, which it is submitted are somewhat vague and uncertain. It occurred at once, that those very pensions that you are now dealing with, which are pensions permanently charged, and to be advantageously got rid of by a commutation for their value, and other charges of that description might be included; whereas if all that was intended was held under the Superannuation Act, I consider there would have been no objection to voting them in supply at all.

119. In that case would not it have been better if they had only struck out the word "Pensions," and left the word "Superannuations"?—That would have been equally fatal to the Bill. What was wished for was, a list or specification of these allowances on which Parliament was called legislate. The Act was framed in such utter ignorance of the application of all its own principles, that that it required to be modified in the House of Commons by a clause, purporting to save all life grants, though it failed to do so. The Masters in Chancery and judicial officers, the Master of the Rolls in Ireland, together with humbler persons, had been originally proposed to be provided for by votes in supply. It was to prevent the like error in respect to this vote that that vote for pensions and superannuations, &c. was suspended.

120. Was not that alteration made, contended for, and subsequently conceded in the Act, confined to the recognition of those pensions or compensations which had been granted by Act of Parliament?—The Honourable Member can refer to words of the Act himself; it was a saving of life rights to official salary; all grants for life in cases specified; it was a clause by which, if it had not been inserted, judicial officers would all have been made subject to votes in supply; but that clause was not in the Bill as introduced, and when introduced was most clumsily drawn.

121. That, however, had reference to the salaries of judicial officers, and not to the superannuation allowances?—There was a saving with respect to life interests, but neither clear nor comprehensive.

122. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] If the object had been to except hereditary pensions, such as the pension of the Duke of Grafton, and one or two other pensions, would it not have been easy to have put in a special provision to show that?—That amendment would have been equally fatal to the Bill as the amendment made. The amendment was accompanied by a report, which expressed in distinct terms that this objection was made solely from the want of information, none having been given to show what those pensions and superannuations included.

123. Mr. Wilson.] There was as much information given with regard to that particular item as any other item in the schedules, and more information might have been had if called for. There was no defect in the information with regard to that item that did not apply to all the others?—That information was asked for, and was not given.

124. We are agreed that there is no reason that the superannuations of the great revenue departments should form any exception to the other superannuation allowances of the other officers of State in being voted annually?—All superannuation allowances which are of the same character, and held by the same tenure of grant, ought to be voted in the same way; there can be no doubt about that.

125. When you speak of the same tenure, can you point out any distinction of tenure which applied to those superannuation allowances?—I know them not; I asked to see them, but was refused. Supposing a retired allowance granted for life, it would neither be just nor consistent with principle to take away from any man a life right which he then possessed, and convert it into a right determinable by a vote of Parliament.

126–131. Practically, all superannuation allowances are granted for life?—I cannot answer that question in relation to these superannuations and pensions, because that information was not communicated; it was asked for, and not communicated; but many grants of the nature of superannuations are during pleasure only. I am aware others are held on special condition.

132. Mr. Williams.] I understood your Lordship to state, that all the pensions that were redeemed previously to that of Lord Melbourne were redeemed under the authority of Acts of Parliament?—With the exception of some other cases to which I alluded.

133. Though the redemption money was paid out of the public revenue?—It was.

134. Mr. Henley.] I think you stated, with regard to the present law (without saying anything as to the regularity or irregularity of the right of buying up pensions to the amount of 213,000 l.), that you do not consider a state of things that will permit that to be done without the cognisance of the Exchequer to be satisfactory?—I think it is far from satisfactory. I think that the purchase and extinction of such allowances, of a permanent kind, and charged on revenue, is most desirable for the public service, but I think that Parliament has a right to be informed of the transaction, and of the terms under which it is carried into effect, so as to lend a sanction to the matter before it is finally completed.

135. Does your Lordship draw any material distinction between the issue of so large a sum as 200,000 l. from any branch of the gross revenue, because and on account of some pension that may have been charged upon it; is there any material distinction between that and any other sum that may have been arbitrarily ordered, under an order of the Treasury, to be deducted from that amount of revenue?—I think the principle would be the same; but I distinguish clearly between the payment of a legal annual charge and the commutation of that charge for a large sum without the knowledge and authority of Parliament; there is a distinction arising not only out of the magnitude of the sum, but out of the nature of the transaction. Parliament is jealous, and ought in all cases to be jealous, and whilst there may not be the slightest cause of jealousy in the payments of thousands in drawbacks and repayments or allowances, which depend on the application of a definite law, there may be suspicion, merited or unmerited, with respect to a transaction with a private individual who is reimbursed for an annuity which he possesses by a large payment out of the public purse.

136. That principle of drawbacks and allowances is sanctioned by Act of Parliament, and therefore it is only a question of principle?—It is merely the application of a law; the principle is established.

137. In the cases which you have stated before the Committee, you have enumerated the case of one pension of 1,500 l. a year being redeemed for the sum of 30,000 l., and another pension of the same amount being redeemed for the sum of 43,000 l. That great difference of price would be a reason why Parliament should, at that time, have had cognisance and have given their sanction to the terms of the redemption?—In all cases. Those are illustrations of a principle which, I think, proves itself undeniably upon abstract reasoning, that, assuming a perfect right of redemption on the part of the Executive Government, as the terms of that redemption are matters in which the public itself, represented by Parliament, has a direct interest, as a matter of prudence and constitutional principle, the opinion of Parliament ought to be taken upon such a matter before the engagement is concluded. After the engagement is concluded it may be too late.

138. And therefore, without giving any opinion as to the regularity or irregularity of such a transaction as that which has been alluded to, or whether it was justified by precedent or not, you think that means ought to be taken to stop such a course of action in future?—Looking to the future I have no hesitation in expressing that opinion.

139. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] How many hereditary pensions remain charged upon the gross revenue at present?—I am not aware; I cannot state off hand whether those last purchases extinguished the whole, but whether they are or are not extinguished the principle seems to me alike. The question put to me by the right honourable gentleman was a question of principle, and wherever that principle applies I think such engagements ought to come under the cognisance of Parliament.

140. Mr. Henley.] Whether it is for the redemption of a pension, or any other purpose, you would not think it right that the Treasury should have the power to order sums of money to be paid from the revenues of the Crown without the sanction of Parliament?—I think not in any cases like the present. It was on that principle, even in relation to so small a sum as the 100 l. pensions, which I could have extinguished, if I had pleased, by a payment out of Civil Contingencies, without any Parliamentary notice beyond the appearance of it in the account for Civil Contingencies, I felt it right to lay an estimate on the Table of the House stating the terms, stating the agreement, and taking a vote for the money, and this even where I already had the recommendation of two Select Committees.

141. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Nobody disputes the principle that the Treasury has no power to make payments out of gross revenue without special authority or special reason. The question is, whether it was a sufficient ground, and also a sufficient precedent for the redemption of this hereditary pension out of the gross revenue; and there is a further question, whether it is desirable with regard to any hereditary pension which may remain that the matter should be laid before Parliament previously to a redemption. Your opinion is that the latter course ought to be adopted?—That is my opinion; and I have already stated that I consider there is a justification, so far as precedent can justify, for what has been done; I have also stated that I believed the object of the purchase was a most useful one, namely, the extinction of those charges. But I think that the question which has been put to me is a higher one, and a more constitutional one, whether assuming the right so to act, it is not expedient that that right should be solely exercised with the cognisance and approval of the House of Commons.

142. Mr. Wilson.] With regard to the two pensions which have been the subject of discussion, they have been redeemed in the present year, and the only distinction between them and the pension of 1826 and the pension of 1853, is that the Treasury, instead of keeping the matter entirely from the cognisance of Parliament till the annual finance accounts have been published, and in no other form, have taken the earliest opportunity in the present instance of presenting them in the balance-sheet?—That is the only distinction that I see, but yet I should be far indeed from stating that the financial practices of 1825, and the precedents at that time, were to form a guide for us, when in many instances they are only useful as examples to deter with respect to the proceedings of the present day. In the year 1826, as the right honourable Baronet opposite, who framed the Admiralty Estimates of 1831, well knows, the payments out of gross revenue, for instance, paying between 700,000*l.* and 800,000 l. for the building of the Post-office in London, and entering into a contract at Liverpool for the Liverpool Buildings, without the knowledge of Parliament, out of gross revenue, were ordinary transactions in those days, being to my judgment departures from principle as well as serious violation of the Appropriation Act.

143. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Were not those considered part of the ordinary expense of the collection of the revenue?—They might, perhaps, be so considered; but they were condemned by Parliament, when the matter was brought before them. In the case of the Liverpool Buildings, a contract was made to spend 175,000*l.* out of gross revenue. The Secretary of the Treasury of Lord Grey's Government laid an estimate before Parliament, and took a vote, before he would carry that contract into effect.

144. Though it might be a matter of prudence to lay the estimate before Parliament, was not the expense of a Custom-house a perfectly legal charge for the collection of the revenue?—I do not think it is a constitutional principle, that a very large sum of that description should be paid out of gross revenue without first obtaining the approval of the House of Commons.

145. Does the magnitude of the sum affect the principle; was not it at that time a recognised constitutional principle, that all the charges for the collection of the revenue, including the charges of buildings, such as post-offices or barracks for coast-guard, were considered a legal charge for the collection of the revenue, and therefore paid on the authority of the Treasury out of gross revenue?—If you ask me my own construction of what is right and wrong, I should say everything that was essential for the collection of the revenue might be made a matter of charge upon that revenue in those days; but if you are about to spend 700,000*l.* or 800,000*l.* upon building a Post-office in St. Martin's-le-Grand, it is clear that you are doing something beyond what is actually necessary for the collection of the revenue, and for that expenditure you ought to have a Parliamentary authority; and that was admitted in the year 1831.

146. Sir J. Graham.] Without pressing you to give an opinion upon the law, is the inclination of your judgment that the Act of 1854, which passed after the commutation of the pension in 1853, and before the last commutation, makes any difference in the transaction?—I think that the main principle laid down in that Act was to defray out of the gross expenses those things only which could not with convenience be paid in any other way; that everything that it was not requisite, that was not a matter of indisputable public convenience to pay out of gross revenue, should have been paid by a Parliamentary Vote. Such is the principle of that Act; there is a reserve upon that principle, I think, mainly resting on the explanations of its framer; these I consider to be in the sense of the reserves of the recommendations of the Committee of 1831.

147. Both purchases, the one in 1853, and the latter one, in your opinion, whether legal or not, are inexpedient with reference to the Parliamentary control?—Highly inexpedient.

148. Chairman.] Am I not right in saying that, previously to the Act of 1854, the House of Commons twice passed a resolution that the gross revenue should be paid into the Exchequer?—Such a resolution was passed on two occasion, even though it was met to a certain extent with a qualified opposition from the Government admitting the principle as an abstract proposition.

149. In the case of those two resolutions, though of course having no effect upon the law, does not it to a certain extent alter the constitutional view of the practice?

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

26 May 1856.

practice?—So far as the strong expression of the opinion of the then House of Commons is concerned, it did; but I think the admissions in the debate in reference to this Bill of 1854 itself, all went the full length that I have stated, that nothing should be left chargeable upon the gross revenue, except those things which without inconvenience must be otherwise paid.

150. You have alluded to the practice previously to 1825; is not it consistent with your knowledge at the Treasury, that from 1830 downwards, as long as you were connected with the department, and from your knowledge since, that it has been the habit of the Treasury to submit to Parliament a great many of those charges which would previously have been paid out of the gross revenue?—From the period of my first connexion with the Treasury in the Government of Lord Grey up to the present time, I may say that I think it has been the desire of every one; I know that it was the earnest desire, and acted upon uniformly by the Governments with which I was connected, to include in the estimate everything that was susceptible of estimate, to bring under the vote of Parliament everything that was not of a nature to take it out of that category, and that I believe has been persevered in by every Government that I have since seen in office.

151. You have been questioned as to the strictly legal view of this payment, and you have mentioned that previously to 1830 there was a large sum of money paid for the building of the Post-office. Now, strictly and legally, is there anything in Mr. Gladstone's Bill that prevents the Treasury, if they so please, paying that sum of money now out of the gross revenue?—There is only one clause in the Bill, which, when coupled with the Votes of Parliament under the subsequent enactment, would prohibit the Government from paying anything which was connected with the collection of the revenue, because that is provided for by vote; I do not think it would be legal upon the part of the Government to pay anything for the collection of the revenue other than what is now provided for by vote. They should not assume that a building of the cost of 700,000 l. was for the collection of the revenue; I believe it would be very preposterous to imagine that.

152. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] The phrase is "collection and management"?—Yes; but I say still, unless you can assume, of which every gentleman around the table is a judge, that you could justisfy an expenditure of 700,000 l. for building an architectural Post-office under the term of "collection and management," it would not be right to incur such an expense without a Parliamentary vote.

153. Sir H. Willoughby.] Does not such a case show the necessity of some positive enactment against any such possibility?—I really think that the possibility is so remote as to amount almost to an impossibility; I can scarcely assume it: if there is any doubt on the subject, it ought to be guarded against, but I do not think that the case could occur.

154. Mr. Hankey.] I think you said that the Exchequer have not any control over the payments made by any Government department for its own expenditure, which expenditure, however, was sanctioned by a vote of Parliament; I think you said that it being deducted by a local department, you have no cognisance of that amount which is deducted for salaries, or for local expenses?—I have no cognisance whatever of what is so deducted and paid out of gross revenues. My duties are fixed by statute, and apply only to funds in my own hands.

155. Though that payment is a direct payment which is ordered by a vote of the House of Commons for salaries, it has been voted by estimate?—It has been voted by estimate; but then the honourable Member will see that I have cognisance of the amount of that vote, and I can see that the issues made by the Exchequer do not exceed that vote, but inasmuch as the payments may be made out of gross revenue antecedent, that expenditure does not come before me at all; I know the amount of the vote, but nothing more.

156. You do not know how much is expended in that vote, when it is deducted previously to its being paid into the Bank on the Exchequer account?—Not in the least.

157. How do you consider that consistent with the statement that you have made that the office of Comptroller is to prevent, under any possible circumstances, a misappropriation of money voted by Parliament?—Because all monies monies voted by Parliament, come under my jurisdiction, and I can see that the amount of the issues made on account of those votes, are not exceeded, but anything which is paid out of gross revenue, does not come under my notice, because it is not one of the votes of Parliament, by which my conduct is to be regulated; it is done by the Government authority, not by mine.

158. That is the usual course, that is not only at present, but always has been the usual course adopted?—Yes, it was the usual course with respect to the collection of the revenue; Parliament had nothing to say to it. By Mr. Gladstone's Act, Parliament has a full knowledge of the maximum amount that it may cost, and any saving made upon that vote, is carried back to the public credit, and made ways and means for the following year.

159. As far as your office is concerned, you have no possible control to prevent the misappropriation of that money, which has been so voted by Parliament?—None, with respect to payment antecedent to the issue; I have no knowledge or cognizance of it.

160. Sir J. Graham.] If the Government had not thought fit to put into the account of the balance, the sum of 213,000 l., paid for the purchase of this annuity, what would have been the first occasion, when a knowledge of that transaction would have been open to Parliament?—It could only have arisen by a transaction of that kind having transpired, and a motion being made upon the subject. There was no official manner in which it could have come to the knowledge of Parliament unless specially moved for.

161. Must it not have appeared in the Finance Accounts?—Yes, it would have appeared in that class in the column of payments out of the gross revenue no doubt; but those are the payments of the year antecedent, which are given to you after the transaction has already taken place.

162. At what interval of time would that entry in the finance accounts, have presented itself to the notice of Parliament?—In the olden time, before the late changes, the finance accounts were made up to January, although the financial year was continued till April. By so doing, there was undoubtedly a discrepancy between the finance accounts and the estimates of the year. The arrangements have now been changed, and the finance accounts are made up to April, the result of which is, that though you have got rid of the discrepancy between the accounts, you encounter another inconvenience, as the finance accounts are now made at a period when they can be of little or no use to Parliament. At the present time, I believe the finance accounts are not yet presented, and you have the finance business of the year nearly completed. I think that a more unfortunate change than the postponement of the finance accounts to a late time could hardly have occurred, with respect to the check and control of the House of Commons.

163. The finance accounts for 1855-6 are not yet presented?—No; whereas under the former system, you would have those accounts imperfect by referring only to the year of January, but perfect by giving you a guide with respect to the financial business which you have now lost.

164. The transaction in question will appear in the finance accounts of 1855-6?—Yes.

165. According to past experience, when will that account be presented?—That is impossible for me to say.

166. Will it be available, in all probability, during this Session?—I find that the finance accounts of the last year, made up as they are to March under the new system, were only presented to the House of Commons on the 6th of July 1855. Now under the old system you would have had the accounts to January made up and presented during the Committee of Supply.

167. The account of last year ending April 1855 was not presented till July?—Till the first week in July.

168. The transaction in question will appear in the accounts of 1855-6, which will not be presented till the middle of July?—I presume so.

169. Unless the Government had thought fit to present this item in the account of balances, which is not compulsory upon them by law, Parliament would not have been cognisant of this transaction till towards the end of the present Session?—I do not see how it could have been cognizant of it, unless by an accidental motion or upon the statement of a particular Members but allow me again to call to your notice the postponement of your public accounts, and to point out the great expediency of reconsidering the time to which the finance accounts are made up.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

170. Mr. Wilson.] According to the old practice the finance accounts were made up from January to January, and therefore the finance accounts which you had presented about this time in the ordinary practice would have applied to the 5th of January of the present year?—Yes, but they would not have been presented before this time; it would have been long since, by the time that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was making his budget, and they would give a knowledge of the past expenditure, which is indispensable to those who wish to discuss the finances of the country; this is now lost by the postponement of the finance accounts from January to April.

171. Whereas, according to the old practice, the finance accounts presented in the present year would have been made up until the 5th of January; and as the transactions to which we have been adverting, namely, the commutation of those pensions, took place in the month of March of the present year, they would not have been included in the finance accounts until after the 5th of January of next year?—Assuming the fact of the date to be what the honourable Member has stated, the result would have been what has been stated.

172. Those transactions appeared in the quarter's accounts at the close of the year, and the quarter ending the 30th of March of the present year?—In the balance sheet.

173. For the year and quarter ending the 30th of March?—Yes.

174. And therefore the transaction occurred during that quarter?—Yes.

175. Supposing that the finance accounts were now made up to the 5th of January as formerly, that transaction would not have appeared in the finance accounts till the next year, and would not have been before Parliament till about Easter in 1857?—It would have been before Parliament in the balance sheet moved for in the same manner as it is now; therefore as far as that is concerned, it would be the same, but it would not have been included in the finance accounts till a later period than it now is.

176. As far as the finance accounts are concerned, had they been made up in the old way, this transaction could not have been known to Parliament till about Easter 1857?—That is the fact so far as the finance accounts are concerned.

177. If I say on the part of the Treasury, that the finance accounts of the present year, that is the year ending the 30th of March, are now in the printer's hands, and will be in the hands of honourable Members in a few days; is there not a great advantage, seing that only six weeks will be wasted in bringing down the transactions of the Government to the latest possible period, and especially in making the financial year correspond with the year of the votes?—There is some advantage in making the financial year and the financial accounts correspond, but that is an advantage quite as nothing in comparison with laying before Parliament the full account of what is contained in the financial accounts at such a period as to make it available for Parliamentary discussion. The finance accounts being presented in the month of July are, comparatively speaking, worthless. The financial business is at that time generally over.

178. If presented in the month of May, that objection is of course comparatively less?—Yes; to the extent of the time.

179. As far as this particular transaction is concerned, Parliament will have had through the finance accounts an intimation of it very nearly a year earlier than it would have had by the finance accounts under the old system made up to the 5th of January?—Yes.

180. You said just now that this transaction would have appeared in the balance sheet of the year, as it has now done; is it not the case that such transactions had never before the transactions of 1826 and 1853 appeared in any balance sheet at all?—I have not been able to consider them with a view to that, but as they appear in the balance sheet of 31 March, so it might have continued to appear; though as given in that balance sheet, it only led Parliament astray, for unquestionably reading that balance sheet the impression is, that the pension was purchased by an issue made; an issue made pre-supposes a payment out of which the issue is made. In this case there was neither a payment in, nor an issue out; it was paid out of gross produce.

181. The Committee are not to understand that the return to which you refer refer is an Exchequer return; it is an Exchequer account?—Reading the account as a communication to Parliament, beginning with the balance in the Exchequer, then stating the various transactions, and ending with the existing balance in the Exchequer, it is unquestionable that that being put under the head of issue, any person reading it would imagine it was an issue out of the Exchequer.

182. Sir J. Graham.] Though for the purpose of Parliamentary information, you think that this issue is rightly made known, yet for the strict purpose of account, you think that it is improperly placed where it is?—I think it is placed unintelligibly; it is placed in a manner which I think must have led a great number of persons astray.

183. Mr. Wilson.] There is the annual payment of some account of 4,000 l. and some odd hundred pounds at the Bank of England for the management of the loan last year; was that an issue from the Exchequer?—No; it was a legal deduction authorised by statute.

184. Sir J. Graham.] Though it may be desirable to show these transactions, yet you would say that in this account they are not in the right place and form?—I think that this ought to have been put with some explanation, to mark that it was not an issue out of the Exchequer, nor as having formed any part of the balance in the Exchequer.

185. It never came into the Exchequer?—It never came into the Exchequer.

186. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Does that balance-sheet purport to be an Exchequer account?—It is an account of the balances of the public money remaining in the Exchequer on the 31st of March 1855 upon the amount of money raised by additions to the Funded or Unfunded Debt. The total amount of advances and repayments on account of local work, with the balances in the Exchequer, on the 31st day of March 1856. As a principle of logic as well as an explanation to Parliament and to the world of that transaction, I think there is no one taking up that account that would not be led astray by it.

187. Mr. Williams.] Is it your Lordship's opinion that a Treasury Minute is a sufficient authority for the application of this 213,000*l.* of public money for the redemption of those pensions, and that it should not be requisite to go to Parliament?—That raises the whole question upon which I have hitherto been examined. Whether it is legal or not I have declined giving an opinion; with respect to the prudence of the act, I have expressed an opinion that it is not the right way of doing it.

188. Mr. Henley.] That account does not represent the state of the case?—I have no doubt that it represents the true state of the case as to certain facts it contains. For instance, this sum has been paid undoubtedly, but not out of the Exchequer; it is not an issue in the terms in which a common observer, or probably many of the honourable gentlemen now around this table, whose pursuits have led them to consider the value of Parliamentary words, would have understood, except as expressing that it was an issue out of the Exchequer.

189. The balances must have been made up in some other way, assuming they are correct?—Yes.

190. Mr. Bowyer.] I infer that at present there is nothing to prevent the payments out of the gross revenue from exceeding the votes of the House of Commons?—I have no check at the Exchequer, because Parliament has only given me a check upon Exchequer payments; these are not Exchequer payments, but the Committee would be in error if they supposed that the constitution and the administrative functions of this country, do not provide some check against any illegal issue of other kinds; for instance, there is the ordinary control of the Treasury over the revenue.

191. I mean as to the amount. The House of Commons votes a certain sum for the collection of the revenue. What is there to prevent that amount being exceeded by the payments out of the gross revenue?—The reason appears to me to be this. The payments out of gross revenue, are not now as they formerly were, final and conclusive. They have the cheque in the first instance of the vote of Parliament; they are made out of gross revenue, it is true, without my knowing anything about it; but they are subject to be repaid by the circuitous fashion which I have already described to the Committee out of a vote of Parliament, therefore the vote of Parliament cannot be exceeded; there is that security. I presume the audit affords some additional security likewise.

26 May 1856.

192. At that time, when the operation reaches the Exchequer, the money is gone?—It is already advanced.

193. Then if the money so advanced exceeds the vote of the House of Commons, you cannot get it back?—That would be for the Treasury and the Revenue departments to deal with.

194. Then there is no check?—I presume that there is some activity in the Treasury to see that such an occurrence does not take place, but there is a check that did not previously exist, by reason of Mr. Gladstone's change, because there is a limitation after all that will be practically applied by a vote of Parliament.

195. Is it a sufficient check; if that sum of money paid out of the gross revenue exceeds the vote, it would make no doubt an irregularity in the accounts of the Exchequer when the accounts were completed, but still the money would be gone?—There is no check at the Exchequer upon anything that does not come into the Exchequer.

196. Mr. Wilson.] There is the same check with regard to the repayment of those monies that there is with regard to the payment of the whole revenue?—Yes.

197. And if payments were made beyond that, the receivers would be liable to account with their securities for the payment of the money that had been received; it would be a deficiency in the payments into the Exchequer of the receipts which they had received on account of the department?—They would have to account for everything that they paid out, and they cannot pay without authority; they cannot pay at Liverpool without authority proceeding from London, and the Commissioners in London are acting under the immediate control of the Treasury; therefore, unless the Treasury were to abandon its duty by directing or authorising payments at Liverpool above the amount that was sanctioned by the estimate, unquestionably there would be a default somewhere; and for that, I think, the Treasury, in that case, would be responsible, and the department would be responsible if they had no Treasury authority.

198. Chairman.] But if, with the sanction of the Customs, their officers advance in excess of the vote, Parliament would be perfectly unaware of that fact?—I do not see how it would come to the knowledge of Parliament; but I presume that no payment would be made by the officers except from authority that was, practically speaking, known to the Treasury, and communicated to the Treasury, based upon their warrants.

199. Sir J. Graham.] It resolves itself at last into unlimited confidence in the Treasury?—As far as that goes, I have told the Committee that the Exchequer furnishes no distinct check so long as these payments are made out of gross revenue. If the principle of gross and net were capable of being realised, if I had to issue the exact amount of money out of the Parliamentary vote to be applied in a particular place, or generally to the Customs for purposes authorised, you would then have a check; but the power of issuing out of gross revenue at the outports may unquestionably lead to an excess of issue which the Exchequer cannot check, and then the Parliamentary vote might be in a state of deficiency, and there would be an undue payment.

200. And Parliament need not be cognisant of that fact?—They would still see upon the Finance Accounts the payments out of gross revenue; that might lead them to it; you have the costs of collection given in the Finance Accounts.

201. And that cognisance would only arise when the Finance Accounts were presented?—Yes.

202. Mr. Wilson.] Suppose the revenue department were to pay more than they were authorised to pay by Parliament, and without the authority of the Treasury, would there not be a deficiency in their receipts and in their payments into the Exchequer, for which they must account?—Yes, but of that deficiency the Comptroller-general knows nothing upon earth; he knows nothing of the amount which must be paid in to him; he only takes that which, under the Treasury authority, is directed to be paid. Such is the law.

203. It is not contended that the Exchequer Act throws upon the Comptroller of the Exchequer any responsibility with regard to the collection of the revenue, but only to receive such payments as come from the collectors of revenue, and to be responsible for that?—Clearly; you have brought it under the responsibility of the issues; now if an issue took place to pay the expenses of the revenue, and there was no power of extending beyond that issue, there you would have the responsibility of the Exchequer introduced as a check; but inasmuch inasmuch as those payments take place necessarily, I believe, out of gross revenue before the money reaches the Exchequer, there is no check whatever interposed to such payments made in anticipation of the Exchequer credit.

204. Suppose that every shilling of the revenue were paid into the Exchequer absolutely now, and suppose that every farthing of the expense of collection under the Vote of Parliament were made a direct issue out of the Exchequer, and suppose in that case the cost of collection was larger than the amount voted by Parliament, and the revenue departments used part of the gross revenue for the payment of that cost of collection, would the Comptroller of the Exchequer have any check whatever over that payment?—No, but there would be a wrong done; there would be a misdemeanor, for which the parties would deserve indictment, and the Government, if it sanctioned such a proceeding, would deserve impeachment.

205. Would it not be precisely the same if that mal-administration of receipts of Customs took place at the present moment, as it would be under the circumstances to which I have adverted?—The hypothetical case put is a supposed misfeasance on the part of the Government. As long as the payment is out of gross revenue, undoubtedly such a misfeasance might occur; I am sure that it never will occur. I do not anticipate that it will, but I am asked upon hypothetical cases. On the contrary, I may be allowed to say that I believe, under the new system of vote, a Parliamentary vote for the collection of the revenue not only has never been exceeded, but the expense of collecting the revenue has been more economical than the vote, and the balance between the one and the other has been paid back to the public credit.

206. Mr. Cardwell.] The assurance that the Treasury will spend only what they are authorised by Parliament to expend, is just as good as the assurance that they will pay into the Exchequer all the money that they receive?—Precisely.

207. Mr. Bowyer.] The constitutional function of the Exchequer is to be a check upon the Treasury; in the case of payments out of gross revenue, that constitutional check does not exist?—The constitutional check is to be responsible for monies paid into the Exchequer; that constitutional check was created, does exist, and, as far as I can do it, it is rigidly enforced; but with respect to payments out of gross revenue, there is no such check at all, the law not applying to that case.

208. Would not the check be more complete if the Exchequer had some notice of the amount of the gross receipts?—I think if you call upon the Exchequer to discharge functions that do not belong to it they will be very ill performed; the function of the Exchequer is your function; I am a public servant, responsible to the House of Commons, and I am responsible for the money that is placed to my credit to see that it is issued according to the Act, and for purposes only authorised by Parliament. This is strictly done. But if you call upon me to say whether a collector at Liverpool has collected within a million of what he ought to have collected or remitted, I have no power of controlling him. The law gives me no such authority.

209. Mr. J. M'Gregor.] It is not possible to audit the receipt and issue of the whole public revenue by means of the information possessed by the Comptroller-general of the Exchequer?—It is not; his functions are confined to Exchequer payments, and anything which is paid previously to the Exchequer payment does not come within his cognisance. It is perfectly possible to audit every Exchequer receipt and issue.

210. Sir H. Willoughby.] Are you aware that the Finance Accounts, from the delay in printing, do not get into the hands of Members till about the beginning of August?—I think that is very possible; I see that these of the last year which I hold in my hand were not ordered to be printed till the 6th of July. The Journals of the House will tell you when you got possession of them, but when you did they were utterly worthless for the proceedings of the year.

THE RIGHT HON. SIR F. T. BARING, BART., IN THE CHAIR.

The Right Honourable the Lord Monteagle of Brandon; further Examined.

30 May 1856.

211. Chairman.] HAS your Lordship anything to add to your evidence on the last sitting of the Committee?—There are three points upon which I think further explanation may be advantageous; I was unable to give it at the time that the questions were asked. The first point is this; I was asked in relation to Mr. Gladstone's Act of 1854, passed to settle the charges upon the Consolidated Fund, whether, at the time of introducing that measure, there had not been a distinct intimation given with respect to there being pensions then outstanding, which it might be expedient afterwards to buy up. My impression was, that such intimation was given as was suggested in the question put by the honourable Secretary to the Treasury; I have ascertained since that such impression was correct, because in the progress of the Bill it was stated that a great variety of other charges, including numerous pensions charged by Royal Warrant or Act of Parliament rested upon those revenues. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is reported to have added "Of those pensions, I shall, I hope, chiefly dispose by the close of the month, by paying them off; but till that is done it will be necessary to make provision for their being discharged in a proper manner; there is no reason to make them subject to annual votes; they belong to that class of charges which ought at once to be placed on the Consolidated Fund." Therefore at that time Parliament were made aware of the existence of those pensions, and of its being the intention of Government on the 2d of February 1854 to purchase them. The mode of purchase is not referred to in the statement.

212. Sir J. Graham.] Who made that speech?—The late Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Gladstone, is reported to have done so, and therefore by that speech there was an intimation given of the existence of those pensions, and of a desire to pay them off, but the mode in which they were to be purchased is not stated, or even hinted at.

213. Does that apply to the purchase of 54,000*l.*?—It states in general terms pensions chargeable upon the gross revenue; it does not go into details upon the subject; but I presume it to apply in its most general sense to all existing pensions charged on the gross revenue, as the policy of the measure is defended upon general reasoning that would be applicable to all; but no reference is made to the mode of purchase, whether through the Government or through Parliament.

214. Do those words in your opinion cover both transactions, both the purchase before the Act of 1854 and the purchase since the Act of 1854, the last particularly, of 213,000*l.*?—I think it must have referred to all the pensions which were outstanding on the introduction of the Bill, and those that had been lately purchased were then outstanding as well as the other, but I have no more grounds for an opinion than those which I have already stated, but the Committee will see that there is no reference to the mode or manner of making the purchase.

215. Mr. Wilson.] You have read an extract from a speech of Mr. Gladstone's of a particular date; but in his speech on the 2d of June upon "Public Revenue and Consolidated Fund Charges Bill," Mr. Gladstone made use of these expressions: "One small class of charges at present defrayed out of the revenue before it reached the Exchequer, was not comprised in Schedule (A.)." (Schedule (A.) being the Schedule which transferred from the gross revenue to the Consolidated Fund.) "And the Government proposed to leave it in its present condition, and for an obvious reason. The class to which he alluded consisted of a very limited number of pensions, which under various authorities were paid to the representatives of various families, who inherited them from times comparatively remote. With respect to these pensions, it appeared clear; at least this had been the view taken by Her Majesty's Government, and he thought it would be approved by the House, that the best course would be to buy them up and so dispose of them. He expected that, if judiciously effected, this operation would be rather a profitable arrangement to the public than otherwise, and it would rid them of an anomaly attended with some inconvenience. A certain portion of these pensions had been already bought up; in point of fact he might say that, substantially, the whole matter was concluded so far as regarded the most important pensions; but from one cause or another, the arrangement in several cases was not yet ready to take effect. Until it did take effect, that was provisionally, he proposed to leave these pensions precisely as they were at present, inasmuch as the Government did not look upon them as permanent charges, and it was not worth while to enter upon new arrangements respecting them." You would take that as an intimation that Mr. Gladstone intended to leave them exactly as they were, and as they had formerly been dealt with?—I stated in the previous evidence that the first speech which Mr. Gladstone made seems to me in perfect conformity to the second. He states in both instances that those were charges that it was expedient for the public interest to buy up; in that opinion I concur. He states that they were not provided for under Schedule (A.) or Schedule (B.), but that they were to continue as they had been, in expectation of a future profitable and advantageous purchase of them. The two things agree, and the second speech in June leads to a conclusion entirely in conformity with the first on the 2d February, in which I have said that I entirely concur.

216. You were asked a question the other day as to whether the passing of the Act of 1854 made any difference with regard to the transactions of the present year, placing them in a different category from those which took place in 1853, for the purchase of Earl Cowper's pension in 1853; the conditions upon which that Act was passed would show that it was not contemplated that there should be any distinction?—It shows that it was intended, and rightly, to buy up those pensions; but with respect to the questions that I was asked, while I declined altogether to express any opinion as to the legality of the mode, I stated, and state now, that the mode of extinguishing those pensions is not in the slightest degree touched by what occurred in discussion or enactment. It was equally consistent with Mr. Gladstone's intention that those pensions should be bought up out of gross revenue by the Treasury as has been done by vote of the Commons, or by the sanction of Parliament. Each of these alternatives is left open as it stood before Mr. Gladstone made his statement.

217. Has your Lordship received the Return to your own order of the House of Lords with regard to those pensions?—I have received it; it was delivered this morning.

218. Have you perused the Minute of the 13th of May 1853, under which those pensions, both of 1853 and of 1856, have been purchased?—Yes, I have.

219. Have you seen that by the Minute of 1853 the pensions purchased in the present year were part of the pensions which were contemplated to be purchased in 1853, according to the arrangement to which Mr. Gladstone adverted in his speech in 1854?—Yes; but the purchase of the 5th of April 1853 was chargeable on the hereditary revenues of the Crown in South Wales, and it is to be paid from the capital of the land revenue. Now, if I remember the land revenue laws, there is a statutable power of paying for a charge of this description out of that capital fund; therefore, if I am right, comparing the purchase of 1853 with that of 1856, there is a statutable authority to pay the one, but there is clearly no statutable authority to pay the other. One is paid out of gross income, and the other out of capital.

30 May 1856.

220. Will your Lordship advert to the fact, that you are now dealing with land revenue pension; but there was an Excise pension at the same time, for which 43,000 l. was given, which had no reference whatever to the Land Revenue Act?—I have dealt with the one to which you called my attention.

221. Sir H. Willoughby.] Have you ever read those papers?—I have read them, but not with so much attention as I should wish. I have spoken of the land revenues out of which a capital fund exists produced by sales, and which by statute is made applicable legally to the purchase of a charge of this kind.

222. Mr. Wilson.] Will your Lordship be good enough to refer to the one out of Inland Revenue?—The Minute states, "that the commutation of Earl Cowper's pension upon the land revenue, recently sanctioned, is upon terms more favourable to the public, by the amount of several years' purchase, than that effected in Lord Melbourne's case in 1826, the prices of the public funds being duly considered, and therefore my Lords consider it would be advisable to conclude the purchase." In this case it is precisely analogous to the purchase of Lord Melbourne's pension.

223. And exactly the same as the pensions purchased in the present year?—Yes.

224. And you see by the preceding part of the same Minute, that the pensions purchased in the present year were included in the contemplated arrangement under this Minute?—No doubt they were in contemplation at the time that Mr. Gladstone made his speech; but there is nothing said or inferred in Mr. Gladstone's speech of the mode in which the purchase was to be made.

225. In pursuance of the purchase of this pension upon the Inland Revenue, in 1853, analogous exactly to the pensions of the present year, have you seen, in the Finance Account of the year ending the 5th of January 1854, that the purchase of Earl Cowper's pension for 43,000 l. is for the first time given to the public in the shape of an account?—Yes, it is so.

226. Will you refer to Question 142 of the minutes of the former day's evidence?—I was asked, "With regard to the two pensions which have been the subject of discussion, they have been redeemed in the present year, and the only distinction between them and the pension of 1826, and the pension of 1853 is, that the Treasury, instead of keeping the matter entirely from the cognizance of Parliament till the annual finance accounts have been published, and in no other form, have taken the earliest opportunity in the present instance of presenting them in the balance sheet?" To which I replied, "That is the only distinction that I see, but I should be far indeed from stating that the financial practices of 1825, and the precedents at that time, were to form a guide, when in many instances they are only useful to deter with respect to the proceedings of the present day. In the year 1826, as the Right honourable Baronet opposite, who framed the Admiralty Estimates in 1831, well knows, the payments out of gross revenue, for instance, paying between 700,000 l. and 800,000 l. for the building of the Post-Office in London, and entering into a contract at Liverpool for the Liverpool Buildings, without the knowledge of Parliament, out of gross revenue, were the ordinary transactions of those days."

227. You say, "That is the only distinction that I see," which is quite correct. Then will you refer to Question 175?—"Supposing that the finance accounts were now made up to the 5th of January, as formerly, that transaction would not have appeared in the finance accounts till the next year, and would not have been before Parliament till about Easter in 1857? It would have been before Parliament in the balance sheet, if moved for, in the same manner as it is now; therefore, as far as that is concerned, it would be the same, but it would not have been included in the finance accounts till a later period than it now is."

228. Then your Lordship must see that there is a discrepancy in those two answers. In the first instance, it is stated, which was quite true, that the only distinction was, that in the present case the present purchases have been put in the finance accounts of the quarter furnished to Parliament at the earliest period; and in the second instance, we should infer that had the former precedent been followed, Parliament would have had an intimation of the purchase in the balance sheet?—What I meant by that, and what alone I could have meant, was was that there was the same opportunity of communicating through the balance sheet in the one instance as in the other, if it had been the desire of the Government at the time to have communicated through the balance sheet the purchase of that pension. Antecedently to the production of the financial accounts there was the same opportunity of doing it in the one case as in the other; it was not so done as a matter of fact.

229. You do not mean to infer, as is inferred by some other questions, that there is any doubt at all about the fact that the former purchases were not included in the balance sheets, but were only included in the finance accounts of the year?—No, certainly not; I never meant to express any doubt upon that subject whatever. I was asked, with reference to the course taken by Parliament, at least since the year 1830, of adding to the Vote of Parliament as much as could be voted, being susceptible of previous estimate, and diminishing the unappropriated sums. That had been the principle, and I stated, with respect to the civil contingencies and extraordinary expenses, how much they had been formerly, and how they were now reduced. I should wish, with the permission of the Committee, just to put in an account, which will show this fact in a very striking manner. Comparing 1827, 1828, and 1829 with 1850, 1851, and 1852, it will appear that the Army Extraordinaries have ceased since the year 1832. The Ordnance Extraordinaries have ceased altogether, and the Civil Contingencies have been diminished from what was an average of 230,000 l. a year to a sum of 100,000 l. a year. The following account will make what is now stated clear.

[The Account was delivered in, and is as follows:]

	Civil Contingencies.	Army Extraordinaries.	Ordnance Extraordinaries.
1828	240,000	810,000	78,849
1829	160,000	700,000	430,715
1850	100,000	—	—
1852	100,000	—	—

I have been asked a good deal about what took place in the Lords in relation to the amendment in the second Bill of 1854, that is, to point out the difference between the first and second Bills, as to the charges for "pensions, superannuation allowances, &c.," chargeable on gross revenue. I have since ascertained, by a document which is on the table of the House of Commons, as well as in the House of Lords, that the Committee to which the Bill was referred reported distinctly by a resolution upon the motion of Lord Overstone, carried unanimously, that they were unable to vote those pensions and superannuations, because they were not in possession of the Estimates and the list of the allowances in question; therefore the vote was objected to, upon the ground that such information had not been furnished; therefore, with respect to the future, I thought it very material that it should be noticed that the objection was not an objection on principle to bring these in their respective classes; but it was thought an objection, in principle, to vote any large sum without knowing what it was. With the permission of the Committee, I will hand in a copy of the Report made by the Select Committee, and laid on the table of both Houses.

[The same was delivered in, and is as follows:]

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

30 May 1856.

Moved by Lord Overstone, 22° July 1854.

PRESENT:

Lord Privy Seal.	Viscount Canning.	Lord Monteagle.
Earl of Shaftesbury.	Lord Lyttleton.	Lord Overstone.
Earl Granville.	Lord Churchill.	Lord St. Leonards.
Viscount Hutchinson.	Lord Wrottesley.

It is moved (by Lord Overstone), to resolve that the Committee are unable to come to any conclusion as to the propriety of transferring all the pensions and superannuations of the Customs, Inland Revenue, and Post-office to the Annual Vote, without being previously furnished with the means of judging of the special circumstances by which some of those cases are affected.

230. Mr. Wilson.] Did not the same objection apply to the cost of management and other things of which you have no estimates; the estimates were not then ready; they were in a state of preparation; those estimates referred to the cost of collection and management, as well as to the superannuations?—No; pardon me, this had no reference whatever to the question of the cost of collection; the resolution which was put, and carried unanimously, with three cabinet ministers in the room, was, that the House of Lords could not vote that sum, because they had not the particulars before them; we did not know whether the proposal of the Government was right or wrong, and therefore it was postponed.

231. Will you allow me to call your attention to the fact, that it was not voting a sum at all, but simply asserting the principle that superannuations and pensions, the same as the cost of collection, should be annually voted by Parliament, and not paid out of the gross revenue?—But that involved the whole question of knowing what those pension and superannuation allowances were, and we asked for a list to know what they were before we dealt with them, and that list was not furnished. I was subsequently asked with respect to the time of furnishing the finance accounts, under the new system of the Act of 1854, which postponed their preparation from January to April, and I stated that I thought there was a great public inconvenience by the postponement of the time. I was then asked were not the finance accounts of the last year ordered to be printed on the 6th of July, which was the term stated; that is true; they were ordered to be printed on the 6th of July, but I was not then aware of what I have since ascertained, that though ordered to be printed in July, they were not in the hands of Members till the 6th of October, which was after the prorogation of Parliament, and at a period of time when those accounts were absolutely worthless for practical purposes.

232. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Is it the fact that the finance accounts are absolutely worthless if not presented before the end of the Session?—I think very nearly so for practical purposes, because if the budget of the current year is passed, and the financial business is closed, the accounts are no longer useful for the Parliamentary business of that year, and are only useful for the next year collaterally or by inference; they do not give the same information that accounts made up to January would give in the financial discussions of the year.

233. Are the finance accounts frequently used in discussions upon the budget?—I can hardly conceive any Member of Parliament being able, with advantage, to discuss the financial propositions of the year without having the fullest information of what took place in the preceding year; and I think that that is as much a convenience to those who have to propose and defend the budget as to those who may have occasion to observe upon it The fullest communication of all the facts saves time, by preventing mistakes and misunderstandings.

234. Mr. Wilson.] Are you aware that when this alteration was made in the date of the finance accounts, for the obvious convenience of making the year of the votes and the finance agree, there was simultaneously a paper, for the first time, prepared for Parliament, called a statistical statement, which paper contains everything that is really essential with regard to the finance of the past year up to the 5th of January; that is, it contains the net amount of income and expenditure, and all the leading features which the old finance accounts did contain, and is furnished to Parliament as early in the Session as possible, possible, in order that Members may have the information to which you advert before the financial statement comes on?—I perceive no very close analogy or still less any identity between the two papers referred to. Very few papers have been more useful and important than the account now published called the statistical account, but that is, practically speaking, only bringing into a more ascertained and fixed shape a very valuable account, which had been previously moved for annually by Mr. Cardwell, and afterwards an account moved for by another honourable gentleman; but neither of those will furnish all the information that the finance accounts will furnish. Mr. Cardwell's account, for instance, is an admirable resumé, giving certain particulars; so is the statistical account, but neither give the detailed information contained in the financial accounts.

235. You are aware that the year to which you now advert was the first year in which the accounts had been made up in that form?—Yes; the change was consequent on the Act of 1854.

236. Therefore is it not reasonable to think that when a great change of accounts has taken place, great delays may have taken place last year which would not take place in future, when the accounts are made up usually to that date?—That may be the case; my observation is not to be understood as finding fault with any one, but showing that there has been a variation in the system, from which I think very great inconvenience has arisen. I am sure that it was a natural thought to make the financial accounts run consistently to the same date with the financial year, but you have purchased that advantage too dearly. This subject was necessarily considered by Lord Althorp at the time he altered the commencement of the financial year from January to April, and advisedly declined altering the term of the financial accounts; he felt that it would be inconvenient to keep them so long out of the hands of Members; I think so still.

237. Suppose we were to say that there would be no difficulty in the present and all future years in those accounts being laid before Parliament in the last week of May, or in the first week of June, without any delay, would you think then that your observation was removed or modified?—I should hold to my first opinion, and for the same reason I have already given; I will tell the Committee why; the finance accounts are made by the Treasury, calling upon the various offices concerned to furnish the accounts relating to their own departments. For example, the old system was to call upon the Exchequer to furnish five or six separate accounts, showing the receipts into the Exchequer. Those were rendered to the Treasury, signed by the Comptroller-general, and were printed as such. Now, in order, I have no doubt, to facilitate the production of those new accounts as much as possible, the accounts that are now rendered as from the Exchequer, are no accounts from the Exchequer at all. Under the new system that account is made up, though it purports to be an Exchequer account, without any reference to the department to which it relates; it is therefore incorrect in many respects in its figures, as compared with the accounts of the department itself; it is further incorrect in relation to the references to the statutes cited as authorities for various payments. I attribute this to my belief that under the old system this duty being done with somewhat more of time and care, was more likely to be done accurately, and that to avoid mistakes of the press, which in printing long accounts are not unfrequent, the proofs were sent to the various departments to which they related for their correction. I will show the Committee one sheet which is put in, which, in consequence of being prepared in a more hasty manner, is full of mistakes; but the mistakes of the account itself are more serious than the mistakes which are therein contained. I allude especially to the altered classification or heading of the accounts, which clash with the classification prescribed at the very same time to me, by the Treasury. Both accounts are made unintelligible, because conflicting.

238. In the statistical account, to which reference has been made, would either of the transactions into which the Committee are more particularly inquiring, namely, the purchase for 45,000 l. in 1853, and 213,000 l. in the present year out of gross revenue, appear?—I do not think either of them would appear in the way in which those statistical tables are now made up, and I think if any attempt were made to give you as much detail on the statistical tables as would be required, the difficulty would be augmented a hundredfold, inasmuch as, if I remember right, you give seven years' financial tables in the one return.

239. What is your opinion, upon the whole, of the effect of the change of the financial year from January to April; was it salutary or otherwise?—The Committee are aware that that change was made during the time that I was connected in a subordinate position with the Government acting as Financial Secretary to the Treasury Board of Lords Grey and Althorp. It was made upon reflection; it was made in reference to the highest of all Parliamentary principles, namely, that of maintaining a strict appropriation of the public money. Lord Spencer explained and defended it in Parliament on the ground that it was to put an end, as far as was practicable, to the then practice of frequently expending money before it was voted; therefore Lord Althorp proposed to change the financial year from January to the month of April, in order to have the means to take a previous and early vote, and to supply the means of paying legally out of the Exchequer for the public service; and in those respects the effect has been good and satisfactory.

240. Then what are the countervailing evils, if any, beyond the difficulty with respect to the finance accounts?—The postponement may sometimes encourage the public officers, charged with the public revenue, to postpone the financial services of the year in proportion as you postpone the closing of the financial year; but that is not very likely to happen, as it is for the convenience of the Government itself in almost every instance to get the financial business closed as soon as possible. I see no objection to that change at all, except this question of delaying the finance accounts, which formed no part of the original plan, but was a change added three or four years ago.

241. The change having been effected for some time, and having been effected with considerable difficulty, a supplemental vote for three months having been necessary, you would not advise a change of that arrangement now, provided only greater diligence were used in furnishing the finance accounts at an earlier period of the session?—What I should simply recommend for the public convenience would be, that the financial accounts should be rendered up to January, in place of being rendered to the month of April. You would have then the certainty that the finance accounts were in the hands of Members as soon after Parliament approached the financial discussion as possible.

242. Then the account rendered would not tally with the financial year?—No; neither did it for upwards of 20 years antecedent to the Act of 1854. I never knew any inconvenience result from that practice during the whole time I was at the Treasury, after the change made by Lord Spencer, during which period the financial year began in the month of April, but the financial account began in January.

243. When was the change made in the finance accounts to enable them to correspond with the financial year?—It was made by the Act of 1854. It was well intended, but it has proved a mistake.

244. And you think there is evil in that?—I do; for the reasons which I have stated.

245. You are not cognisant of any disadvantage or evil arising from the antecedent practice when the accounts and the financial year did not tally?—There might have been perhaps a few more desultory motions made for papers to give information during the current quarter. I cannot speak with any certainty upon it, but I never knew any real inconvenience result from the practice.

246. If the finance accounts for the antecedent year are not in the hands of Members until some six months after the close of the financial year, there can be no motion for papers during the Session immediately following?—I am referring now to the old state of the accounts; the old accounts closed to January. Supposing an interval of three months from January to April, before the great financial business of the year was brought under discussion, there would be, as far as the financial accounts were concerned one quarter, for which information would not be given on the face of those accounts; therefore if there was a motion about the timber trade, or the wine duties, or any other matter of that description likely to be made a subject of special motion, it is probable that there would be a motion made merely for the accounts as far as they could be brought up for the past quarter; that is, to continue that special special account on the subject pending for debate from the January to which the financial accounts were made up and furnished up to the latest period.

247. You were in the confidence, at that time, of Lord Althorp?—Yes.

248. And you were consulted by him when the change in the financial year was made?—He conversed with me on these subjects with entire confidence.

249. Do you wish the Committee distinctly to understand that this question of not making the finance accounts correspond with the change of the financial year was contemplated by you and him, and that you preferred not changing the financial accounts with the change of the financial year?—It was much more the decision of Lord Althorp than my decision; but he spoke to me with entire confidence upon all these matters. At this distance of time I cannot be quite sure that we did discuss this exact question together; I believe we did; but I never heard a suggested doubt about this question; as far as my memory now serves me; that change was made in the year 1832, and it is difficult to say what arose in discussion nearly a quarter of a century back.

250. And it continued the practice for about 20 years?—Yes; from 1832 up to 1853.

251. When the change was first proposed, did the objection occur to you, and did you state it?—It did; and I think I ventured to state it in reference to the Act of 1854, in that House of Parliament to which I belong.

252. You stated it in your place in Parliament?—I am pretty sure I did, and I think I communicated it to friends in this House of Parliament that I thought it was well-intentioned but it was a change very clearly not for the better.

253. Chairman.] Do not you think that the Bill which places upon votes in Parliament the expenditure for the service of the revenue departments, makes a considerable alteration in the state of the question?—I am not quite sure that it does, because I have considered that the payment of the revenue departments, in the manner that I described to you, is a matter more of form than of substance. I do not think it a matter of practical importance as it stands.

254. The alteration with regard to the general revenue was made upon the grounds that the money should be voted by Parliament before the expense was incurred?—Yes.

255. Till lately the expenditure was incurred upon the gross revenue, without any vote from Parliament?—Yes.

256. When that system was altered and the expenditure voted, might not the same objection be made to the expenditure being incurred between January and April without a vote of Parliament, as was made to the old system with regard to other votes?—Certainly.

257. Therefore is not that a reason to a certain extent for the alteration?—It is an additional motive, no doubt, acting in the same direction.

258. The Audit Board audit the accounts of the revenue departments; would not the Audit Board have to compare the expenditure with the Votes of Parliament?—I presume so, but I am not conversant with the mode of proceeding in that department; I know that I am bound to send the quarterly accounts of the Exchequer to the auditors; and I have lately felt it my duty to add one particular to those accounts which had not been contained in previous accounts, namely, the dates, not only of the Exchequer issues, but of the money drawn, that the attention of the auditors may be called to the question, that the Paymaster's issues were not only the issues that might be made or warranted by law at any future time after such issues had taken place, but whether the issues were warranted by law at the time they were made. What returns take place between the revenue department and the auditors I am not able to state with any certainty, but I should think, comparing the accounts delivered to Parliament, namely, the financial accounts, with the other accounts, namely, the statutable accounts, rendered by the Exchequer, which form a check upon them, is, both in Parliament and to the auditors, a very material subject of investigation; for instance, with regard to the last financial accounts which we have, no effective comparison can be made between the financial accounts which are sent in, purporting to state the payments into the Exchequer, and my account which is laid before Parliament, stating the Exchequer payments likewise; the two will not agree, and that I have attributed to the altered circumstance of not deriving the information which was accustomed to be rendered from the departments by the Treasury.

 259. Taking

30 May 1856.

259. Taking the Excise accounts for example, if the auditors had to compare at all the expense incurred with the Votes of Parliament, it would be necessary for the auditors that the accounts of the Excise should be made to tally with the Votes of Parliament?—I am not conversant with the practice of the auditors, but I conceive it would be necessary to examine from my account of receipt, or the Excise account of payment, to judge how the expenditure tallied with the Votes of Parliament; first to ascertain the expenditure, and then to ascertain the legality of that expenditure.

260. The accounts would be obliged to be made up to the 31st March?—I think, without referring to any coincidence of the vote of Parliament, as between the Excise and the auditors, that for the whole of their duty as auditors an early communication of the accounts to be audited is an essential principle of a successful audit.

261. I am speaking with regard to when the accounts must be made up for the auditors; previously to this alteration the accounts were made up and audited by the usual year, but owing to the change, is not it necessary, if there is any comparison between the accounts and the votes, that the accounts should be made up for the audit for the financial year?—I should be sorry, without reference to the Acts of Parliament, to speak to the laws which regulate the Audit-office, but my own impression, if the Committee will receive it in that uncertain way is, that the auditors receive their returns quarterly, and do not wait for the entire close of the year for the commencement of the year's business. I should think such a delay would be so inconvenient to all parties, that they probably take a quarterly audit; but the auditors are the proper parties to answer these questions.

262. It has been supposed that the year's accounts, which are the finance accounts, are a check upon the expenditure; those accounts are furnished, are they not, by the department itself, and are not audited accounts?—My account is sent to the Audit-office every quarter, and to Parliament once a year, therefore the one forms a species of check upon the other, but both in my department are made by myself; so that I presume, with respect to the revenue departments, the accounts are rendered by the revenue department, and the audit check is applied to the accounts so rendered; but of this I have no personal knowledge.

263. The finance accounts are not furnished after an independent examination and check, but they are the accounts of the department itself, are they not?—In my case they are, and I conceive it to be so generally.

264. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] The finance accounts contain a statement of the expenditure of the year, as well as of the revenue, do they not?—Yes, income and expenditure, in addition to much detailed information.

265. But they contain a complete account of the expenditure in particular, as well as the revenue?—Yes, with important appendices respecting both; accounts of the debt, and of trade and navigation, &c.

266. If the finance accounts are made for the year ending the 5th January, whereas the estimates are made for the year ending the 5th of April, it becomes impossible to compare the estimated expenditure of the year with the actual expenditure by comparing the estimates and the finance accounts, does not it?—The mode that was generally resorted to in the case, which was not as usual as it might be wished perhaps, of a vote upon the budget before the 5th of April, was to take an estimate for the quarter that was incomplete. You thus had the actual income and the expenditure for three quarters, which were fully complete. You made an estimate for the quarter then current, and upon that account, which was partly account and partly estimate, a statement was made, and made with a certainty and accuracy that has often surprised me.

267. That no doubt is an answer to the question with regard to the statement of the budget, but I am speaking of the estimates for the expenditure of the year; if any person wished to compare the army, navy, and civil service estimates for the year ending the 5th of April, with the year returned in the finance accounts, would he not, according to the old method, have found it impossible?—He would have found it difficult, though it was done, but having no finance accounts at all, subjects an inquirer to a greater difficulty. You have to compare correct information up to January, with no financial information for the year.

268. Is

30 May 1856.

268. Is it not the fact that under the old mode of making out the finance accounts, it was impossible to institute a correct comparison between the estimated expenditure for the supply services and the actual expenditure as presented to Parliament in the financial accounts?—It was very possible to do it, and it was very regularly done from the year 1832 invariably up to the year 1854, during the whole of which time the finance accounts were made up to January, whilst the financial year closed 31 March.

269. If the expenditure was returned to Parliament for the year ending the 5th January, and if the estimates were presented to Parliament for the year ending the 5th of April, was it possible, when the expenditure had been incurred, to compare the actual expenditure with the estimated expenditure?—This was done partly from that which was known, and partly from that which was inferred; and if there was any error arising from reasoning from analogy as to one quarter, that was always set right, and was done so repeatedly by the Minister himself. At a subsequent period he would have to state I argued upon an estimate last quarter, amounting to so much, and I find that it was so much more or less; and an allowance was consequently made.

270. Under the old mode of making out the finance accounts, was it possible to institute a correct comparison between the estimated expenditure for the supply services, and the expenditure actually incurred, from documents presented to Parliament?—I have stated that you have an uncertainty, derived from reasoning from analogy and estimate, in place of reasoning from actual fact and account for the April quarter; but I am comparing the old system with a system which leaves you without any finance accounts at all, as in the last year when the finance accounts were delivered to Members long after the Prorogation.

271. In the form in which the finance accounts are now presented, namely, for the year ending the 5th of April, is it not possible to institute an accurate comparison between the estimated expenditure for the supply services, and the expenditure actually incurred when the finance accounts are presented to Parliament?—The finance accounts being presented after Parliament is prorogued, I cannot understand how such a comparison can be made of practical service, or what use the finance accounts are at all for Parliamentary current business.

272. Does not the form in which the finance accounts are now presented admit of an accurate comparison between the expenditure and the estimate being made, which was not possible before?—Supposing the finance accounts are delivered in time for the practical use of the Members, they undoubtedly admit of a closer comparison than was the case previously.

273. Do you not believe that that was the reason for making the change?—I am quite sure that it was; and I stated at first that I thought the motive was a very good one, but that the sacrifice was much greater than Parliament or the Government was aware of at the time of making this alteration.

274. Was not it necessary, in order to make the change, to issue one finance account for a quarter, in order to introduce the new system of finance account for the year ending the 5th of April?—It was.

275. That change having been made, and that inconvenient break having occurred, would you recommend now a return to the old practice of presenting the finance accounts for the year ending the 5th of January?—The difficulty of making a change in this respect is not very great, inasmuch as the accounts are made up quarterly in all the great departments; it is therefore easy to substitute one system for the other.

276. There would be no difficulty so far as the preparation of the accounts is concerned, but with regard to uniformity of series, would you advise that a change should be made back again?—So far as my own judgment goes, considering the financial accounts of great importance for the convenience of Members, and the information of the public, I think it is worth encountering that difficulty rather than having the financial accounts postponed to so late a period of the session, that they become useless. And again, I take the liberty of suggesting that the greater the effort of the Government to remedy that evil, by getting the accounts made up very hastily, and getting them printed at an earlier period, the greater is the risk of there being inaccuracies in those accounts, which inaccuracies may render them even worse than useless.

277. Sir J. Graham.] Parliament now meeting generally in February, would there be any practical evil in having nine months' accounts up to January as supplemental to the annual finance accounts made up to the close of the financial financial year?—None whatever, and I think it would be a very great improvement.

30 May 1856.

278. With our knowledge of the public departments, the accounts being made up quarterly, do you see any practical difficulty in making up nine months' account for the meeting of Parliament?—I think there would be no difficulty as far as the departments with which I am familiar are concerned.

279. And in following that up at the close of the financial year with the entire account?—Yes.

280. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Which of those methods should you prefer, a preliminary nine months' account with a subsequent twelve months' account, or a return to the old practice?—I should prefer a return to the old practice as more simple and more intelligible, and as being tested by the experiment; that system was, perhaps, intelligible, simple, and clear to me, because I was secretary to the Treasury when Lord Althorp's change was made, and I was conversant with the proceedings for eight years after that period. I do not know how it might present itself to a party that had not perhaps a bias derived from former practice in favour of the one system.

281. Do you think that there is any weight in the objection that the Government furnish Parliament with no means of comparing the estimated expenditure with the expenditure incurred?—The question seems to be still whether the finance accounts are useful for the purpose of furnishing that information. If they are, it seems to me clear that they ought to be rendered at a time when they can be turned to account, and I fear that in adhering to the rule of making up the accounts to April, you never will get the finance accounts into the hands of Members in sufficient time, and they will be open to inconveniences and to a risk of mistakes and inaccuracies.

282. Sir J. Graham.] Do you not think that a nine months' account, made up to the 1st of January, would at the meeting of Parliament afford Members generally throughout the House great opportunity of canvassing the financial conduct of the Government, that opportunity being now wanting by the postponement of the account till after the budget is stated?—No doubt a nine months' account would be infinitely better than the present system. I am only a little doubtful whether I should not prefer a twelve months' account made up to January for my guidance than a nine months' account.

283. A nine months' account would furnish a great opportunity and ample knowledge for canvassing the proceedings of the Government, and the annual account as it now is would tally exactly with the account of the year?—Yes.

284. And the two documents would furnish everything necessary?—Yes.

285. Mr. Henley.] Have you any objection to an annual account made up to January and an annual account to April?—Except the expense of double printing, and that would not be very much, because the quarterly payments would be done at once by the omission of quarter No. 1, and the substitution of a new return as No. 4.

286. You have been asked with reference to uniformity of series, and the inconvenience of comparison being broken. That has been already effected; there is now no means of comparing the expenditure for the last 20 years with the expenditure of the last year or two?—There is none such, more particularly adverting to the fact that the heads of finance accounts, which were well considered before a Committee of the House of Commons long before, I believe, any Member now in this room was a Member of Parliament, were adopted on deliberation, and are now varied; those former accounts furnished you, till a late period, with the means of making a tolerably accurate comparison between one head of account and another; but since the last alteration was made, those heads of account themselves have been altered. For instance, if you look under the head of imprest monies under the new system, and compare it with imprest monies under the old system, you will find that they do not correspond; the information sought for most frequently, and which is the most useful, is relative information rather than positive; this is entirely wanting, as between this account of 1854-5 and the preceding account of 1853-4; the accounts have been altered without communication to the departments concerned, consequently the relative information to be derived from a comparison of the accounts is not given. I can give illustrations of this in reference to my own department; there are accounts furnished in the last finance accounts purporting to be of payments into the Exchequer. As I have told the Committee, they are accounts which I never made out, the usual form having been to call upon me to make them them out, and that form having been abandoned, and the heads of account are so varied that I have the greatest possible difficulty in reconciling the one account with the other.

287. Sir H. Willoughby.] You were asked a question with regard to an annual account up to January; would not that involve the objection that you would be getting in a quarter belonging to another financial year?—That was precisely the inconvenience felt at the time that we made the change in 1832; but the object being to render the financial account to the latest time that it could be furnished, consistently with its being early enough for communication to Parliament, we could not escape from that difficulty. A mode of escaping the difficulty now suggested, is described in the questions put to me by the Right honourable Baronet opposite.

288. I put a question to you on the last occasion respecting the finance accounts; I asked you whether you were aware that the finance accounts, from delay in printing, do not get into the hands of Members till the beginning of August. You have since made the explanatory observation that you have ascertained that they were not delivered till the 6th of October, therefore those accounts took three months to print?—Yes, if they were delivered as soon as printed.

289. That being so, you have been asked the question whether, if the finance accounts were to be produced in Parliament in the month of June, they would be practically of any use in the House of Commons, assuming that they took three months to print?—Certainly not. According to the ordinary period of the sittings of Parliament they would be of no use comparatively. They would on this supposition be distributed in September.

290. Therefore any such amendment would be, practically, without value?—I think without any value. It would not remove my objection.

291. Mr. Henley.] With reference to a nine months' account, is it your opinion that the ordinary expenditure of each quarter is so accurately divided, quarter by quarter, that it would enable the House of Commons to form any just estimate of how far the expenses of the year corresponded with the estimate for the year?—I think that, generally speaking, there would be a power of comparison; but in all these matters, as I have already said, for the use of Parliament and of the public, information is more important relatively than positively; unless one supposes, which I have no reason to suppose, from any observation that I have made of the state of the public accounts, that something disingenuous and uncandid was done, in order to shove off the expenditure from one quarter to another; generally speaking, the comparison, year by year, would be fair, and would not lead parties astray. Unless some large financial alteration took place, the old accounts would be sufficient, unless we impute something uncandid to the Government; a large repayment of duty made unexpectedly, for instance; if you altered the duty on spirits, and there was an allowance for the stock on hand, there might be a difference between one quarter of one year and the corresponding quarter of another; but without the concealment of some such fact, you would receive the means and elements of judging rightly. I think you may fairly trust any Government that we are likely to have in rendering these accounts justly and fairly.

292. Do you think that in the case of expenditure upon the navy estimates, as to stores or buildings, it would be safe to estimate that, because the expenditure had been at a certain rate for nine months, it would necessarily go on at the same rate for the succeeding three months?—Clearly not. In dealing with a military department like the army or navy, I believe that every one would regret to find the next three months precisely measured by the nine months preceding. An estimate of this kind may, however, be below, as well as above the mark. For example, in the case of the navy establishment, on the cessation of a war, you have a vast amount of expense thrown upon the public, which a close observer, knowing the historical facts of the case, would make allowances for and would correct for the purposes of reasoning upon the figures laid officially before him.

293. With a nine months' estimate you would have to make those calculations and abatements, and go into various elements for the purpose of financial reasoning; would that be greater or less than dealing in the same way with a twelve months' account made up to January, which took in a quarter of another financial year?—I should prefer getting a twelve months' account, according to the old system, in order to secure getting the accounts in time.

294. You think, striking the balance, that the inconvenience would be less to persons wanting to make financial calculations in having twelve months' accounts than in having nine months' accounts?—Yes, I think so. By twelve months I understand twelve months that can be made up and printed, and be in the hands of Members in time to be useful for Parliamentary discussion.

30 May 1856.

295. To persons accustomed to make financial calculations, and to a certain degree conversant with the public expenditure, there would not perhaps be much difficulty in arriving at a tolerably accurate estimate upon either nine or 12 months, but in the case of parties who are not so fortunate or unfortunate, which do you believe would give the greater information to the bulk of the House?—My own impression is, that I could rather reason upon the perfect knowledge of what was done in the 12 months than on the inferred knowledge that would be derived from an accurate account for nine months, which I might consider in one sense as a constant quantity; nine months a certain quantity plus a variable quantity of a three months' estimate.

296. Mr. Wilson.] If you had the accounts made up to January you must either have that uncertain quantity, or a certain quantity not belonging to that year, but to the year preceding?—Yes; no doubt. I prefer the latter.

297. I understand the result of your answer is, that as as a matter of account you would prefer the financial accounts of the year to correspond with the estimates of the year, with the financial year itself?—As a matter of account I should prefer to have the two things coincident; it is absolutely right that you should commence your financial year in April, you could not otherwise be free from the necessity of applying money that had not been voted, therefore Lord Althorp was right in changing the year to April. But I think the inconvenience of changing the financial account to that period being coupled with the non-delivery of that account in time to make it useful, drives me back to prefer the principle adopted in 1832, and adhered to till the year 1854, and I therefore conclude that whilst it is best to take your financial year from April, it is also desirable to give your financial accounts from January to January.

298. As a matter of account you would prefer that the two should correspond, but, if I understand you, you think there is a sufficient object, as a matter of convenience for the House of Commons in its finance discussions, that it should have the finance accounts made up to January and not to April?—Yes.

299. Then it has been suggested that we might have a nine months' account made up to January; am I not right in saying that at the present moment, when Parliament meets, it has before it the accounts of the nine months which have expired of the financial year, so far as regards the income under each head of revenue, and so far as regards the income and expenditure in the balance sheet accompanying the quarterly statement published in the newspapers. It has also the trade accounts, showing the quantities of each article imported, and the amount of duty received upon each article; it has also the quantities of goods exported; it has also the whole of the shipping accounts, which are part of the annual finance column; it has also the account which was prepared by Mr. Cardwell in the first instance, showing the income and expenditure, the amount added to the revenue of the year, and substracted by taxes repealed, and it has also the various finance accounts, which are now published in the statistical statement; all those accounts applicable to nine months are already laid before Parliament within a week or two of the meeting of Parliament; do you not think that for the general purposes of debate, those numerous accounts, all relating to the accounts of the nine months expired of the financial year, would answer all the purposes of debate before the conclusion of the financial year?—That is a question which gentlemen who have to consider the House of Commons' financial debates, are better qualified to judge of than I am; they have only to take, for example, the two accounts of public income and public expenditure, and the income and expenditure of the Consolidated Fund, with all their appendices, from the financial accounts, showing in detail everything which is given in gross, and compare them with the statistical account, and with the account which we used to call Mr. Cardwell's account, and you will find that however valuable (and no one rates them higher than I do) the statistical account, and Mr. Cardwell's account, they do not furnish you with all the information that you have in the annual finance accounts.

300. Sir J. Graham.] To bring it to the test, the two transactions of these two purchases of annuities out of gross revenue would not appear?—They would not, and could not appear; one is a convenient abstract, giving you with great great clearness, and with great facility for everybody, a kind of index to the finance accounts, but they are not the accounts themselves.

301. Mr. Wilson.] Is it not the case that those transactions to which the Right Honourable Baronet has alluded would not only not have appeared this year, but would not have appeared if the finance accounts had been brought up only to the 5th of January till the April of next year?—It depends upon the date at which the commutation was made.

302. The transactions took place in the first quarter of the present year, therefore, having taken place in the first quarter of the present year, those transactions would not have appeared till the finance accounts ending the 5th of January 1857, which would be presented to Parliament about Easter in that year?—Some of those transactions do not appear in the finance accounts at all; I do not know whether those would.

303. Will you refer to any one that does not appear in the finance accounts?—I will, but possibly I may suggest an explanation why it did not appear; Lord Cowper's pension was upon the Woods and Forests and Land Revenue; that I think does not appear at all in the financial accounts; my impression is that it was paid out of the capital of the Woods and Forests revenue. Now, what is given here is the income and expenditure of the Woods and Forests revenue, into which the purchase of these pensions would not enter. I believe there is a further account, which is the capital account, namely, an account showing the sums acquired by the sale of Woods and Forests property, and appropriated to investments for the benefit of the Woods and Forests revenue. It was on this supposition only that the purchase of Lord Cowper's pension was justifiable as made from the capital account. But it would not appear at all upon the face of the account; no income and expenditure account will show you, as far as I can understand it, the payments out of that capital account of the Woods and Forests, and it is correct that it should be so; and that explains another question that has been put, whether there was any Parliamentary sanction for it. If it was paid out of the capital account, there is an Act of Parliament sanction for making that payment.

304. The question that I asked was, seeing that these transactions took place in the first quarter of the present year, they could not have been before Parliament in the finance accounts, that is, in the only way in which they have ever been given to Parliament before, till Easter 1857?—If they took place after the 1st of January, of course they would enter only into the financial accounts ending the subsequent 1st of January, and therefore it would only be in the following Session that a payment subsequent to January would be communicated to Parliament. But the payment I allude to would never appear in the finance accounts at all, for the reason I have stated.

305. Therefore, with regard to that transaction, if the finance accounts are in the hands of Members within a fortnight from the present time, the effect will be, that that transaction will appear in the financial accounts of the year in the month of June 1856; whereas, by the old plan, it would have appeared in the financial accounts in April 1857?—No doubt it must be so, understanding the question now put to apply to the last purchase of 213,000 l.; because if the transaction took place at a period not included in the rendered account, of course it must be excluded from it.

306. Mr. Henley.] That 213,000 l. happening to come in the quarter between January and April was an accident?—Yes.

307. It would be arguing therefore from a particular instance to a general conclusion?—Precisely so.

308. Supposing these transactions to be spread over the whole year, you would get three to one in the accounts published to January?—It would be a mere question of accident as it is now; it is a question of accident whether it is paid at one time or the other.

309. Mr. Wilson.] The great object that you have in recommending that the finance accounts should be made up to the 5th of January I understand to be, that you think the House of Commons should be in possession of the finance accounts when the discussions upon the budget take place?—Yes.

310. Will you have the goodness to tell the Committee whether the inducement for the change made by Lord Althorp, was not for the purpose of enabling the Government to vote the great services of the year before the financial year expired?—Certainly.

311. When Parliament used to meet before Christmas, and before that time, the financial year and the finance accounts of the year corresponded?—Yes; but, but, as far as I know, with the exception of some possible cases of a pressing nature, such as the funding of Exchequer Bills, a loan or a vote for some unexpected casualty which required to be provided for, there has been very little financial business done in the November sittings; they were generally speaking for other purposes than financial purposes during many years past.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

30 May 1856.

312. Before 1832, when the change was made, and when the accounts corresponded with regard to the period of the year to which they were made up, the same inconvenience existed with regard to the period at which the budget was made, that the accounts were not before Parliament, as will exist now, when they are made up to a different period?—If the budget was voted in the November Session that objection would apply.

313. If the financial statement were made in February or March, before the finance accounts were completed and laid before Parliament, the inconvenience to which you refer now must have existed?—In any case in which the financial statement was made before the finance accounts were rendered that inconvenience would arise, but in every case that I remember the demand for the financial account was not unfrequent on the part of such Members as were interested in the financial condition of the country; they asked, when shall we have the financial accounts.

314. Has it not been the case, of late years, that the financial statement of the year has been frequently made before the usual period at which the finance accounts made up to the 5th of January were placed upon the table of the House?—I cannot exactly bring these dates together since I left the House of Commons, 17 years ago. When I was there, I state it to my own blame, the real fault was delaying the financial statement too long; but the object of Lord Althorp's arrangement was consistent with having the financial accounts on the table before the statement was made.

315. Are you not aware that, within the last 10 years, the financial statement of the year has frequently been made sometimes in the month of February, frequently in the month of March, and very frequently before the finance accounts have been before Parliament?—No doubt in several of those years many reasons will occur to the honourable gentleman at once, why the financial statement should have been made at those periods. When great changes of financial administration were impending, the finance minister (I take as an example the case of Sir Robert Peel in 1842), felt it to be his duty, with or without the financial papers, to bring forward the measures which he intended to recommend to The House. But if I remember right, special explanatory papers were prepared and presented by the Government. The case to which I refer, of Sir Robert Peel, was like the case of the breaking out of a war, that might set ordinary rules wholly at defiance; and you were compelled to view the matter as a whole and bring forward your proposition when the country required it at your hands without any avoidable delay.

316. Mr. Cardwell.] The year 1845 being one of those years was also a year in which increased Navy Estimates were proposed, and still the financial statement was made as early as the month of February?—Yes.

317. Mr. Wilson.] I hold in my hand a statement of the period at which the finance accounts have been delivered to Parliament in each year since 1839, and I find April 25, April 29, April 28, April 20, May 1, April 27, April 28, April 29, May 5, May 2, May 7, May 18, May 3, May 13, May 7, May 24. That is for every year from 1839 to 1854, the earliest of the whole being the 25th of April, and a great number running into May, and one as late as the 24th of May. During the whole of those years, the finance statement having been made almost invariably in the month of March, sometimes in the month of February, and at the latest I believe in the first or second week of April, the finance accounts being delivered at the dates which I have read, could be of no service in discussions upon the budget?—Not at that time; but as it is stated that the papers were delivered in all those cases in the month of April or May during the Session, you have to compare that system with the delivery last year, on the 6th of October, after Parliament had risen; I should unhesitatingly differ from the suggestion involved in the question, whilst I admit that the delivery of the financial accounts is important previous to the financial statement. I do not deny that there is also great benefit from having them on the table in April and May, in place of not being in the hands of Members till after the prorogation.

318. But not for the purpose of discussing the Budget, when brought forward?—Not in that event, undoubtedly.

319. You

319. You have contrasted the dates under the old system with the 6th of October of last year: now have I not already stated that, last year, being the first year, was an exception, and that in the present year, and in future, the Treasury will undertake that the finance accounts shall be in the hands of Members, made up to the 30th of April, on the last week of May or first week in June?—That is a great improvement as compared with the postponement of the finance accounts to the close of the Session; but I still think that it would be infinitely better to have the finance accounts in the hands of Members when finance questions are discussed.

320. Seeing that, even under the old system, the finance accounts have not been in the hands of Members at the time of the Budget, or for some time afterwards, is it not a great object, in making that uniform, that a week or two longer than the old term may be taken for the purpose of presenting the finance accounts?—No doubt it lessens the inconvenience; it is a certain inconvenience, one way or the other. For those who consider an early communication of the facts contained in the finance accounts to Parliament as the first great object, that is the point to be gained. On the other hand, for the convenience of getting a coincidence between the financial transactions of the year and the financial accounts of the year, there is another very great object to be gained, namely, comparing the one with the other. It is not for me, but for the Committee, to draw the balance between the two systems.

321. Mr. Henley.] If an account made up to April be presented within two months, an account made up to January can equally be presented within two months?—Yes.

322. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Do you believe these accounts to be incorrect?—They are incorrect in this sense: the Treasury, with full authority, and being well advised, prescribed certain heads of account, under which all Exchequer payments were to be entered. I was under the obligation of complying with the order of the Treasury, my compliance with which came within their cognisance. By removing from my department the duty of making up of those accounts, and not sending the proof sheets of the account in question to be looked over, as was usual, to aid the Treasury in giving a correct return, the Treasury were enabled without my knowledge to alter the heads of account, and render these accounts after their own fashion; and consequently there is a discrepancy between the accounts which they furnish, and the accounts which I am bound to furnish, yet both are made under the same Treasury authority; a variation being made in the finance accounts by the Treasury, not communicated to me, and I being compelled in one case by Act of Parliament, and in another by Treasury order, to give the account just as it stands in my books. Therefore you will be all led astray, as I was, from the difficulty of reconciling two accounts; both made in relation to the same office, both under the same authority of the Treasury itself, and yet those accounts differing in several points.

323. What is the account to which your Lordship refers?—I take this as being the latest account to which I can refer; it is the first account after the change, the second account, that for the present year not being yet furnished.

324. Will you state precisely what it is that you object to in this mode of rendering the accounts?—The date is 1854–5; the year ending 31st of March 1855. I allude to the finance accounts. Here is my Exchequer account for the same period, to the year 1854–5, in like manner. My account is always rendered before the finance accounts, because it is simpler, and is much more easily completed, without claiming merit for any great diligence.

325. Is that an account rendered to Parliament by the Comptroller of the Exchequer?—Yes, under the Act of Parliament 4 & 5 Vict. c. 15.

326. And made up to the 5th of January?—No, it is made up to the 31st of March; the two are in this point identical. But placing those two documents before you, you find they differ; that is not right.

327. In what respects do they differ?—They differ, first, with respect to the mode in which you class the expenditure; I am not saying your new classification may not be better than the old; it may be worse; but no directions were given that there should be a similar alteration made in the system of the other accounts; therefore in that respect they differ; and in that respect they exhibit various modifications. But if the Committee will allow me, I will give them, in place of going verbally through them, which would be very difficult, a memorandum, showing the points of difference in the two accounts, upon which which they can examine me further; that will be more satisfactory to them than if I gave them a viva voce answer upon that account. I give you now from my account, to support this evidence, the surplus fees of regulated public offices; in page 2 is one head of account. There is, in the same page 2, Imprest Monies, &c. You will find in the finance accounts those two heads, but you will find that there are different sums annexed to them; that arises from the Treasury having varied the manner in which they class their accounts from the manner in which they directed me to class my receipts, and therefore there is a want of coincidence between the two accounts.

328. Mr. Wilson.] That has nothing to do with the dates at which the accounts are made up; the two have no connexion with each other?—They seem to me to have every possible connexion. If the Treasury adhere to the old plan, before the account is rendered relating to the Exchequer and other departments, and when the account is printed in proof send them to the departments for their observation, they will get the two accounts coincident, the one explanatory of the other; but if the two accounts are made up quite separately, upon different principles, and yet are intended to communicate knowledge to Parliament of the same transactions, it is quite clear the result is not knowledge, but confusion. This I attribute to the haste with which these accounts are made up.

329. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] I understand you to say that there is a difference between the two Exchequer accounts, one rendered by the Exchequer, and one in the finance accounts, but that they both relate to the same period of time, and therefore they are not in any way affected by the question of the date up to which the finance accounts are made?—The connexion, I take the liberty of suggesting, is such, that if you hurry the performance of these duties too much, for the purpose of overtaking, as it were, your financial statement, you will have these errors continually recurring in such a complicated system as this. I am comparing accounts made up to January with those made up to April; the latter must necessarily be more hurried.

330. Do you state that there are any errors in the Exchequer account as presented by the Treasury?—I do mean to say distinctly that if the right honourable gentleman will turn to page 34, the account of miscellaneous receipts paid into the Exchequer in the year ended the 31st of March 1855, under the heads after-mentioned, if you compare that with my account, it does not concur with the facts or with my accounts; this leads to confusion; and it seems to me that these heads of account and entries are so confused by the mode in which they are stated, that they lead Parliament astray, as they would lead the department itself astray without much attention.

331. I understand from your statement that the classification of the items is different, so that the amounts opposite the different items do not agree; but is that difference owing to error, or is the difference owing to different principles of classification having been adopted in the two accounts?—A different system of classification was adopted in the two departments leading to that inconsistency, both systems being under Treasury direction; I have also shown to the Committee, page 39—this is the account of repayments of advances made out of the Consolidated Fund for purchases of bullion, &c, in which we are bound to set out the Acts of Parliament under which all those purchases are made—from the hurry and want of check which the former system would have given, those Acts of Parliament are set out erroneously in the finance accounts, and consequently misapprehension exists. I give this example out of several before me. But it is a very inconvenient thing that a public document issuing from a public department should not recite the Acts of Parliament with accuracy.

332. How does the present system lead to hurry in the preparation of the finance accounts; I thought I understood you to complain that there had been great delay in the presentation of the finance accounts?—The complaint I made was, that if you have to make up your accounts to the 5th of April and are bound to have them printed and in the hands of Members in time for the financial discussions in Parliament, you must be inevitably more hurried in doing your work than if the financial accounts are made up to January, and you have the power of looking at them, and seeing that they are correct before you furnish them. That hurried execution can hardly be consistent with accuracy.

333. You attribute what you consider errors in the Finance account of payments into Exchequer to which you refer, to hurry and confusion, and not to any any intention of exhibiting the account in different forms?—I am sure they had no such intention of creating this confusion. I think there was great inconsiderateness in making the change; with respect to the Exchequer account, without communicating simultaneously to the parties who were responsible for making up the account in the Exchequer, and the inconvenience which has arisen from that is, that you have two separate accounts differing from each other, yet purporting to represent the same transactions. Suppose an account made from the Bank of England by Act of Parliament, and a similar account required from the Treasury; if they were not made upon the same principle, where would be the use of calling for those accounts at all, if the object were to compare them?

334. Mr. Cardwell.] Those are two different things; the one thing you point to is the Treasury Instruction given to your Lordship's office to prepare the account in one shape, whereas by the Act of Parliament you are compelled to make the account in another shape?—The fact is this: by the late change the Treasury prepared their own accounts on one principle; at the same time they directed me to act, and communicated to me in relation to my accounts on another principle; up to the period of this change both accounts were made up upon the same principle, therefore the one admitted of comparison with the other. An alteration has thus been made in the mode in which the Treasury accounts are made up, without any corresponding direction to the Exchequer in relation to the same account, the account being in both cases the payments into the Exchequer, and the result is that the accounts are conflicting and not coincident; and I am afraid that if you precipitate the preparation of these accounts you may have inconveniences of the same kind recurring again.

335. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Assuming that the errors arising from hurry and confusion are avoided, do you disapprove of the difference in form between the Treasury mode of presenting the Exchequer account and your own mode of presenting the Exchequer account?—My own mode is the Treasury mode; it is not my own mode, it is the mode in which I am instructed to make that account, and I have no power of departing from it.

336. I thought I understood you to say that there was a difference between the items in your account and the items in the finance accounts?—Yes.

337. From what cause does that arise?—It arises in consequence of the act of the Treasury, whose instructions had originally been given to their own department and to mine to make up the account in the same manner; subsequent instructions seem to have issued to their own department to make up these Finance Accounts in one manner, whilst I am left under the former authority in respect to the Exchequer accounts, by which means the two accounts do not concur; and any Member comparing these two accounts would have no small difficulty to reconcile them, or to make them intelligible.

338. Do you think it desirable that they should exactly concur?—Most assuredly I do, and always have done so. They purport to represent the same transactions. These accounts of payments had been uniformly given upon the responsibility of the Comptroller-general to the Treasury, the Treasury have the full power of vouching every one statement contained in that account; but it is furnished by the department immediately cognisant of the facts, the head of which department is bound to subscribe the account and is responsible, and it is furnished to the Treasury, under whose direction the account has been prepared.

339. Chairman.] Is not it a great inconvenience, that when the two accounts are presented they should not be under similar heads, so that there can be some comparison made between them?—It is essential, I should conceive; for instance, if you required accounts to be made by the Customs and laid before Parliament, and that accounts of Customs were furnished by the Treasury on another plan, the two returns would be conflicting; you would not make them intelligible.

340. Under the Exchequer Act your Lordship furnishes an account to Parliament of the financial year; will you state what the balance is in the Exchequer at the termination, the 31st of March 1856?—The balance standing to the credit on the account of Her Majesty's Exchequer at the Bank of England as certified to me by Mr. Marshall, the chief cashier, was 5,802,623 l. 15 s. 10 d.; that is including both the Exchequer account and the Exchequer credit account.

341. That does not include the Bank of Ireland account?—No.

30 May 1856.

342. What is the sum total of the account?—The sum total of the income at the Bank of Ireland at that period was 1,283,574 l. 9 s. 10 d.

343. What does that amount to, adding the two together?—£. 7,086,198. 5 s. 8 d.

344. Your Lordship's statement of the balances in the Exchequer does not appear to tally with the balances of the Exchequer which the Treasury give; can you give any explanation of that difference?—There is an item of credits in the one and not in the other. The Committee will observe that the balance at the Bank of England on the 31st of March consists of two items: the one is the balance of income which remains to the Exchequer account, properly so called; that is, an account which can only be drawn upon by my warrants as Comptroller-general of the Exchequer. But beyond that there is another balance, which lies at the Bank of England, which is the balance of Exchequer credits, namely, sums which are placed by my warrants at the disposal of certain classes of public accountants, and which have been drawn out of the Exchequer balance, but which still stand at what is called the Exchequer credit account; this is a sum upon which the Comptroller-general can no longer draw, but on which the accountants, to whom the credits are granted, can draw. Therefore it is formed of unexpended issues, and to find the amount unexpended you must add to the Exchequer balance (which is to my account) the balance of Exchequer credits which have been passed from me, and which are at the account of the separate accountants to whom they go, principally to the paymaster.

345. Do you include that in your accounts?—Yes.

346. Then your account is framed upon different principles from the balance sheet account?—Yes, in that respect it is; the balance-sheet only states the balance of my Exchequer account, excluding the Exchequer credit account.

347. Mr. Wilson.] They must necessarily be different, must they not?—Yes; that is not a discrepancy of error, but only a natural way of stating in the balance sheet the money which is unissued from the Exchequer, and which remains there available for the public service.

348. Your annual Exchequer account shows and can only show the sum of money standing to the Exchequer account, upon which you have not issued any credits, and therefore, is still at your disposal?—In my annual Exchequer account I am bound to state the balance at the Bank of England and the Bank of Ireland on the 31st of March.

349. Belonging to the Exchequer?—No, pardon me. I am bound to state both balances; they are stated here, but under different heads. Balance of income, that is, income lying to the Exchequer account, 4,319,573 l. 19 s. 5 d. I am also bound to state the balance of credits, 1,483,049 l.; giving a total of 5,802,000 l., and thus coinciding with the Bank of England certificate.

350. Is there not a further account in the Bank of England, belonging to the public, which you are not bound to state, and of which you have no cognisance; that is, the cash account?—Yes, I know nothing of the Paymaster's accounts, the cash account, the drawing, or the bill account; the Committee will recollect that my control begins and ends with my own Exchequer account. When monies pass out of the Exchequer account, I am no longer responsible.

351. Therefore there is no reason of that kind, possibly, but that the balance appearing in your Exchequer account should correspond with the balance which appears in the general balance sheet of the year?—Certainly not, because those sums are still available.

352. Mr. Henley.] Will you refer to page two of the Exchequer account. There I find that the balances are contained under two heads, credits granted but not drawn, and income. The income amounts to the sum of 3,227,409 l. for Great Britain, and 740,593 l. for Ireland; the gross available income of the two countries being 3,968,000 l. some odd shillings and pence, in the Banks of England and Ireland on the 31st of March 1856. Those were the balances in March 1855?—Yes.

353. Can you explain why the same statements of the balances in the Exchequer in this account of the balances of public monies, under the head of Balances in the Exchequer of England and Ireland, amount to a different sum, being 3,949,774 l. instead of 3,968,000 l.?—I cannot explain it without reference to the books. I know it is precisely the sum I have, because the voucher for that sum is the receipt I have from the Banks of England and Ireland; therefore, in as far as the vouchers are concerned, there could be no other sum stated. This is the account made up at the Treasury, and I cannot (above all since since the heads have been varied in some respects) reconcile many of the entries in these accounts.

354. Is not it desirable that exactly the sum stated, as being the balance in the Exchequer at a particular date, should correspond in the account furnished by the Treasury, and that furnished by you?—Precisely so; and this is one of the inconsistencies which I have adverted to in my evidence previously.

355. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] How does that inconsistency arise?—I shall be able perhaps to explain it, if required, on examination; but I know that this account of mine must necessarily be correct, because it is founded upon the actual certificates of the two Banks of England and Ireland, and so does not admit of an error.

356. Did not you say you had adverted to it in your previous evidence; and you probably connected it with some other circumstance?—I believe I can answer that question now, but you will get it better from a Treasury officer. I believe the form of making up the Treasury account is, that the Treasury considers a sum charged upon the Consolidated Fund as a sum issued, and I do not. I reckon as the balance in my account everything that is there, and I cannot diminish that balance by the possible claims upon it. This is prescribed to me by law.

357. Has that always been the practice, with regard to that mode of stating the account in the Treasury and in the Exchequer, or is it owing to any recent change?—I am not aware how it has been done in the Treasury. I have not pursued the subject, because, from the circumstances which I state, I have felt some difficulty in reconciling the two classes of accounts, and as I have no authority to correct the one, and I know that the other is correct, I have no motive to go into the discussion.

358. Mr. Henley.] There is a discrepancy between the balance at the end of the year as well as the beginning, putting the credits aside; the cash balances in the end of the year, according to the Treasury account, amount to 5,600,621 l.; your cash balances do not amount to that sum?—Possibly, if I am right in this surmise, which is only a surmise, that if there is that different mode in the Treasury of stating the account, it would apply to the second balance at the close as well as at the beginning. I should suggest that that is a question which it would be better to put to the Treasury. I only know that agreeably to the evidence now before the Committee, upon the certificates of the Bank itself, my statement of the balance is accurate and correct.

359. May I ask your opinion as to whether the accounts published in the Treasury, under precisely the same heading, and the accounts published by the Exchequer with the same heading, ought, or ought not, for the public convenience, to correspond?—I think they ought to correspond upon the principle upon which the account is made out, unless it is immaterial that the one account should furnish a check upon the other.

360. Comparatively they are of less use to the public than they otherwise would be?—Yes.

361. Mr. Williams.] With respect to those two accounts, do they relate to the payment of precisely the same money?—Precisely the same.

362. But they differ on account of the items being placed under different heads; how is the difference in the gross amount accounted for?—There is a difference in the balance stated at the commencement and at the close. I have stated the principle of my account, namely, upon the certificates of the Banks of England and Ireland. I can only return the balance they certify to me; that I have returned, and that is a check upon my previous payments.

363. Your balance is the balance of the Bank of England, the bankers of the Government, in point of fact?—The balance I furnish is that which the two Banks furnish to me with their certificate. That I apply to my own accounts as they stand stated in detail. I know what the balance is which my own accounts will furnish me, and that coinciding with the certificate of the Bank that that is the balance in their hands, I get a check which shows me that my account in detail, and their own account in the gross, are both correct.

364. They are so checked that there can be no question about it?—No.

365. Therefore if there be any incorrectness, it is in the other statement?—I do not suggest incorrectness as meaning a mistake; the account may be made up on a different principle.

366. Mr. Wilson.] The certificate from the Banks of England and Ireland refers only to the Exchequer account?—It furnishes me with an account, not only only of the Exchequer account, but also of the Exchequer credits, which have already gone from my account of balance of income.

30 May 1856.

367. That is only still in reference to the Exchequer account?—Yes; but the Exchequer account and the Exchequer credit account are two totally different things; the one is an account standing in my own name, and upon which no other authority but my own warrant will act; the second is an account which has been parted from my general account, and which is carried to another credit, upon which other parties are legally entitled to act; they have the same power of acting upon the Exchequer credit account by law that I have of acting upon the Exchequer account.

368. By the certificates which are furnished by the Banks of England and Ireland, do you refer only to the Exchequer account in those two Banks of monies unissued, standing to your account, and of monies unissued upon the credits you have granted upon your account?—Precisely.

369. But that does not refer to any other monies which may be standing to other accounts belonging to the Government?—Certainly not.

370. Therefore it is not a certificate of the amount of monies standing in the Banks of England and Ireland to the credit of the Government, but simply an Exchequer account in those two capacities to which I have adverted?—Yes; neither do I conceive that account is, or can ever be, an account showing the balance of all that the Bank holds on account of the Government; this is the balance in the Exchequer, namely, general Exchequer balance; the particulars are given here—(see 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 15, s. 10)—4,319,573 l. 19 s. 5 d.; but neither account would furnish an account of all the Government monies; it would not, for example, furnish an account of the monies that stand to the account of the Receivers-general of the revenue.

371. Chairman.] The balance is 7,086,198 l. 5 s. 8 d.; you report that in the Exchequer?—Yes.

372. If, therefore, the Treasury account adds to that any monies which the paymaster may have upon his cash balance, that of course will be so much increase?—Yes.

373. As I understand it, this account, so far from furnishing a larger balance, is pretty nearly 2,000,000 l. underneath. The balance is stated to be 5,600,000 l.?—Yes.

374. Mr. Henley.] The balance upon the Exchequer account is 5,603,000 l., taking the credits out?—Yes.

375. Chairman.] Deducting the credits, still the Exchequer account is 3,000 l. more than the other?—Yes; I believe I can now explain this. I find that there are certain sums strictly appropriated sums with which the Government quâ Government have no concern; they are to go to particular purposes, and to be kept as particular accounts. Dunleary Harbour, the Royal Exchange in Dublin, the Inns of Court at Dublin, do not enter into the account; they are excluded, such as they are; it is that difference of balance which is not dealt with as being a matter of public revenue.

376. Mr. Wilson.] Your balance includes not only monies actually in the Exchequer account at the time, but the unissued portions of credit you have given upon that account?—Precisely so.

377. This balance, and the quarterly balance sheet, is a balance upon the Consolidated Fund which has been unappropriated, and is applicable to the payments of dividends or any other charges upon the Consolidated Fund at that moment only?—I believe that may be the case, but I should rather leave this for distinct explanation, for that will not resolve the whole matter.

378. Is not this the balance on the evening at the close of the quarter in the Consolidated Fund applicable to the payments of dividends and other charges upon the Consolidated Fund, and when the account is made up of the payments of the quarter chargeable upon the Consolidated Fund the excess is the balance of the quarter in favour of the Consolidated Fund; or the deficiency, if there is a deficiency, is the amount of deficiency bills, in order to make up the amount?—It may be so, but I cannot give a distinct answer upon that subject without taking into account the small causes not included in the question put, and producing a discrepancy between the one and the other account.

379. They are two entirely different accounts, and have no necessary relation to each other?—One is the Treasury account, made for the purpose of satisfying an Act, and the other is my annual account, made according to an Act which directs directs me to give an account of what is lying at the Bank to the Exchequer credit, 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 15, s. 23.

380. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] The balance of the Treasury account shows exactly the unappropriated balance in favour of the public, whereas the Exchequer account shows also other monies which are confounded with that balance?—Yes; the Committee will see that I am bound to return as balance everything that stands to my account; I have no choice about that.

381. Mr. Williams.] From your Lordship's long experience, do you not think that it would be a matter of great convenience to the House of Commons if the estimates were presented immediately after the assembling of Parliament, and that no part of those estimates should be voted without having the financial statement or the Budget presented to the House?—I think it is very difficult to make the rule absolute in that respect; I believe, as a general principle, it is of the first importance for the convenience of the public, specially for the convenience of the Government and for the public information out-of-doors, that you should proceed with your estimates and vote your money as soon as ever you can, and I believe that every Government desires to do it if they are able. I think, for that purpose, they ought to have the estimates and the financial accounts as early as they can, but if you make the rule absolute upon that subject you may throw yourselves into very great difficulties. It is like the question of breaking-up at 12 o'clock at night. Cases will occur in which it would be so inconvenient that you cannot make it an invariable rule. And in like manner, with reference to the financial statement of the year, take the contingencies of war. You could not bring forward your financial statement for the year at a fixed date without at times exposing yourselves to compromise materially the diplomatic relations between England and other countries; but as a general principle, reserving particular cases, the question put by the Honourable Member is one which I must answer in the affirmative.

382. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Do you think that it would be desirable or constitutional to open the Budget, and to propose the ways and means of the year, before any votes of supply have been taken, and that the whole of the expenditure of the year should rest merely upon the estimates presented by Government to the House of Commons before a single vote in supply had been taken?—Certainly not; I consider the question to refer to the general commencement of the annual financial business. The first step to be taken of course is to vote the supplies, because until you know what you are called on to spend it is in vain to discuss with any effect the taxes which are required; therefore in that sense no doubt your votes of supply are your first duty, and your most pressing duty; I considered the question to have regard to the whole system of finance. You cannot pay until you have your ways and means voted. You must get a Ways and Means Act, without which your votes in supply are inoperative. I need not tell the gentlemen to whom I am talking that appropriation does not rest solely upon the final Appropriation Act, it rests upon every Ways and Means Act which passes during the Session, each of which is an Appropriation Act in itself, under which there is a power given to the Government to issue upon votes of the House of Commons, thus combining the general power of the Legislature, which is required for paying money, and the specific mode in which, before the final appropriation, the Exchequer is justified in paying upon votes of the House of Commons.

383. I understood the proposition to be, that the annual financial statement, commonly called the Budget, should be made to Parliament before any votes were taken in Committee of Supply; does your Lordship assent to that doctrine?—No, certainly not; you must propose your finance as soon as possible; the first step is voting the supply, and the next the means of payment.

384. Is it not a constitutional doctrine, that every vote in Committee of Ways and Means is founded upon the previous vote in Committee of Supply?—Yes, and it is carried so far, and justly so, that the House of Commons, except from inadvertence, is bound never to vote one penny in the shape of ways and means, whether from the Consolidated Fund or from Exchequer bills, to an amount exceeding the sum which, at the period of the Ways and Means Resolution, has been already voted by The House; the latter is only to cover the vote in supply.

385. Mr. Wilson.] Is it not the case that it is my business, as Secretary of the Treasury, to see that a sufficient amount of Ways and Means Bills are always granted to carry on the public service; and is it not the duty of the Speaker of the House of Commons to see that I never take ways and means for one shilling more than has been already granted in Committee of Supply?—No doubt that is the principle; it has sometimes been forgotten, but those are exceptional cases.

386. Mr. Williams.] My object in putting the question which I did to your Lordship was this, I think there is great inconvenience in the delay that takes place in the presentation of the estimates. The estimates are presented in part before the budget, and in part subsequently to the budget; so that, in point of fact, the House of Commons never knows, as a whole, what is the amount of money required. It appears to me that it would be a matter of great convenience if the House of Commons had the whole of the estimates laid before it, and then had a statement from the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to how he meant to provide the money for the payment of those estimates, before the estimates are voted; I think that would be a constitutional principle?—I believe there is an order of the House of Commons at present fixing a time for the presentation of the estimates, and in relation to the three great services, they generally are presented at an early period. There may be occasions when a supplementary estimate is necessary, even for the three great services. In respect to the miscellaneous services, I know from experience that it is infinitely more difficult on the part of the Government to get them all in in time; but, I believe, in respect to them, as in respect to the great estimates, the sooner they are got in the better, and the sooner they are voted the better; but I do not mean in the slightest degree to state or infer any opinion that until estimates are voted, The House can proceed to supply the ways and means of the year. The estimate must come first, and the ways and means follow; and it is upon a Ways and Means Act ordinarily the budget explanation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is given, although this is not the case invariably.

387. Reference has been made to an expenditure on the part of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests; your Lordship is aware that a very large amount is annually expended out of the revenues of the Crown, by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, without the authority of Parliament?—I believe that what is incident to the management of the property is so expended. I cannot speak with any very great accuracy about this, as great changes have taken place in the management of the Woods and Forests since I ceased to be concerned in the financial business of the country. I believe that considerable improvements have taken place, but still my impression is that the amount required for the administration of those landed estates is expended without a Parliamentary vote.

388. Is it not your Lordship's opinion that the sanction of Parliament ought to be given to that expenditure by means of estimates?—My own opinion is that inasmuch as the revenue, during the lifetime of the Sovereign becomes part of the actual state revenue, and as its administration consequently stands in the same relation with the administration of the charges of collecting the remaining revenue, or in administering the Post-office, Parliament has as good a right to ask for estimates in the one case as in the other. I stated my difficulties, however, with respect to uncertainty pervading those estimates in themselves, but the income is part of the revenue, and the rule ought to apply in common to both branches, if it can be done effectually, which I venture to doubt.

389. Sir H. Willoughby.] It is stated that the general principle is that all revenue shall be paid into the Exchequer account over which you have the control; is not the Woods and Forests Department an exception to that rule?—It is an exception in practice.

390. Can you state to the Committee to what extent it is an exception?—No, I cannot; but I presume that in the Parliamentary inquiries which have taken place since I left the House of Commons, namely, Reports and Inquiries upon the Woods and Forests, that is probably shown. There is a certain statement made in the financial accounts upon the subject of the disbursements after they have taken place, but the capital account is not contained in those accounts.

391. In the last financial account in 1855, are you aware that it does appear that a sum of more than 96,000*l.* was paid by the Woods and Forests without that money in any way coming to the Exchequer?—There was a considerable sum; the amount is probably stated with accuracy by the Honourable Member, but it will appear upon the face of the finance accounts; that is substantially correct I have no doubt; in page 32 I find an account of payments out of the monies monies arisen from Her Majesty's Woods other than charges of collection: that is stated for the year, mentioning, amongst other things, ancient pensions and payments to schools, churches, &c., 106,000*l.*; that of course the Committee know is not voted, though it is stated to Parliament, and it is separated from the charges of collection, properly so called, which enter into another head.

392. Therefore it is not true that the revenues received by the Department of Woods and Forests are accounted for to the Exchequer?—No: there is a certain sum which is paid in to the Exchequer, and which is charged in my Exchequer account, but that is a net amount, and not a gross amount.

393. Mr. Bowyer.] Is it a fixed sum paid into the Exchequer?—No; it varies from time to time; at the commencement of the reign of William the Fourth, if I remember right, there were very considerable charges arising out of sums advanced for building the new street, and for other improvements; pending the repayment of those sums the amount paid into the Exchequer was less; as those charges have been paid off the amount has increased.

394. Sir H. Willoughby.] Is it not the fact that the Department of Woods and Forests pay to the Exchequer account annually such balance as seems fit to the Treasury?—Yes, such balance as seems fit to the Treasury; but I can say from experience when I was at the Treasury, that the Treasury applies a very strong inducement every now and then to make the Woods and Forests pay up a little more than they might have originally intended.

395. Can you state the sum that was paid into the Exchequer account in the year 1855?—It was 272,571*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.*

396. Therefore in point of fact, in that year 272,000*l.* odd was paid into the Exchequer account, and according to the finance account 106,000*l.* was paid by the department, exclusive of the costs of collection?—Yes.

397. Mr. Peacocke.] Are there any sufficient reasons why the Woods and Forests should stand upon this exceptional footing?—I can only tell you what influenced my mind in not having made any alteration in this respect. The management of large estates scattered about England is an exceedingly expensive sort of thing, very difficult to effect, and very little susceptible, so far as I was always led to imagine, of correct estimate beforehand. That certainly was an impression left upon my mind; but since that time, now 17 years back, there has been a full inquiry into the matter, and I should rather refer to those reports that have been made, than to anything that I could say now from memory.

398. Would not the Woods and Forests in that case be almost analogous to the Ordnance, which has also a vast number of local payments and businesses to be carried on?—I think that local payments of the Ordnance are much more capable of being estimated for than the expense of management of scattered landed property. I believe every one dealing with scattered landed property knows how difficult it is to form estimates for its management.

399. Mr. Wilson.] The gross income according to the accounts now before the Committee of the Land Revenue is 383,758*l.* Of that 272,000*l.* has been paid into the Exchequer, 16,000*l.* has been expended for management, and 106,000*l.* has been expended under five heads. With regard to the 16,000*l.* of management, there might be no difficulty in estimating that?—No; so far as it consists of salaries and allowances.

400. The next item is 8,263*l.*, ancient pensions and payments to schools and churches; there would be no difficulty in estimating that?—No.

401. The next item is salaries to rangers, wardens, and keepers, 2,794*l.*; there would be no difficulty in estimating that?—No difficulty that I should think insurmountable.

402. The next two items, one amounting to 44,000*l.* odd, and the other 49,000*l.* odd, making 94,000*l.* together, consists of "Payments for improvements and repairs on Crown estates, and for property tax, land and other taxes, payable and allowances to Crown tenants," and for "Payments for repairing and maintaining buildings, walls, fences, and roads, and for making inclosures and plantations in the Royal forests, &c. (including Windsor and Bagshot), and upon estates of the Crown reserved for the purpose of raising navy timber, together with rates and taxes charged thereon." From your great experience in the Treasury, and the management of this property, which is under Treasury control, do you think it would be possible to foresee in the management of a huge estate, yielding a rental of 383,000*l.* divided all over the country, the arrangements that must be made from day to day, from week to week, and from from month to month with the whole of those tenants, with regard to new leases to be granted, new farm buildings to be erected as the conditions of the leases, and the various other improvements which include in the present year 94,000 l., and would it be possible to estimate such an expense as that?—It was on that ground that this species of expenses seemed to me to be so incapable of any accurate a priori estimate, that I do not think it could be provided for in the ordinary way. It must be left, I think, to the department, subject to the control of the Treasury, the Treasury here having a distinct interest to control it strictly, because in proportion to the correctness of its own control it brings a larger sum into its own exchequer, and it is a case in which the Treasury has a direct interest in making the control as correct as possible.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

403. From your experience at the Treasury, are not you aware that this sort of thing happens every day or week, perhaps that the Commissioner who has charge of the land revenues, sends a communication to the Treasury stating that such and such a farm is out of lease, and proposing to relet it to a certain tenant, who offers certain conditions, provided he will make certain roads or carry out certain drainage; all of which will pay good interest, if he asks the Treasury sanction for those improvements to be effected?—Yes. I have no doubt it is so.

404. Therefore, would it not be utterly impossible to foresee the expense which might be entailed by such improvements, in order to make any estimate which would be worth anything for the guidance of Parliament?—I believe that is likely to be the case.

405. Sir H. Willoughby.] You have heard a number of items lumped together in those two payments, amounting to 93,000 l. Is there any necessity for putting together various items of that different character in one lump?—I think there is not only no necessity, but very considerable objection; and having stated the difficulty of giving an estimate, I think it becomes all the more essential that you should require and have the closest and most accurate account. If you are left without a sufficient check in the way of estimate, which I believe to be the case, you ought to have a great and salutary check in the shape of the account rendered, and it should be rendered in detail, and not clubbing together so many different branches of expenditure.

406. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Is it not the fact that that detailed account is now rendered in the annual report of the Commissioners of Woods?—I have referred already to the changes that have been made with respect to the reports and accounts rendered. I believe that they have been greatly improved since I had cognizance of them. I have not for some years had occasion to examine the details of the annual reports, to which I beg to refer the Committee.

407. Mr. Peacocke.] Do you think that there are no means of making an estimate of the average expense of managing a varying amount of property?—I think that it would be exceedingly difficult, with respect to one's own property; I have sought it very often, and have not succeeded very well; but in a property like the Crown property, which is scattered in many places, the difficulty is still greater, which leads to the very large question, whether it is desirable to keep possession of the smaller parcels of land at all; I believe it to be very difficult to do it advantageously. Not having English property of my own, I cannot say how far it is better done in this country than in Ireland. I know that, in Ireland, many small properties of the Crown have been sold greatly to the advantage of the Crown estates and the public. In Ireland the management is greatly improved.

408. Mr. Williams.] The items stated by the Honourable Member for Westbury do not materially differ from the items which you see in the Army and Ordnance Estimates especially: and perhaps your Lordship will be kind enough to say where the difficulty lies of making an estimate of those items which occur every year in those accounts. They do not very materially differ; but perhaps some alteration might be made in them, if they were subjected to the revision of Parliament?—I think the difference would be obvious if you compare the items of expense for the management of a great estate and the expense of works carried on by the Ordnance. The one seems to be much more susceptible of previous inquiry and of estimate than the other.

409. Mr. Henley.] I think the gross amount of the annual revenue is something less than 400,000 l.; we have given a sum here of 94,000 l., approaching to

to a fourth part of the whole, which is stated to be expenses which cannot be estimated; do you think, in your experience of private landed estates, that parties would submit to a deduction of one-fourth of the amount of the rental, without its being able to be estimated beforehand?—No, not to that extent. But I do not think that the analogy is quite accurate between landed estates and estates of the Crown, which are so very much more scattered, and in some instances are unimportant in themselves in point of income; and in proportion as a property is scattered, and in small parcels, so the expense of management must be increased; but I carefully abstain from expressing any opinion as to whether that expenditure was really required upon the property. I have no knowledge of the matter. The law does not bring this within the knowledge or control of the Exchequer. I assume, however, that there is a degree of responsibility with respect to the whole expenditure, and large sums cannot be expended arbitrarily, as I believe, or without a report from the Woods and Forests, and a consideration of those reports by the Treasury.

410. The scattered state of the property might increase the expenses of management, but it would have nothing to do with respect to the power of estimating the particular items?—Not in relation to the power of estimating the particular items, if you are able to apply as strict a supervision, or so economical an administration to an estate which is scattered in small parcels, in many places, as you would apply to an estate that lay in one place.

411. That is a question more of the difference of the expense of management; the Crown property is generally let upon lease, I believe?—Yes; but other considerations enter likewise.

412. The renewal of those leases is necessarily carried on by negotiation; before a lease is passed, the Crown, by the records, must know when those leases are about to expire; what difficulty is there in their entering into negotiations for the renewal of the leases, and having those conditions ready to put before Parliament in the shape of an estimate for new buildings and drainage, and all those items which, ordinarily speaking, form a large portion of that sum of 90,000 l.?—That an estimate might be made, I believe, but it would be rather from taking the averages of previous years, and then checking those averages by local survey and inquiry, than being quite certain at the commencement of the year what it is that you will want to expend in drainage and improvements over a vast variety of scattered lands; I feel the difficulty of it, though I cannot be confident that it amounts to an impossibility.

413. Surely the Crown agents are paid a sufficient per-centage for oversighting the estates of the Crown; what more difficulty is there for those agents to say, "This estate wants a certain sum of money laid out upon it," if they do their duty, than in the case of any agent of a gentleman of landed property?—Yes; it would be analogous to the question whether the Crown possesses it, or the Duke of Devonshire, or the Marquis of Westminster; but I doubt whether the nature of the Crown estates resemble very closely those of private parties. This I doubt.

414. The deduction is very great, 90,000 l. odd upon an income of less than 400,000 l., is not it?—It appears to me very considerable.

415. And, of course, in proportion as it appears considerable, so it would appear to be more easy to make an estimate for large expenses than for small ones?—It would be so if it were not an estimate compounded of the management of a great number of scattered properties; the difficulty would be increased not by the amount of total rental, or the area, only, but by the scattered nature of the property.

416. Are you aware whether the agents of the Crown are not paid like the agents of other persons, a per-centage for oversighting this property and acting as agents ordinarily do?—I believe they are; but at the same time, even with respect to small properties, if it is a scattered property, and you have to employ agents in different places, you have to pay a larger per-centage upon a small property than on a great one.

417. If the agents do their duty, why cannot they make an estimate of those expenses upon this property as well as in the case of private properties?—I think they could do it just exactly the same if the property is similarly circumstanced; in all cases in which you could get an accurate estimate in the management of private property, I think you could in the case of Crown property, assuming the circumstances of both to be similar.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

30 May 1856.

418. The practice of the Crown of letting land upon leases would facilitate that object more than where land is held upon a tenancy from year to year, would it not?—Really I am not sufficiently informed to give any evidence that is worth having upon that subject; I should think if you let upon leases, the difficulty arises upon the making of the lease and the condition of the lease; if it is for 14 years you settle it at the beginning of the term, whereas if you have it from year to year you may have to make a calculation every year of your transactions.

419. Its being upon lease would therefore simplify the transaction?—Yes, certainly; but there remains the question of seeing that the covenants of that lease are complied with.

420. That deduction, under the name of ancient pensions and payments of that description, is probably the amount of payment charged upon the property when it was transferred from the Crown to the general revenue of the country?—With respect to ancient pensions it must assuredly be so. With respect to the others, there may be small superannuation charges for officers, and charges of that kind. But here I may be allowed to state, with respect to those ancient pensions, that I referred on Monday to a case in which a Parliamentary power was taken to dispose of some ancient pensions upon the Crown lands, and I stated that case as a precedent and as an authority for going to Parliament upon that subject. Since then I have looked carefully into the Act which passed, and I find that that Act had a special reference as well to the power of sale as to the power of purchase. It was contemplated to deal with ecclesiastical persons, and therefore an Act of Parliament was absolutely necessary in that case, and therefore that is to be taken in connexion with the opinion which I before pronounced as to the necessity of Parliamentary interposition.

421. Chairman.] The amount of 94,000 l. is taken together, but there would be no difficulty in estimating the property tax, the land tax, and other taxes payable, would there?—Not at all.

422. Nor the rates?—I think that items contained in that second account might, with convenience, be brought into the same category as the account immediately preceding it. The variations of rate may not be great.

423. Can you bring it within an estimate at all. The more you reduce the fluctuating charge the more easy it would be to bring it within an estimate?—Certainly.

424. The payments for improvements and repairs upon the Crown estates may be expensive, but some sort of estimate may be made from the experience of former years; the Admiralty and Ordnance do estimate the amount for repairs with considerable detail?—I stated that, looking back to the past as a guide for the future, not a guide without adopting it upon inquiry and reasoning, by excluding expenses that are not likely to recur, by adding other expenses known or anticipated, you may come to an approximate estimate; but a close estimate, I think, is hardly applicable to those cases.

425. The allowances to Crown tenants may vary; but, taking a large estimate, giving margin enough, it might be done?—Yes.

426. The second item, "For repairing and maintaining buildings, walls, fences, and roads, and for making inclosures and plantations in the royal forests, &c. (including Windsor and Bagshot), and upon estates of the Crown, reserved for the purpose of raising navy timber, together with rates and taxes charged thereon," might be estimated for; that is a character of expense which might be estimated for?—In private life a man generally says, "I mean to expend so much in the improvement of my estate." In the management of the Crown estates and public expenditure, you rather say how much is wanted to be done, and afterwards provide the money for it. In private life we are limited by the money; in public, you have more latitude in extending your money to the want.

427. With regard to buildings, walls, fences, and roads, and for making inclosures and plantations in the royal forests, that is a peculiar expenditure, in which the department has originally built the walls, and had the property for a long time under their custody?—It is very possible that it might be made, upon reference to the averages of past years, an accurate return.

428. Mr. Henley.] Supposing an agent was to propose to any landed proprietor to inclose a piece of ground and plant it, the first question would be, How much will it cost to do it, and what will be the probable return; and what more difficulty would there be in the case of the Crown?—I think the cases are analogous.

429. Sir H. Willoughby.] Are you aware that practically there is no Parliamentary check at all?—I believe that to be the case, further than the annual reports to which I have adverted already.

430. Are you aware that the Woods and Forests do report annually, but that that Report is like the Finance Report, delivered at such a time that for the Session it gives no practical information upon which we can act?—I know that many reports to Parliament come very uncertain and sometimes very late, and with respect to them and the finance accounts and other Parliamentary accounts, if they come in later than is available in Parliament, they are, absolutely speaking, worthless.

431. Take the case of the 93,000 l. expenditure; if any Member of Parliament wished to question that, he must have done so in this Session for the year 1855?—Yes.

432. What information has Parliament, except through the annual Report of the Woods and Forests, of the expenditure in detail?—I believe none whatever, except the summary in the finance accounts; the Report is full of explanations and details.

433. And that arising in June, and the account being printed in the autumn, practically is not available till the next Session?—No.

434. Mr. Hankey.] And then the money would be gone?—The expenditure would have taken place.

435. Mr. Peacocke.] If there was some sort of account furnished to the House of Commons of the local expenditure in those particular districts, the local Members could criticise that expenditure, and would be able to give valuable information upon the subject?—Yes, in all cases it would be useful.

436. Mr. Bowyer.] Is it your Lordship's opinion that it would be advantageous to the public purse to sell the outlying landed estates of the Crown?—I believe wherever the size and value of the property is small, it is clearly a benefit that it should be disposed of. This has been shown in small Crown properties sold in Ireland.

437. I apprehend that some of this property near town might be sold at a great profit?—I am not competent to pronounce an opinion upon that subject.

438. Chairman.] You stated, in your examination with regard to the payments by the revenue departments, that by arrangement improvements might be made, and the exceptions which now exist be removed. Take the case of the Excise: from what you have stated to-day, I apprehend that you would feel no difficulty, if you had a list of charges of superannuations and pensions upon the Excise, in distributing those charges between the Consolidated Fund and the votes of Parliament?—None whatever.

439. If that was done there would be no difficulty in bringing that expenditure entirely under the superintendence of Parliament?—For bringing the whole under the superintendence of Parliament, and the charge which is put upon the vote of Parliament, it should be placed on supply. A charge on the Consolidated Fund secures a knowledge. But efficient control is the result of a Parliamentary vote.

440. There are some payments which are in the shape of drawbacks from the Excise revenue; do you think that they are capable of estimate or not?—I think that they are hardly capable of estimate, except in reference to the sum taken from the experience of the preceding year, with such modification as an alteration in the law may in the meanwhile have made necessary; but it is very satisfactory to see that by the legislation of past years and the diminution of the rates of duty, practically speaking, the question of drawbacks is very much diminished. The simplicity of your tariff now has, amongst other benefits, greatly relieved you from the embarrassment of heavy drawbacks; and therefore, though there must be an amount always in drawbacks, it is so little now that it is not really of any very great importance with respect to the jealousy of Parliament.

441. In the memorandum of Sir Charles Trevelyan and Mr. Anderson they seem to consider the drawbacks and repayments as really not to be revenue, and that therefore they should not come under the superintendence of Parliament; have you formed any opinion upon that subject?—I cannot consider it otherwise than in the light of revenue. The gross amount which is paid is revenue. The claim of a party for drawback is dependent upon certain things, namely, the use that he has made of the article upon which he has paid a duty.

duty. If he exports it he may claim a drawback; if it is for home consumption he pays the duty; but in all cases whatever, I consider the just and logical way of dealing with the question is to consider everything paid in as duty upon the commodity to be the duty receivable; the drawback going out of it afterwards is an entry upon the other side of the account, but it cannot alter the nature of the first payment.

442. You think that in principle the gross amount ought to be paid into the Exchequer, and then from the Exchequer, upon vote, should be paid such sum as is necessary for drawbacks and repayments?—I think if you were able to make any correct estimate of what will be required for drawbacks, you might make it as part of your estimate for the revenue departments; but I think it is a most important result that your estimate should contain as much of fact and as little of opinion as can be, to make it binding upon the Treasury or upon Parliament, and for the information of Parliament you ought to prepare the estimate with as much matter of fact as possible. Many of the allowances and drawbacks depend upon accident; in the case of malt, for instance, parties in case of accident are entitled to returns of duty; it is hardly possible to estimate that with any certainty, but my own impression is, and it has always been, that that is one of the matters which must be left payable out of gross revenue.

443. Supposing even that upon consideration it should not be considered as gross revenue, would not one of the means to get rid of the difficulties of payments not paid by the sanction of Parliament, be to enact that no payments, except payments in the shape of drawbacks and repayments, should be advanced from the revenue, except on vote?—I think that that is the principle; I do not consider it strictly attained in our revenue payments; now you assume that your making a payment in the way that you deal with a vote in a roundabout way of paying your revenue charges, you should vote upon your estimate everything that is susceptible of estimate; what is not susceptible of estimate, if it must be voted, might be, perhaps, voted as a contingent fund. Do the thing you intend to do in an open way, but do not put in the estimate anything that you are ignorant of.

444. The present system being that certain charges only are voted by Parliament, and that the power of the Treasury still exists with regard to other charges, the proposal that you would make would be that certain charges, if it were necessary, should be exempted, and that no other charge should be paid except by vote?—Precisely; that would meet the difficulty.

445. Your Lordship's attention, I have no doubt, has been paid to what is generally called Sir James Graham's Bill for the Navy. As it at present stands, the audited accounts of the Excise never came before Parliament in any shape whatever; is that so?—They do not come before Parliament.

446. The accounts that are laid before Parliament in the finance accounts are the accounts of the department itself?—They are.

447. Does your Lordship see any difficulty in the Audit Office presenting the same account with regard to the revenue department that they present with regard to the navy?—I should consider that there must be an analogy in the mode of auditing the two accounts. With respect to the object, there is the same motive having but one account audited as there is in the other, and they should alike come before Parliament.

448. At the present time the Audit Board do audit the revenue accounts; therefore there would be no difficulty on that account?—No; but bringing it before Parliament, with the observations of the auditors, in all cases, I think, ought to be a consequence of the necessity of the audit. I will give an example: my account, which is the foundation of the whole receipts and disbursements of the country, is required by Parliament to be laid before the auditors. I observe, in an important memorandum which is appended to these papers, it is stated by the Chairman of the Board of Audit, Mr. Romilly, that that account is never audited. I furnish that account every year to the auditors, and it ought to be audited, I think; because every account which is required to go to the Board of Audit I think is sent there for the purpose of being audited, and if it is sent to the Board of Audit without the object of its being audited, it seems a mere farce, almost a useless form, to transmit the account, except as to the information it gives respecting other accountants, acting as a check on them. But in relation to that account, allow me to say, in passing, that my account has this peculiarity, that no money ever reaches me or passes from me. The whole duty of my department is done by transfers, and my voucher and warrant apply to the account between me and the Bank of England and the Bank of Ireland; that is the Exchequer account.

account. Therefore I have no transactions of issue that would not be represented in my transactions in the Exchequer accounts, by transfers, and credits; by credits in the one country, and transfers in the other; but it would be most desirable in respect to that account, as every other account, if it goes to the audit, that it should be effectually audited, and to make that an effectual account the result of the audit should be laid before Parliament.

449. To return to the audit of the Excise Department, the object of Sir James Graham's Bill was to secure that no service should be charged under a wrong vote. That object would be secured by a similar receipt and expenditure account as that which is laid upon the table of the House, with respect to the army and navy and commissariat now?—Yes; it would be a very great improvement. It might be difficult, however, to apply the concurrent Appropriation Audit.

450. There is one other point. From your evidence it appears that the Exchequer is by no means acquainted with the sum that is actually received by the department. The Excise Department receives the revenue which it pays in to you from time to time, but you are not at all aware what are the sums which the Excise Receivers-general have in their hands?—Not in the least.

451. Those payments are made into the Bank, are they not?—Those payments I consider to be made by the Receiver-general of the Excise Department. The Receiver-general receives the money; he transfers it to the Bank, but whether that money is the money which I ought to receive or not, except the certificate of the department, I have no other evidence.

452. The Receiver-general of the Excise keeps his account at the Bank?—Yes.

453. Would it be a check that the revenue is not delayed beyond what is necessary in the Receiver-general's hands, that the Bank should be directed from time to time to send in to you a statement of the balance of the Receiver-general's account?—I do not think any benefit would be derived from that without further changes; the practice at present is, that the Treasury should instruct the Receivers-general of the various revenue departments, "You shall keep a certain sum and no more;" such was the old system; by a very wise alteration upon the part of the Treasury within the last few years that is so far limited, that they direct them to pay round sums instead of broken sums; the former practice led to broken accounts; at present the payments are made, not including any fractions, I think, of 1,000*l.*; but by the Treasury order and authority the payments are made up by the departments according to the Treasury direction. If there was sent to me any account showing how much they had in their hands, and that I was also informed what were the Treasury direction limiting the amount to be retained by the receiver, undoubtedly I could see whether that direction had been complied with or not; if I had before me the direction of the Treasury that they were to pay up so much and to report to me what they had in hand, I could see that the Treasury direction was carried into full effect.

454. Your Lordship has a Parliamentary check, and a check quite independently of the Treasury; would that afford you sufficient knowledge in case of any Parliamentary investigation to give the information, or will you suggest any other mode?—I think that would be complete if the Bank of England, in the present returns, gave me a memorandum showing the amount which stood at the day of the month in the account to the credit of the Receiver-general of the various revenue departments; if, being in possession of the instructions given by the Treasury, and in possession also from the Bank of the amount standing to the credit of the Receiver-general, I could at once see whether the instructions of the Treasury, which Parliament is interested in seeing carried into effect, were obeyed or not obeyed; and I could then place a check upon the part of the service equal to the check which for the sake of Parliament the Constitution has made as to the issues.

455. Does the suggestion you made apply to the Customs, the Post-office, and all the revenue departments, except the Woods and Forests?—It would apply undoubtedly to the Inland Revenue and to the Customs; just the same facility of check would exist. With respect to the Post-office the matter may be somewhat different, although that would only involve the Treasury directions. I could still see whether the Treasury directions were carried into effect; but in the case of a department which practically has ceased to be a department of revenue at all, and is now a great department of administration, carrying on a great service like the army, the navy, or the ordnance, the Post-office must necessarily have the command of a larger balance than in the case of the other departments. The Post-office now swallows up, in its administration, I believe, pretty nearly the whole of the revenue.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

30 May 1856.

456. The amount of balance would be regulated by the Treasury?—Yes, by the Treasury, but the check would be the same.

457. Mr. Henley.] You assume always that all the monies in the hands of the Receiver-general are in the Bank?—Yes, such are his orders.

458. There your scheme would afford no check whatever?—No, if those orders are set at nought; but I believe the Receiver-general of all the Revenue Boards must keep his account at the Bank of England or the Bank of Ireland.

459. He ought to do so?—I believe he is bound to do so.

460. A check might be afforded even beyond that, to see whether he did so keep it?—Yes, in the manner I have explained.

461. Mr. Hankey.] Does your Lordship consider that it comes within the functions of the Comptroller of the Exchequer to take any cognizance whatever of money paid in to the account of the Receiver-general at the Bank of England?—Certainly not; but the question put to me was, whether such a change could or could not be made; on the necessity of the change I have not stated an opinion.

462. I thought I understood your Lordship, in reply to a question, to say that you thought it desirable that the Bank of England should furnish your Lordship with an account showing the amounts that stood to the credit of the Receiver-general at the Bank of England?—That it would be desirable by a new power; it can only be done by a new power. You asked me whether it was consistent with the present power; I say, clearly not; it is a question upon the alteration of the law. I have nothing to say to gross revenue by law; I know nothing till it is paid in to me.

463. Mr. Wilson.] Would it not be the distinct duty of the Treasury, in controlling their own officers, to have an arrangement whereby they should secure that the Receivers-general had never to their account an unnecessary balance?—I presume, under any change of the law it is necessary, that the Treasury ought in like manner to be quite aware that no sum is issued for the public service without a due authority. But I understand the question to be, whether any additional check was necessary, and whether it could be supplied in the way suggested.

464. Would it not be an entirely new principle imported into the Exchequer, to impose upon the Comptroller-general any duties or responsibility with regard to the payment of money, or the holdings of public money not in the Exchequer?—Entirely a new principle; his functions being now confined to transactions in the Exchequer itself, this would extend his control to the receivers' balances.

465. Chairman.] Your duties are the receipt and issue of monies?—Yes, of Exchequer receipts and payments.

466. Is it entirely inconsistent with your duty to ascertain whether you have received them or not?—It is entirely inconsistent with the law as it stands that I should examine into gross receipts; or rather it is not inconsistent with it, but it is beyond it, it is not provided for; whether it is desirable or not that it should be provided for is a question the Committee may consider.

467. Mr. Wilson.] If the principle were recognised that the Comptroller of the Exchequer should exercise any responsible control over the balance held by the Receivers-general in the Bank of England before they reached the Exchequer, the same principle might as well extend to the Comptroller-general exercising the same control upon the balances held by the receivers in every part of the kingdom; there is no difference?—I do not think the cases are quite analogous, but whether it is desirable or not is a matter upon which I pronounce no opinion whatever; it is entirely foreign to my present duties; I have nothing to say to it. I presumed the whole object of the examination was not to suggest that the Comptroller-general could be called upon to execute such functions as to determine the amount of money to be kept in the hands of a public officer like the Receiver-general, but I assumed the question to mean, and in that sense alone I answered it, that when the Treasury made the order that no more than a given sum should be left in the hands of the Receivers-general, which is a matter in which Parliament may have an interest as well as the department, the Comptroller-general should be required to see, not that the proper amount at his discretion was to be in the hands of the Receiver-general, but that the amount retained by the Bank was the amount which was sanctioned by the Treasury.

468. Mr. Bowyer.] Your Lordship is aware that the Receiver-general of the Customs has a general account and a drawing account at the Bank of England?—I should be sorry to give an answer with respect to his accounts; but possibly the Honourable Member is thinking of the system of account which is stated before us in this paper of the Paymaster-general, which is of the nature he suggests. I have no information with respect to the mode of keeping accounts of the Receiver-general of any Revenue department; that does not come within my cognizance or control.

469. Mr. Wilson.] On the former day you gave some evidence about the new mode of paying monies into the Exchequer, by the abolition of the specification. I think you stated that by the new mode no acquittance or receipt was given to the person making the payment until the end of the month, until you forwarded to the Audit Board a statement of your monthly receipts, which operated as an acquittance to the collector?—Yes, so I believe, and so I know to be the case as respecting my own department.

470. Mr. Hankey.] Were the Committee correct in understanding your Lordship that the Bank did not give a receipt to the officer paying in money to the account of the Exchequer?—I was referring to the practice of the Exchequer; and I stated that whereas, under the old system, I gave daily the form of acquittance which I hold in my hand; every man being an accountant paying money in got the next day an acquittance, in this form, from me to the Exchequer, which was founded upon the receipt which I got from the Bank that that party had paid that money; upon receiving which, I passed this acquittance, and the party then had in his pocket a discharge, which was good against all the world. At the present time I do not give any such acquittance; but I furnish at the end of the month a certificate to the Audit-office, which entitles the accountant in his accounts to credit for the amount which is so required.

471. Does not your Lordship consider, that when a person paying in money to the Accountant of the Bank of England has a receipt from the cashier of the Bank of England in that form, he has a perfect discharge or acquittal to himself from any claim made against him for nonpayment of the particular amount?—I think it is not the same, or is not as effective as what he previously received. Here is the former mode of dealing with these matters of revenue which required specifications, as I said, and which it was the object of the Treasury Minute to simplify and reform; here was a direction that A. B., an accountant, was to pay a given sum into the Bank; at the bottom of that there was a receipt passed at the Bank to that accountant. This came to me at the Exchequer, being a receipt from the Bank that that sum had been carried to the Exchequer account; upon that I passed this acquittance, which was in duplicate, and of which I kept one portion, and the other was given to the party. That was a complete and entire acquittance to the party upon the following day of the sum that he had paid; whereas, under the present system, so far as the Exchequer is concerned (and it is to the account of the Exchequer that this money is paid), the party gets no acquittance from me at all, but I furnish a certificate to the auditor monthly.

472. He has a discharge of the money which has been charged against him from the Bank of England, and the money is placed to the Government account, for which the Bank are reponsible?—Yes; but to what account is not distinctly specified in reference to cumulative payments.

473. To the account of the Exchequer?—Yes; but under the former system, it being placed to the account of the Exchequer, he got the acquittance of the Exchequer.

474. So he does now?—No.

475. He gets a discharge from the Bank, and an acknowledgment that the money has been paid to the account of Her Majesty's Exchequer?—But in the former instance he got a receipt from the Bank, stating that the money was paid to the Exchequer account, and he got the discharge of the Exchequer, which was made by law a good and valid discharge to all intents and purposes.

476. I do not see what further discharge he wants?—I stated this, not as necessarily implying any insecurity to the accountant at all, but as withdrawing one discharge that the accountant had formerly. He formerly had two discharges; a receipt from the Bank of the money being paid, and upon that he had a receipt from the Exchequer that it was carried to the Exchequer account.

477. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] What was the advantage of a double receipt?—

30 May 1856.

receipt?—Because my account is chargeable with it, and I think you ought to have my acquittance, to be a check upon myself. The Bank receipt is not the same discharge as my statutable acquittance.

478. Mr. Wilson.] Surely the only distinction is this, is it not, that formerly the Receiver-general of the Customs, before he could pay money into the Bank of England to the Exchequer account, had to send up to the Exchequer and receive a specification-paper; he then went to the Bank of England and received the money upon that specification-paper; he then went to the Comptroller of the Exchequer and received a discharge from him; at present he has simply to go to the Bank of England, pay in his money direct, and the receipt is made in duplicate; one is given to the person paying the money, which is a discharge to him for the time being; another receipt is sent to the Exchequer; and does not a memorandum go from the Bank of England to the Comptroller of the Exchequer of the amount paid in during that day which he is enabled to compare with the receipts which have been given by the Bank of England?—With respect to going to the Exchequer with a specification-paper, it was a most important and salutary change to dispense with that; but then we come to the operation subsequent to that. The Comptroller-general received, under the former system, the Bank receipt for which he gave the party an acquittance that did not necessitate coming to the Exchequer with the specification-paper, or any additional trouble to any party whatever, except my own signature to my own acquittance. At the present time the party himself may get a receipt from the Bank, though I doubt whether such is the unvaried course, or formed part of the new system, and the Bank in their letter to me of daily payments include what has been received from the several accountants, but (though the money received is put to my account) I never pass an acquittance to any one of those accountants at the present time. I get a certificate from the Bank, but there is no acquittance, though that sum is put to my account. I think the Treasury did quite right in the change they made respecting the revenue specification-papers. I think it is right to have the receipt of the Bank, if a duplicate of that paper was sent to me, which is not the case now; it is not a receipt to the individual parties; it is a memorandum from the Bank stating the transactions of the day, nor does it include the particulars expressed on the face of my acquittances. What I think would be an improvement without any additional trouble, except to myself, would be that when I have before me, as I had formerly before me, the certificate of the Bank that A., B., C., and D. had paid in to my account given sums, I should be bound to send back in my box the acquittances to those individuals.

479. Sir J. Graham.] If I keep an account at Coutts's, and direct a sum to be paid in to my credit with Coutts, Coutts gives me the acknowledgment of the party paying in, but does not expect me, upon a view of my bank book, to send in an acquittance also?—No; if in that respect the Bank is to be considered as the financial attorney of the Right honourable Member in receiving that money, the acknowledgment of the Bank is sufficient; but my department is a great department of account, and I think, both for the sake of the public and of the accountant, there ought to pass from me (up to this time there has uniformly passed) an acquittance to that party of the charge thereby created against myself.

480. Who is damnified from the want of the second document; the party paying in has an acquittance, has he not?—Upon the principle of the Bank of England giving that acquittance upon my behalf as agent to the Comptroller-general of the Exchequer, I am very glad to think that it should be the case. It saves me all the trouble of writing an acquittance; but I think the moment the Bank has assured me that that is passed to my account at the Exchequer, it would be more correct as a matter of account, that my acquittance should go to the party.

481. Mr. Bowyer.] Is not the system of taking an acquittance from the Exchequer itself, a remnant of the old system under which money was paid into the Exchequer; whereas now the money is paid into the Bank, and an acquittance taken from the Bank?—This acquittance was the acquittance recommended on the reform of the Exchequer, in which the old system of money payment was put an end to.

482. Was not that a remnant of the old system?—No; the Bank of England gets from me regularly an acquittance for itself. The Irish payments are all upon acquittance; therefore, you have two systems at work. The Bank of England never pays to my account any large sum on account of loans on deficiency deficiency bills, &c., or anything else, without getting my acquittance; and I think the proceeding would be made more complete and accurate if that course was always followed.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

30 May 1856.

483. Mr. Hankey.] Is not your Lordship furnished with a daily statement of all the money paid in to your account at the Bank?—Yes.

484. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Did anybody ever express a wish to have the additional document of which you speak?—Some of the parties paying have applied on the subject, and said, "Why are we to be deprived of the ordinary acquittance which we have been accustomed to have?" Assuming the Bank act on my behalf, as in the case put just now by my Right honourable friend, no doubt the Bank's acquittance is as good as mine; but make that a rule throughout the whole of the service, and I think you lose a kind of check upon my knowledge of all these things, and of my accounts being right. My acquittances are a check upon my accounts, and they contain details not included in the Bank receipt.

485. Sir James Graham.] When you receive the daily statement from the Bank, if there be any error in it, do you communicate it to the Bank?—Yes.

486. That covers every daily transaction as between you and the Bank, does not it?—Yes.

487. As between the Bank and the party paying in, the discharge of the Bank is a valid discharge?—Yes, I presume it is, but it is not explanatory.

488. At the commencement of your evidence to-day, you said there were three points which you wished to explain; while I was here you explained two; is there a third?—I have in my hand a paper which I gave in yesterday, that which I gave verbally, and perhaps you will allow it to be put in in evidence now.

THE RIGHT HON. SIR FRANCIS BARING, BART., IN THE CHAIR.

2 June 1856.

489. Chairman.] YOUR Lordship was asked upon the former occasion whether any complaints were made of the alteration in the receipt given with regard to the specification paper?—I was asked whether any parties had complained of being now left without a regular acquittance, which up to this period had been given to them from the Exchequer, and I was not able to give a clear answer to that question. I hold in my hand now a letter from the Corporation of London, of the 29th of April 1856. The corporation owe several debts to the public, 40,000 l., 30,000 l., 40,000 l., 50,000 l., 30,000 l., and 50,000 l., and several other sums likewise, and they are bound to repay them by instalments. Here are the instalments of the separate sums; those sums are paid through the Chamberlain, and he addressed a letter to the Exchequer on the 29th day of April 1856, in which he concludes in these words, " I have to request the favour of your Lordship furnishing me with the usual certificates of acquittance of the said payments."

[The Letter was delivered in, and is as follows:]

My Lord, Chamber of London, Guildhall, 29 April 1856.

THE sums of 6,000 l. and 4,150 l., payable respectively on 1st December and 1st March last, to the credit of Her Majesty's Exchequer, on account of the Corporation of London, pursuant to an arrangement with the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, made 13th February 1835, having been severally paid into the Bank of England on the 3d of December and 5th March last; viz.:

Payments on the several sums under-mentioned, raised under Act 7 Geo. 4, c. 40, for rebuilding London Bridge, as follows:

I have to request the favour of your Lordship furnishing me with the usual certificates of acquittance of the said payments.

I have, &c.
(signed) John Key,
Chamberlain.

The Right Hon. Lord Monteagle,
&c. &c. &c.

490. Then we come to the receipts into the Exchequer through the Paymaster-general. Has your Lordship any statement of the receipts which come into the Exchequer, not through the revenue departments?—I have produced this return to the order of the Committee, being a return of all sums received at the Exchequer, other than from the revenue departments, in each year since 1848, showing from what departments they were received. This includes a complete answer to this question, and indeed goes beyond it. It is a very voluminous paper.

491. The heads of the receipts will at present do for our inquiry; and if I turn to the Exchequer balance sheet from your department, the annual account, that would give the heads of the monies paid in?—Perhaps the simplest way for the foundation of the reply that I am asked for, is to refer to the Treasury Minute of 1834, which was passed upon the enactment of the Exchequer Act, and laid before Parliament in pursuance of that Act. That Minute states the several accounts and public accountants which were created under that Act, and I will read a list, as fixed by the Treasury Minute of 1834; it is at page 28: "The accountants fixed in 1834 were the Paymaster-general of the Forces, the Treasurer of the Navy, the Treasurer of the Ordnance, the Paymaster of Civil Services, the Paymasters of Exchequer Bills, the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, the Master of the Mint, in relation to two accounts, the purchases of bullion, and the account of his establishment, the Bank of England, the cashier of South Sea Annuities, the Comptroller of Stationery, the Commissioners of Woods and Works, &c., since divided into two departments, the Agent for the Colonies, Chelsea Hospital, the Customs, the Excise, Excise, the Stamps and Taxes, the Post Office, and the Insolvent Court; then follow parties paying in under imprest and in repayments of advances. That was the arrangement made at that period. I mean to give the Committee the whole of the parties with whom I am thus placed in financial relation. The first are those to whom credits will be issued: there are 12; and with regard to the remaining eight, with imprest, and payment of advances, their transactions are made public accounts.

492. I propose to confine myself to the payments into the Exchequer, and the receipts at the Exchequer: you receive 1 s. 6 d. and 4 s. duties upon pensions and offices; where is that paid?—That is paid in by the Inland Revenue Department.

493. "Surplus fees of regulated public offices;" there is a sum of 106,000 l. under that head as receipts: is that paid in by the revenue departments, or how?—You have put two things together; the surplus fees of regulated public offices, and some of them hereditary revenues, are paid in by the parties, and some by the Paymaster-general.

494. By what parties are the payments made?—The practice has rather varied of late; the fees up to a late period were, for the most part, paid by the parties or offices receiving those fees themselves. They are paid now for the most part by the Paymaster-general.

495. How are the hereditary revenues paid?—I believe there is a branch of these revenues paid by a gentleman of the name of Wilkin, as collector of small branches of the hereditary revenues. The imprests are paid by parties who are made public accountants under that head, but of late a considerable number of these payments come in through the Paymaster-general, and in Ireland through the Paymaster of Civil Services. With regard to sums returned by the trustees of the King of the Belgians, the agent of his Majesty, or the agent of the trustees, pays in those sums.

496. How is the produce of old stores paid in?—That is paid through the Paymaster-general; and I took occasion, from a question put to me, to look into that head of receipt, and I find that they are paid in with regularity, and I believe strictly according to the directions of the Treasury.

497. How often are they paid in?—Quarterly.

498. Take the Navy account; the sales of the Navy are paid in to the Paymaster, and then the Paymaster pays them quarterly in to the Exchequer?—Yes.

499. When the Accountant-general of the Navy pays it in to the Paymaster, is there any communication made to you of the amount paid in?—No, not of an official character. I do not know what the amount is that is paid in to the Paymaster officially; I may from knowledge of what was previously paid, and in some cases from actual knowledge of what ought to be paid, know it; but that is as a private individual; this does not however apply to the case of old stores; I have no official knowledge of it.

500. Do you know at all at the time when the payment is made?—No; in some instances I know the period when it ought to be paid by the Acts of Parliament under which such payments are receivable.

501. Confining yourself to the stores of the Navy, you do not know the amount that is paid, or the time at which it is paid?—No.

502. The payment is made at the termination of the quarter?—Yes; and I believe that to be regularly done under the authority of the Treasury. The Treasury Minutes on that subject will speak for themselves better than I can do from recollection.

503. How are the land revenues of the Crown paid; I see 281,000 l. under that head?—The land revenues of the Crown are paid by the Office of Woods, the original department of Woods and Forests being now divided into two branches, the Woods and Works; the Woods pay to the Exchequer direct; the Works, of late, pay through the Paymaster; but when the proposal was first made to me to receive certain monies relating to the work through the Paymaster, I objected to the change, inasmuch as the monies then in question were directed by statute to be paid to me by the Office of Works itself. There was a correspondence between me and the departments, which can be referred to, upon that subject, but finally it was adjusted by the amount being tendered by the Paymaster on behalf of the Board of Works, he acting as their agent, and my acquittance being given to him as such. The Act of Parliament was thus complied with, and I considered that no irregularity would recur; but within a short time after some of those payments have been brought in by the Paymaster without reciting that he paid it in on account of the Office of Works. Under the system of specification papers I should have objected to receive that money, not considering that it came within the terms of the Act of Parliament that the Paymaster should pay it except on behalf of those who were specified in the Act of Parliament as the right persons to pay; but under the new system, I mean the system which substitutes what are called receivable orders for the specification papers, I had no power of raising such an objection, for the payment had already taken place before this receivable order came to me. Under the old system the specification paper came first, and I had the power of objecting to any payment when I thought it came in an unauthorised shape; this occurrence may have been accidental—I know not whether it has been so or not—that the Paymaster has omitted to state that he paid on behalf of the Office of Works.

504. The alteration in the form of the specification paper has deprived you of what you consider a check upon the form of the receipt of money?—In that particular it did; but I think that such difficulty might be reconciled with the substitution of the receivable orders for the specification papers; I think the change requires to be revised and reconsidered by the Treasury, this check is one in which the Treasury are very considerably interested themselves.

505. By whom is the payment made in case of the East India Company?—It is paid on behalf of the Company by the cashier.

506. It is received direct from the Company?—Direct from the Company.

507. By whom are the unclaimed dividends paid?—By the Bank of England.

508. With regard to the repayment of advances on account of public works, by whom are those paid?—In Ireland they come through the Paymaster of Civil Services, the only Treasury agent we have in Ireland. In England some of them come from individual payers, under the head of "Repayment of Advances;" others come through a gentleman who represents the Exchequer Loan Commissioners; and some come from the Bank of England.

509. You stated that a good many of those payments are made through the Paymaster of Civil Services; has the system of paying through the Paymaster of Civil Services extended or diminished since you have been at the office?—That office now exists in Ireland only.

510. I now leave these particular cases, and I wish to ask you generally as to the payments of the Paymaster. Since you have held the office of Comptroller have the payments made through the paymasters increased or diminished?—The tendency has been the concentration of many payments into one office, that of the Paymaster; the system of payment through individuals and offices having been abolished, and the substitution of the Paymaster having taken place to a considerable extent in receiving money from parties previously bound to make payments to the Crown. It has been the employment of the Paymaster in paying over money to the Exchequer in the place of the more direct payments that used to come from special officers.

511. You have mentioned the Paymaster-general of the Forces, the Treasurer of the Navy, the Treasurer of the Ordnance, and the Paymaster of Civil Services; the payments that were previously made through all those departments, if any, are now consolidated in one Paymaster?—Those four offices are now consolidated by the 5th and 6th of William the Fourth, and subsequent enactments, which are recapitulated in the printed papers before the Committee; the duties are now performed by one officer; the office of Paymasters of Exchequer Bills was also abolished, and the duties transferred to the Paymaster-general. I have stated that the Mint keeps two accounts, one for bullion and the other for establishment. The account for purchasing bullion is still left to the Master of the Mint; the account of the establishment is transferred to the Paymaster-general. The Bank of England remains as it was. The cashier of South Sea Annuities was, I think, abolished on the termination of those securities. In the case of the Comptroller of Stationery the issues were formerly made to himself directly; there are financial duties which the Comptroller of Stationery formerly performed directly, which have of late been transferred to the Paymaster. The payments from Commissioners of Works are transferred to the Paymaster and pay in to me. The Agent of the Colonies is abolished. The Treasurer of Chelsea Hospital is abolished. Customs stands as it was. Excise, Stamps and Taxes are consolidated into the department called the Department of Inland Revenue, and the payments are continued from the Receiver-general of that revenue. The Post-office continues as formerly. With regard to the Insolvent Court, a public account account subsists. In respect to repayments and imprests, many of those that the Chairman has asked me about are persons receiving money in the first instance, but becoming accountants in its repayment; issues are made to them, but they become accountants in many instances in repaying them, and therefore come under this head; the imprest and repayments of advances are mainly in the hands of the Paymaster-general. You will see in the finance accounts the head of "Repayment of Advances."

512. We will take the Navy payment as an instance: am I stating it correctly that the Navy payment would be made to the cash account of the Paymaster-general; the Paymaster-general would transfer it to his drawing account; at the end of the month he would transfer it from his drawing account at the Bank to your account at the Bank, and it would come into the Exchequer in that way?—I have no personal or practical knowledge of the details of the Paymaster's duties; better information may be had from the department itself. But from the official papers I shall try to answer. The Navy payment assumed to exist in this question would be paid to the Paymaster-general's cash account; it would then be transferred, as I conceive, to his drawing account, and from thence, but whether at the end of the month or not I cannot tell, it would be paid into the Exchequer. I have no relation as a matter of direct control except with the Exchequer account. To that account only all payments are carried on which I am authorised to grant credits to the paymasters or to others, after having satisfied myself of their legality, and of the lawfulness of the Royal Orders, Treasury Warrants, and issuing letters which I receive. That Exchequer account is under my individual dominion; but over the Exchequer credit account, the drawing account, and bill account, I exercise no official control whatever. Of the cash account I know absolutely nothing, nor of the drawing account, which is recited from the cash account. I therefore cannot answer for the transactions of the Pay Office, except with hesitation; the heads of that department are better informed than I am. But I have endeavoured to explain how the payments received by the Paymaster are transferred to the Exchequer account, where alone my control becomes applicable, and my responsibility to enforce a Parliamentary appropriation attaches.

513. You know the regulations that are issued under the Exchequer Bill, and under the Paymaster's Consolidation Bill?—Yes, I have read them; I was in the Government of Lord Grey at the time that the first minute issued, in 1834; but I was at that time Secretary of State for the Colonies; other minutes have issued since, and I have read them. The Minute of 1836 was issued when I was Chancellor of the Exchequer.

514. In this case a payment is made in to the credit of the Paymaster-general from the Navy, and he transmits it again to the Exchequer?—Yes; take, as an example, a payment made by the Navy for old stores; those payments go in to the second account, or what is called the cash account of the Paymaster-general. I know not how such payments are received or issued; but that account, together with the proceeds of the Exchequer credit account, may be alike transferred to the drawing account and to the bill account, and over those two accounts the Paymaster has a full right of action himself. There is no action of the Exchequer which interferes with those accounts even in respect to monies which the Paymaster is bound to transfer to the Exchequer.

515. Having come into the cash account, it is transferred either to the bill account, or to the drawing account, and from those it is transferred to the credit of the Exchequer?—Taking the case of old stores, or the payments from the Office of Works as a further example, their proceeds would be paid necessarily into the cash account; it would next be transferred to the drawing account, and from the drawing account it would be paid ultimately to the Exchequer.

516. Does your Lordship see any great advantage in the payment being made to the Pay-office by the Navy instead of being made direct to the Exchequer?—With respect to the Navy, I see there may possibly be some advantage if the Paymaster has any means of ascertaining that the payment tendered by the Navy is what the Navy ought to furnish; but, as a matter of account, so far from seeing any advantage that it should go in that way to the Paymaster, I see every possible disadvantage connected with it. It is delayed in its progress to the Exchequer, and I know not how long it remains in the Paymaster's hands.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

517. Is it not making the Paymaster's office an office of receipt as well as of payment?—As far as it takes into the Paymaster's account monies which are delayed in reaching the Exchequer, but which properly ought to come to the Exchequer whilst they remain with the Paymaster, the whole Exchequer control is lost. The Comptroller of the Exchequer knows nothing about the cash account. It may be spent in any or all purposes, at the will of the Paymaster, without legal sanction, so far as the Exchequer control is concerned. It is true that the Comptroller receives it subsequently, but whether it is right or wrong he has no means of judging; and as far as I can judge from the accounts that come before me, this complex system of paying public money received from public accountants through the Paymaster, leaving it a question how and when they are to be paid to the Exchequer, is a great complication; it wholly destroys the constitutional check, necessarily and inevitably delays the public money in its progress to the Exchequer, and endangers the obligations of the Appropriation Act.

518. Under the Bill in which those regulations were first framed, I mean the regulations for the Pay-office, at that time those repayments did not go into the Exchequer; is not that so?—Yes; originally there was a different system with respect to old stores in different departments; in some cases the amount was deducted from the next year's estimate; there were different ways of paying; it was complicated. The present system has been a great improvement. There is now one principle established throughout the whole of the service.

519. Originally the sum in some shape or other was deducted from the votes of Parliament, was not it?—Yes; I believe not uniformly; it was sometimes deducted from the votes of the year; in other cases I think it was postponed till the next year; but that is immaterial; it was deducted one way or the other from the votes of Parliament. It was at more remote times the source of misappropriation, so far that pensions have been charged upon it.

520. Under those arrangements, therefore, before this alteration carrying the whole of those repayments into the Exchequer, it was absolutely necessary that they should be paid into the Pay-office, as it was not able that they should be paid into the Exchequer; was not that so?—The Minute is at page 29, "My Lords are quite aware that the more simple process would have been, to throw the amount of these cash receipts for old stores, rents, repayments, &c. into the Exchequer, and to issue them by credits from that account to the several departments; but such an arrangement cannot be effected without a special provision afforded by Parliament, and it would moreover be inconsistent with the financial arrangements for the current year, in which the estimated produce of such cash receipts are deducted from the estimates of the Navy and Ordnance expenditure."

521. I apprehend I am correct in saying that that difficulty of a special provision afforded by Parliament has been removed?—It has been removed.

522. That difficulty having been removed, and likewise the estimates of the year having been framed according to the new system, does your Lordship see the slightest objection to adopting that which it was stated at that time would have been a more simple process, namely, having all those payments made direct to the Exchequer?—I should myself see no objection, certainly; on the contrary, I was a party to this Minute, and, so far as I recollect, I believe that the objection then felt was a temporary one, which has since been removed; and I may say, as a general principle, that I think the principle ought to be that all those payments, not only of old stores, but of other sums paid to the cash account of the Paymaster, ought to be made direct to the Exchequer, unless there be a strong and conclusive reason to the contrary. The Paymaster is, as his name imports, and ought to be, the disburser of monies passed into his account issued from the Exchequer, after there has been a revision, and a judgment exercised, to ensure the legality of its issue, to mark its Parliamentary appropriation. Everything paid into the Paymaster's account which is not an Exchequer payment alters the character of the office of Paymaster; he becomes a great officer of receipt, which he never was intended to be, as well as an officer of disbursement, which he was intended to be; and as an officer of receipt of money other than from the Exchequer, he is freed from the responsibilities which, rightly or wrongly, Parliament has imposed upon the disbursement of the public revenue by the Exchequer check for the enforcement of the Appropriation Act.

523. Mr. Bowyer.] Independently of the question of the Exchequer control, does you Lordship think it important that the function of receipt should be kept entirely distinct from the function of payment?—I think that that is a great object in relation to the correctness of all systems of account. I believe that every gentleman round the table in going into his banker's house finds that he gets an order for money separate from the department of the Bank that receives lodgments; at least in well-managed establishments I believe that would be the case.

524. That was a principle very much insisted upon, was not it, by Sir Henry Parnell?—Undoubtedly, it is the general principle. Whether as Paymaster-general in some of his Minutes he might have expressed a necessity for modifying it in any respect, I cannot immediately answer; but his works upon that subject are accessible.

525. Sir Henry Willoughby.] Is it your opinion that all receipts could be removed from the Pay-office?—To answer that question I must be aware of what all those receipts are; I have no knowledge of that fact, and therefore, not having any knowledge, I can neither exercise a check in this respect nor state an opinion. The general rule should be to limit his receipts to the issues made to him from the Exchequer.

526. Does not it occur to your Lordship that your office has not an official knowledge of what passes in the Pay-office?—The law does not give me such knowledge. If the present system be continued, my office has not sufficient knowledge of what passes in the Pay-office, but the remedy strikes me as being, not so much in giving to the Exchequer more knowledge of what takes place in another department than it now has, but in removing from another department duties that do not belong to it, and which cannot be assigned to it without a sacrifice of more important public interest.

527. I understand your distinct opinion is, that the power of receiving money should be taken from the Pay-office on principle?—Assuming that there may possibly be some few exceptional cases, of which I know nothing, but, on general principle, I think the reason of the case is to constitute the Paymaster a public officer, receiving no money the legality of which has not first been ascertained by an independent authority, and bound to disburse that money with which he is charged according to the Parliamentary appropriation fixed by law, and for which a grant has been made, and applicable to no other use. I do not think, on principle, that he ought to receive a farthing beyond that. There may be particular cases of convenience that, as exceptions, might overrule that principle, but I am not aware of them, and they should be specially provided for.

528. Who is the responsible officer in the Pay-office when you have transactions in that office?—The head of the office is the Paymaster-general; but the practical duties of the office are performed, in the present instance, by a very able public servant, called the Assistant Paymaster, but whose functions, in one respect, I have felt it my duty to refuse to recognise. One important duty of the Paymaster is to receive from the Comptroller-general the largest amount of public securities completed, and in a negotiable state, that is passed into the custody of any individual; I mean the Supply Exchequer bills. In relation to this enormous responsibility, I have refused to act except on the vouchers of the Paymaster-general himself. I refused to accept the receipt tendered to me by the Deputy Paymaster for those bills, which at that exchange amounted in the single delivery to 9,168,900*l.*; I then required the receipt of the principal of the office; I obtained it; but in other respects I understand the deputy acts for the principal.

529. In the various statutes relating to the Paymaster-general's office there are various duties stated to be performed by the Paymaster-general; so far as you have any connexion with the Pay-office, are those duties performed by the Paymaster-general?—So far as I am concerned, they are exclusively performed by the Deputy Paymaster-general, with the single exception which I have named; I will not pay over that great amount of Exchequer bills till I first obtain the receipt of the principal, signed with his own hand.

530. Mr. Cardwell.] In point of fact, that makes no difference; probably the administration of the money is just the same whether you insist upon the receipt of the principal or take that of the assistant?—Probably the receipt may be exactly the same in law; of this, however, I am not informed. It may be received precisely with the same responsibility; still I felt that I was exercising a due caution in requiring the Paymaster's receipt.

531. Sir Henry Willoughby.] Did you say that you have no knowledge officially of the various receipts by the Paymaster-general?—None whatever, except those I make to him or receive from him; the law gives me no further knowledge, and so far as the question refers to receipts by him from other parties, I know nothing of it; and in respect to the disbursements of those receipts, except so far as a payment passing to myself, I know nothing about them.

532. Mr. Williams.] I understand it to be your Lordship's opinion that all public monies should be paid direct into the Exchequer by the parties who receive them, and not through any other channel, such as the Paymaster?—I have already stated my opinion with respect to the revenue departments very fully; therefore assuming that this question applies to all other parties but the revenue departments, I repeat the principle that I have applied to the revenue departments; that is the general principle, that money ought to come into the Exchequer and ought to go out of the Exchequer. I object to the interposition of the Paymaster in such a case, more especially as these receipts lead to unauthorised disbursements, freed from the Exchequer check and from the Parliamentary appropriation.

533. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] You state that the practice of the Exchequer is to take a receipt from the Paymaster himself in the case of Exchequer Bills, but from his deputy in all other cases?—I think in one instance, with respect to Exchequer Bills, there was a special authority brought for the deputy to sign, but that was exceptional.

534. What is the reason for requiring the receipt of the Paymaster with regard to Exchequer Bills and not requiring it in other cases?—I require from him no discharge in any other of the duties that he is called upon to perform; he is not in relation to me in the way of requiring a discharge from him; but in the Exchequer Bill issues, I pass to him the largest amount of negotiable paper payable to bearer that I issue under any circumstances whatever, and I think the issues a matter of so much importance, that it is my right to enforce, and I have enforced it, the receipt of the principal; I had the full power in that case, because my answer was, that I could not deliver those Exchequer Bills to any one but to the Paymaster-general, or on his receipt.

535. Mr. Williams.] Are the Treasury Minutes authorised to be issued under the authority of Acts of Parliament?—The authority under which Treasury Minutes are issued are very multifarious indeed; many of them are issued under Act of Parliament; but the functions of the Treasury are so varied, that if there was not a power of directing by Minute (and the Board can only speak by its Minute), even in circumstances in which there is no Parliamentary authority, the public business could not go on for half an hour. This use of Treasury Minutes I believe to be strictly according to law. Minutes frequently require more formal instruments, called warrants, to carry them into effect.

536. I refer to such a case as the commutation of those pensions that have been so much discussed before the Committee; had they the authority of an Act of Parliament for issuing a Treasury Minute for such a purpose as that?—The Lords of the Treasury have a general legal authority for issuing Treasury Minutes; how that is to be applied, whether right or wrong, depends upon the application of the power. I can only refer the Committee to my former evidence with regard to the question now put. In the case of the pensions commuted, I am not competent to express an opinion of its legality; but the power of the Treasury, giving its directions by Minute, which purports to be a Minute of the Board of Treasury issued by a quorum then and there present, directing that Minute for the public service, it is a right which has never been questioned, and which is absolutely necessary for the public service, with or without an Act of Parliament. There are certain acts of the Board of Treasury which require a warrant; but that warrant rests on the authority of a Minute.

537. Are those Treasury Minutes ever laid before Parliament?—To a very great extent they are, sometimes when they are called for, at other times by statute.

538. Not as a matter of course?—Not uniformly; I believe Parliament would receive very little edification from a great number of them; everything passes by Treasury Minute, from the smallest transaction to the greatest.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

2 June 1856.

539. Mr. G. A. Hamilton.] Has not the Treasury an inherent right of controlling and regulating the public revenue, subject only to the special control which may have been imposed by Act of Parliament?—The powers of the Treasury for revenue purposes are, I take it, common law powers, at least they are not uniformly resting upon any statute; they are the usage which is the unquestioned right of the department, subject to Parliamentary authority, and subject to control of law if exercised improperly. Every Treasury letter presupposes a Minute.

540. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] The powers of the Treasury are derived from a patent which puts in commission the powers of the Lord High Treasurer?—Yes.

541. The Lord High Treasurer was an ancient constitutional officer, having very extensive powers over both revenue and expenditure?—Yes.

542. Whatever powers the Lord High Treasurer formerly possessed are vested in the Lords of the Treasury?—Yes, unless modified or controlled by Act of Parliament.

543. Mr. Cardwell.] Is not it just this, money being voted by Parliament is voted to the Crown, the Crown gives the money to its Treasurer to dispose of, and the treasurership being in commission, the Board of Treasury have that power?—Yes.

544. Mr. Wilson.] We have been discussing hitherto the question of receipts into the Exchequer to the Paymaster, other than those paid by the great revenue departments directly to the Exchequer; am I correct in saying that those receipts consist altogether of the small sums of money which are received by the departments of expenditure in repayment of old stores, for rents, and for a variety of small matters which do not constitute any portion of the public revenue?—That is not so; there are branches of revenue that are paid through the Paymaster to the Exchequer, and those are branches of absolute revenue, and nothing else.

545. Will you state what those branches are?—I do not, of course, say that I can give you all, but I will give you a sufficient number. We will take the hereditary revenue from Scotland; that is hereditary revenue that used to be paid direct to the Exchequer; it was paid punctually and accurately, and there was no complaint that I was aware of. By a late regulation that revenue is paid through the Paymaster, and the result is that, though I have no doubt it ultimately comes all right, it does not come in with the same despatch and accuracy as previously; and by those and similar payments a balance is accumulating in the hands of the Paymaster, to his cash or drawing accounts, which he has the power to use as he thinks fit, and the repayments are not made to the Exchequer at the time when formerly they would have been made.

546. Can you tell the Committee the amount of those hereditary revenues for any one year?—No, I cannot give you the amount; but there is now on the table, in a return the Committee have called for, an account which I have presented of all payments to the Exchequer, other than through the revenue departments; therefore that return will show you everything that has been paid to the Exchequer through the Paymaster, but not all that he has received, the time it has been in his hands, nor the uses to which it has been turned by him. This would make the account complete. I can show some instances which deserve attention. I will take this as an example: you have payments to receive for London Bridge, which become part of the revenue; you have lent the Corporation of London a given sum, and the repayments of that sum, which are very considerable, are as much a part of the revenue as the Customs, and the Post-office, or the Excise. If you mean to inquire whether the revenue of the Customs, Excise, and Post-office or Stamps, is paid through the Paymaster-general, the whole of my evidence excludes that altogether: but I refer to other sources of receipt. Take the department of Works: by your order the proceeds of the department of Works, whatever they may be, go to the Paymaster. My humble suggestion is, that for the reasons I have stated already, they have no business to go there, but that they ought to go direct to the Exchequer.

547. The descriptions of receipts received by the Paymaster are of two kinds; they are first, the repayment of monies which have been issued as imprests to one department and expended for another, and they are payments of moneys which have been received by the various departments of expenditure for various objects?—I doubt this, for example, I cannot see that I could bring the Scotch payments that have been formerly made through the Lord Treasurer's Remembrancer under either of those heads. Payments of hereditary revenue of any kind during Her Majesty's life are as much part of the public revenue as Customs, Excise, Post-office, and Stamps. The payment of those sums into the Paymaster as of fines and forfeitures, or Crown rents, is a payment of revenue in the strictest sense of the word, and should be paid direct to the Exchequer.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

548. We will take the example which the Chairman has argued upon, namely, the repayment into the Exchequer of the produce of old stores; that repayment is made, in the first instance, by the department which sells the stores to the Paymaster, and is periodically passed into the Exchequer; is it not the case that those sales of old stores take place all over the world where there are naval establishments, and are made in very small sums, or in very large sums, as the case may be, and at different times, and in very different places; if the principle for which you have contended of paying all those sums direct into the Exchequer were adopted, would it not be necessary that the whole of those sums of money for which the old stores are sold, all over the world, should be remitted in the first instance to the department in London, in order by them to be paid direct into the Exchequer?—I presume that course might be necessary, in order that the Naval Department should exercise a control over the funds realised by old stores. I must believe that this function is now exercised by the Admiralty. I presume it is not the Paymaster that determines whether the right amount of navy stores is remitted or not; but that it is the Admiralty which, knowing the sales, has a professional knowledge and power of supervising the amount of those sales; when the Admiralty has done that, I think there ought to be no delay in passing the proceeds of those stores so ascertained to the Exchequer account, because if you pass it into the Paymaster's account, that unappropriated balance whilst in his hands may supply the means of issue independent of any control or legal authority whatever.

549. Are you not aware that, in point of fact, those sums never constitute a balance in the hands of the Paymaster at all, but are purely a matter of account?—I know this, that there is in his two supply accounts, one account for receipts from the Exchequer, and another his cash account, showing receipts from all other sources. I know not with certainty how that second account is recruited, but if the Treasury Minute is carried into effect, every single sum which he receives, other than from the Exchequer, must go to that account. I know further, that when it is placed to that account, he has an unlimited power of taking it away to his drawing account, and that being in his drawing account, he can draw upon it for any purpose which he thinks fit.

550. My question is this; is it not the case that in these adjustments of account no payment of money takes place at all; take the case of the navy. Suppose the navy had to repay 100,000 l. for old stores, is not the practice this; that the accountant of the navy sends a note to the Paymaster's-office, and states that he has to account for 100,000 l. worth of stores, no payment of money takes place, but the 100,000 l. is put to his debit in the Paymaster's book as if it had been an issue to him, and at the end of the quarter he actually receives from the Exchequer a sum of money upon the naval account in order to balance that transaction; and it stands as a debit in the Paymaster's books the same as if it had been issue of money?—It stands to his cash account, over which cash account, it not being the working account but what is called the supply account, he can only operate by transferring to the drawing or bill account, as he has the full power of doing, any sums whatever that stand to that cash account; he therefore gets the dominion of that money, and from his drawing account he can issue it without any Parliamentary appropriation or any Exchequer control. During the time that it stands to the cash account it is entirely at the control of the Paymaster, to be placed by him to the drawing account, and then drawn upon for any purpose that he thinks fit, in employing those balances for one unauthorised purpose, trusting to what the honourable gentleman has described as a readjustment of the account at a future time, is what I have taken the liberty of suggesting to be of more than doubtful legality, and of certain public inconvenience.

551. Is not the form in which old stores are accounted for as follows: the Navy having received certain sums of money for the sale of old stores, inform the Paymaster of that fact, and request him to put that sum to their debit in account; account; he debits their account, and passes to it, as an opposite entry to his cash account in the Bank of England, and thereby the credit of the Navy, standing with the Paymaster-general at the moment, is diminished to that extent, and his cash account in the Bank of England is increased to that amount. At the end of the quarter he adjusts all those payments by paying from the cash account into the Exchequer the sums which ought to go for those repayments?—I presume, from the knowledge and experience of the honourable gentleman who puts the question, that he has rightly described the mode of proceeding: I am not able, from my own knowledge, to affirm or negative it. The principle seemed to me to describe the principles that would be realised, and against which I protest; but my objection is, that during a considerable time, the Paymaster is enabled by this process to hold at his command a large sum of public money free from the control of Parliamentary appropriation, free from the control of the Exchequer itself; and that this is proposed to be set right ultimately by what is called the rectification of accounts, endeavouring to make things right which in origin and progress are wrong.

552. Is it not the case that by every Treasury minute which has been passed since 1834 down to the present time, and even before that, the Paymaster has been enjoined to exhaust his cash account before he draws upon his Exchequer account?—There are such directions given.

553. Has not the object of that regulation been to spare the Exchequer account as much as possible, in order to conduct the business of the country with as small an amount of money as may be possible?—Certainly that was the object which I always had in view in contemplating these arrangements.

554. Will you have the goodness to explain to the Committee what difference there is in the power of control of the Paymaster over moneys which are at that cash account and over credits, which have been already granted by the Exchequer?—The difference seems to me to be immediate and clear; not one single sum at the Exchequer account goes into that account, except under a specific Parliamentary appropriation; what he receives from other sources is received without Exchequer control, and relieved from the strictness of Parliamentary appropriation. When transferred to the drawing account, it forms part of a common balance.

555. My question is this: what is the distinction in the control which the Paymaster has over the cash account which stands in his name at the Bank of England, and over the credits which have been raised upon the Exchequer account, which also stand in his name at the Bank of England?—His control over both is precisely the same with respect to the obligation of attending to his orders when they are issued, but the one is subject to a Parliamentary appropriation, and the other is not; one is subject to the Exchequer control, and the other is an unappropriated balance, which I think was never contemplated by the law in respect to the Paymaster's office, with the exception of its connexion with extraordinaries and civil contingencies.

556. I have asked with regard to those sums which have been placed under the Paymaster's control upon Exchequer credits from the Exchequer; is there any control in the Exchequer upon those sums after those credits have been granted?—None whatever; but I have a knowledge of how they are drawn upon, and if I am to presume that there is no control in law when an appropriated sum is placed in the hands of a public officer for a specified service, and no other, then there is no difference between the one account and the other; but in the one instance, namely, the Exchequer credit account, it is an appropriated sum, in the other it is an unappropriated sum, and it is in the case of the unappropriated sum that I see the danger to arise; even if ultimately rightly placed to an authorised account, during the interval before it is so placed it is at the command of the Paymaster. It is of this I complain.

557. Is there not the same check of the Treasury over the Paymaster's transaction, with regard to the cash account, as there is with regard to the Exchequer credit account, upon which the Exchequer has no control?—The Exchequer has no control, but the law has a control, by enacting what use is to be made of that money. The unappropriated monies, which come in from various sources in an increasing ratio year by year, are sums which are free from that control.

558. Has not the law the same control upon the cash account, inasmuch as it is a distinct regulation that the two portions of which alone that cash account consists, that is the repayments of imprest moneys, and which can only be applied to the services for which they were originally granted, and the receipts for rents, old stores, and a variety of minor purposes, which must be paid periodically into the Exchequer; is not the same Treasury control, without the control of the law, applicable to that account as is applicable to the Exchequer credit account?—I do not think that it is so in some respects; in some portions of the public account the effect would be totally different. But I prefer a distinct Parliamentary appropriation to any reliance on what the question describes as a Treasury control. A person receiving money to pay a particular sum for a particular service is subject to a clear distinct obligation, which is notorious. A man having an unappropriated sum which he may or may not apply to any particular service, is in a different position. Undoubtedly if he misapplies anything he is guilty of an offence; and I hope I need not say that I am not imputing what is called, in common parlance, misapplication of public money to any one; I am discussing the question of a bad system destroying the present force of the law of appropriation, and depriving Parliament of its control over appropriated money.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

559. Does the law provide or contemplate that there should be any control whatever except the Treasury control, as administering the law over any sums of money which have once issued out of the Exchequer, or upon which Exchequer credits have been granted?—The question does not, I presume, refer to the subsequent audit: over money not in the Exchequer I have no control by law. The control does not rest with the Exchequer then; the obligation devolves upon another party; but if money which I transfer by credit from the Exchequer from the revenue payments, as an example, was to be applied, not to the purpose for which it was specifically issued, but we will say, to pay the accounts which are now depending between the public and the East India Company in relation to the China war, that would be a misappropriation, in my judgment, and an impeachable offence.

560. Would it not be simply an abuse of the power of the Executive Government in applying moneys for purposes which have not been recognised or authorised by Parliament?—That I consider, on high Parliamentary authority, to be an offence of the highest description, and a violation of the Act of Appropriation.

561. Would not the power of the Treasury be equally great to direct that a payment of that kind might be made out of Exchequer credits as out of the cash account?—I do not think it would be the same thing; such payments must go to the drawing account; the Exchequer credit is issued under the Appropriation Act; not one farthing can come out of the Exchequer to the Exchequer credit account without a distinct reference to the Act of Parliament under which it is issued, and the use for which alone it is to be applied; it is to that use and that use only to which it is legally applicable; if there is any unappropriated money at the disposal of the Treasury, the Treasury may possibly make a bad or a good use of it under their responsibility; but however culpable, as an abuse of their discretion, that might be, they would not commit the Parliamentary offence of having obtained money from the Exchequer for one specific purpose and applying it for another.

562. Suppose that the Navy Estimates amount to 10,000,000*l.* a year, have you at the Exchequer any control over that money beyond the fact that 10,000,000*l.* may be issued upon a Royal order and a Treasury warrant for the uses of the navy?—That is my function; with that function my duty begins and ends.

563. Suppose that an issue was ordered of 2,000,000*l.* for naval purposes to the credit of the Paymaster at the Bank of England upon the Exchequer account, would there not be a sum of 2,000,000*l.* standing to the credit of the Paymaster at the Exchequer account at the Bank of England, which he could operate upon without your knowledge or any control that you could possibly exercise over him?—He could not operate on it without my knowledge. The daily returns from the Bank give me information that the whole amount, or any part of it, has been withdrawn from the Exchequer account. Thus far he could not operate on the Exchequer account without my knowledge; but if I am called upon to assume as an hypothesis that the money which has been issued distinctly for that purpose and received for that purpose is to be applied for another, that might be done without my knowledge, but I have said I consider that to be an impeachable offence.

564. Chairman.] Could he operate upon it without your knowledge?—He could could not operate upon the Exchequer credit account without my knowledge. Whether it is upon the Exchequer account or upon the Exchequer credit account, which still stand as connected with the Exchequer, though transferable by the Paymaster to his drawing account, he cannot withdraw that sum from the Exchequer account without my knowing it. I know the exhaustion of the Exchequer credit account as well as the exhaustion of the Exchequer account properly so called.

565. Mr. Wilson.] The knowledge which you have is simply in the nature of an intimation from the Bank of England of the extent to which the credit has been used, but you have no knowledge and no responsibility and no control over the purposes for which it is used?—Certainly not; the law gives me no further power; therefore any abuse that takes place after the transfer is an abuse for which I rejoice to think I am not responsible.

566. You hold that the department to whom Parliament granted the money is solely responsible to Parliament for the proper use of that money after it is out of your hands?—Assuming the proper use to be applying that sum for the purposes for which it was issued and was appropriated by the law, the department is responsible to Parliament, and I presume to law also.

567. Then what distinction do you draw between the cash account and the account of which the Paymaster has the control equally upon the Exchequer account after you have granted those credits?—I have in the one case a direct and positive knowledge of the purposes for which that credit was drawn for which it was voted, and in respect of the other I have no such knowledge; but in the former case the Parliamentary appropriation is specified, in the latter it is not.

568. You have a knowledge with regard to the other that there are legal purposes for which it has been received, and legal objects to which it must be applied?—With respect to the cash accounts I have no such certainty at all. I can give an instance: monies are issued to the cash account, which are applied not for purposes that are useless, not for purposes which may not afterwards be rectified, but for purposes which at the time of their being so applied are not legal, because they have no legal authority.

569. Might not the same use of the money be made upon the Exchequer credit account?—If the Exchequer credit was drawn upon, I should know to what services it was legally applicable. The same abuse might possibly exist, but it would constitute an open and wilful offence in that case.

570. Mr. Cardwell.] Is not your objection this, that during the current quarter the Paymaster-general has at his disposal a larger sum than that which the Comptroller of the Exchequer has issued?—Certainly; and to an extent that I am not aware of, and not limited by the same specific Parliamentary appropriation which applies to the Exchequer credits.

571. Mr. Williams.] I understand the question of old stores to stand thus: that money is received by the Admiralty, which, periodically, the Admiralty pays in to the Paymaster-general, and the Paymaster-general pays it quarterly into the Exchequer, or accounts for it in some way or other; now what check is there, on the part of the Admiralty, knowing that the Paymaster has paid in the proper sum to the Exchequer?—I know not what check the Admiralty has, but I have no legal authority in the case. I know that in cases when it is due, and paid over, I give a receipt for it.

572. Mr. Wilson.] Are you not aware that the statements of these accounts go to the Commissioners of Audit, who have a check upon all these accounts?—I replied only in respect to my own power; the Commissioners of Audit have a power of a different kind, which relates to the disbursement; and I know not how the powers of the Commissioners of Audit would apply in cases where the Paymaster being in possession of unappropriate moneys for a given time, expends these moneys on a particular service, and afterwards rectifies his account by making new entries. I do not know whether the principle of audit is applied to the real account of actual pay, or to an imaginary account, after what is called rectification.

573. Mr. Williams.] What convenience is there in passing this money for old stores into the hands of the Paymaster instead of paying it direct into the Exchequer?—I am not aware of any; I have stated the inconveniences arising from it; I do not see the advantage.

574. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Is it your statement, that the present practice is defective, as being a departure from some better practice which formerly prevailed, or do you consider that the present practice is as good as any former practice, but that it ought to be amended?—I think the present practice differs from the former practice by a great and a growing extension of the application of a dangerous principle. I think that the present state of the Paymaster may well be compared with the previous state, and that the comparison of the two would be greatly to the disadvantage of the present practice, that disadvantage arising mainly out of the perversion of the principle of the consolidation of the pay-offices, which placed the pay department in the hands of a single individual, whereas previously it was in the hands of four, and I think that the four were a protection, because under the former system, no application of Army, Navy, and Ordnance Votes could take place by forming and coming indiscriminately from one common balance.

575. That consolidation took place about the year 1834?—It was in 1835, during my own connexion with political office, that the first consolidation took place, and I quite approve of the principle still, but a consolidation of office and a confusion of accounts are two totally different things.

576. Was the present practice with respect to this class of payments introduced at that time?—I must divide the question into two parts, the consolidation of Army, Navy, and Ordnance, and the service of those consolidated offices, with the office of Paymaster of Civil Services. The first took place in 1835. The second was effected by the Act of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 56 in 1848, long after I had resigned the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer. When the first consolidation took place, Mr. Sargent was Paymaster of, what were called, Civil Services, and he was also the Paymaster of what remained of the Commissariat Chest or Army Extraordinaries and of Civil Contingencies; therefore in relation to Mr. Sargent's office it was to be discussed in itself, he disbursing appropriated and unappropriated sums. In relation to the three great offices of pay, no possible confusion could have arisen at that time. The Paymaster of the Army could not pay for the Treasurer of the Navy or the Treasurer of the Ordnance, nor could the other pay offices supply any service but their own. But having the three offices united, your practice has produced a confusion of account and a larger balance than was held by any one individual in the three departments; and when I tell you that the balance at the close of the last quarter on Exchequer credit accounts, which might be all operated upon by the Paymaster himself, amounted to 1,400,000 l., you will see that at no previous time was such an amount at his command.

577. What was the practice previously to that change with respect to the payment for the produce of old stores?—It was a very bad system, for which the present system is a great improvement. There were different systems in different departments; at one time the old stores were made the foundation of grants of unauthorised pensions; pensions were granted upon the old stores; I think the present system is a great improvement.

578. You consider that the present practice with regard to that class of payments is better than any previous practice on the same subject?—Certainly, my objection being only to a want of check upon the Paymaster, or the department who ought to be bound to pay that sum, which is in point of fact public money unappropriated; they ought to pay it, quam celerrimè, into the hands of the Exchequer.

579. Is that the whole of the change which you would recommend?—With regard to old stores, I think it is; for, as far as I understand, I think the Government in all respects have improved the system.

580. You think that there is a delay in the payment of the produce of old stores into the Exchequer?—My objection is not only as to the delay, but I object to placing in the hands of any officer holding during the pleasure of the Crown a great command of unappropriated money; I say that this is not according to the constitution of England, nor is it consistent with the principles which Parliament has laid down.

581. Would you recommend that the Admiralty should pay at once into the Exchequer the produce of old stores without passing through the Paymaster?—Certainly.

582. Is that the whole extent of the change that you would recommend?—In relation to this object, that is the point to which I invite the attention of the Committee.

583. Mr. Wilson.] As a consequence of that, would you recommend that in the case of the whole of the naval departments throughout the world, where the produce of old stores, or receipts for rent, or any other purpose, are received, all all those sums of money should be sent to the head office of the Admiralty in London, and paid by the head office direct into the Exchequer?—How those small sums are now collected I am not prepared to say, but I presume they must be paid in some way through the Admiralty, and that the Paymaster cannot receive the amount of the proceeds of Admiralty stores except upon Admiralty responsibility. I only suggest that the law would be best carried out if, in the place of transferring those monies to the Paymaster without appropriation, the Admiralty should transfer the monies to the Exchequer, thus subjecting them to a legal Parliamentary appropriation.

584. Would it not become absolutely necessary, as those monies arise from sales all over the world, that those monies should be transmitted to the Admiralty, if they are to be transmitted by the Admiralty into the Exchequer?—They ought to be transmitted to somebody responsible for the correctness of the sums remitted. The machinery for regulating and vouching those payments must be, I presume, the Admiralty responsibility to see that those payments are correct. When that Admiralty function is exercised, then I think that money ought to be paid to the Exchequer.

585. You have said that this leads to a large unappropriated balance at the command of the Paymaster, to which you object?—Yes.

586. You are aware that the regulation from time immemorial has been, and repeated in every Treasury Minute, that the cash balance of the Paymaster at the Bank, which those paymasters represent, must be exhausted before the Paymaster draws upon his Exchequer credits, and therefore, if he does follow that rule of exhausting his cash balance for his daily payments, in preference to drawing upon his Exchequer credits, there never can be a large balance to speak of, and the effect is to save him from drawing unnecessarily upon the Exchequer?—Such orders exist, but assuredly not from time immemorial as the question assumes; but if the order be interpreted as enabling the Paymaster to exhaust his cash balance for purposes which are not sanctioned by Parliament, respecting which no Royal Order or Treasury Warrant has been passed, in respect to which no Exchequer Warrant has been issued, it is that very power of exhausting an unappropriated sum which I consider to constitute what appears to me to be an illegality, and what I know to be a danger.

587. Mr. Cardwell.] You do not contemplate that it would be necessary to send money in coin from distant parts of the world to the Board of Admiralty in order to enable them to make the arrangement of which you are now speaking?—Clearly not.

588. Or that there would be any other change except this, that the sum of money so received by them would be subject to the issue of the Comptroller, whereas now it is in the hands of the Paymaster-general, and does not become subject to the Comptroller till the close of the quarter?—Precisely so; because the Comptroller issues, determining and fixing the appropriation.

589. What you contemplate is, that that should be done from time to time which is now done at the close of the quarter?—Yes; this applies to all unappropriated monies, and ensures their issue for appropriated purposes only.

590. Chairman.] As I understand you, your difficulty is, that these repayments in the hands of the Paymaster, until the adjustment takes place, are disposable for any service or any payment which the Treasury may order?—Which the Treasury may order.

591. Subject always to the readjustment at the end of the quarter?—Precisely so.

592. Mr. Wilson.] The whole tendency of the alterations made by the Treasury in late years has been to carry out that principle which is laid down in the Report of 1832, the paying of all monies into the Exchequer, and to supply the defects which the Treasury Minute of 1835 left with regard to that principle?—I do not think that the changes that have been made have been happy if that were the object, because the effect of the alterations in modern times has been to place more unappropriated monies in the hands of the Paymaster.

593. We have been already told that the Treasury Minute of 1835 was passed for the purpose of giving effect to the Act of 1834, which Act was passed in consequence of the Report of the Commissioners of 1832, which Commissioners recommended that all money should be paid into the Exchequer, and accounted for in the Exchequer; the Treasury Minute of 1834 found certain reasons why that could not be carried into effect; the produce of old stores was not provided to to be paid into the Exchequer; but is it not the case that the whole tendency of the recent Treasury regulations has been to bring all those monies which have been excluded from the Exchequer, finally into the Exchequer at the present time; is it not the case that the produce of old stores goes into the Exchequer now?—Yes, and it is done, as far as I can learn, with praiseworthy earnestness, and a steady determination to carry the Treasury Minute into effect.

594. With respect to all those payments, the Treasury practice of late years has been to confirm and carry out the principles laid down in the Report of 1832?—Most certainly not. It is true with respect to old stores. But I will give an example: the Paymaster in Ireland is a receiver of money necessarily there, and he pays that money over to the Exchequer here. By a Treasury Order, and a very wise one, he was bound to pay up all the monies which he had in his hands to the Exchequer at stated times; I think it was twice in the week, on the Wednesday and on the Saturday. By the alteration of the Paymaster's department that practice is changed now, and those payments are delayed in their progress to the Exchequer. Now that is just reversing the process that the Honourable Member has suggested; it is delaying the progress to the Exchequer in place of accelerating it.

595. My question had reference to the fact that there were, by the Minute of 1834, a great number of receipts which never passed into the Exchequer at all, and which do now pass into the Exchequer. There are the receipts for old stores, there are the receipts for rents, there are the receipts for every description of small receipt, original receipt for original purpose received by the various departments; they all now go into the Exchequer by the Treasury Minute of 1835, and they did not go into the Exchequer?—I think not, because I cannot consider it to be a carrying out of the principle of that Act, when a variety of payments, which formerly were paid directly into the hands of the Exchequer itself, are now, though they may be paid to the Exchequer ultimately, paid primarily to the Paymaster, who may keep them in his hands for a period which defeats the policy of the Act. I can show you a balance kept for more than two years, and acted upon not for its appropriated purpose, but acted upon by the Paymaster in his discretion.

596. Is it not the case that there are a great number of receipts which are now paid into the Exchequer, which were not paid into the Exchequer as contemplated by the Treasury Minute of 1835, which was based upon the Act of 1834?—I think if you take the ultimate payments into the Exchequer it may be so, but there is a much larger amount arrested in its progress to the Exchequer than there was before, which remains in the hands of the Paymaster as an unappropriated sum liable to be acted upon by an officer holding during the pleasure of the Crown.

597. Mr. Bowyer.] Does your Lordship, by ultimate payments, mean payments by account?—No, I mean this, that if, for instance, a sum that would formerly have been paid direct into the Exchequer in the month of January 1850, is delayed in the hands of the Paymaster till 1851 or 1852, the ultimate payment which I contemplate there is the payment into the Exchequer in 1852. By an ultimate payment I mean the payment to the Exchequer.

598. Which is, in point of fact, no payment at all, but merely a matter of account?—All these things are matters of account; all our remittances between department and department are matters of transfer and credit. I do not touch any money.

599. That money has already been spent and employed?—It may have been spent and employed during the interval, for I presume it would be left to the Exchequer credit if not drawn out with some intent and purpose. I have found the case of such monies remaining for months and years in the hands of the Paymaster; they could not remain in his hands unemployed; on the contrary, they must have been used in his hands, though not for the purpose for which the money was drawn.

600. Mr. Williams.] What check is there against the Paymaster with regard to the money that he receives at the audit of the account?—I presume that the check there is the ultimate check of the audit; but I have not been able to distinguish, nor do I know whether the audit account which is checked is the rectified account which has been described, or the original account of the payments as they were first made.

601. In what way is the money just received by the Paymaster drawn out?—Under —Under regulations, which are before the Committee, which seem strict and proper. You have it in the papers before you. I believe, with respect to the security of the public money and the impeccability of the men who are concerned in this department, it is above all doubt and suspicion. We are dealing with a system.

602. Does the same check apply to the Paymaster as to the Comptroller-general?—It is a different check. The Comptroller-general raises credits and makes transfers, and that is all he does. The Paymaster receives credits from the Exchequer, but he passes the amount of those credits, and other receipts from other parties, to an account upon which he can operate as to directing special payments, but I presume he can only operate upon in pursuance of the regulations, which I believe are strictly such as to guard against the possibility or suspicion of individual abuse.

603. Mr. Hankey.] Would it not be the case if the money received for old stores were accounted direct to the Exchequer, that the Exchequer would be bound to obey the directions of the Treasury to transfer that amount to the Paymaster, provided there was an unappropriated sum on the account?—If the question relates to a vote without specific appropriation, that would be the case; the application of unappropriated funds is out of the jurisdiction of the Exchequer. The Comptroller-general controls the amount only of such payments; for instance, you vote every year 100,000 l. for Civil Contingencies; the Comptroller-general can prevent the excess of an issue beyond the 100,000 l., but when that sum legally gets into the hands of a public officer or department, most justly and rightly (for it would not be a contingent account if it were not so) that public officer or department has a power of operating upon it.

604. It appears that your only reason for wishing the amount to pass directly to the Exchequer, is to prevent the Paymaster making use of that money for purposes to which it was not appropriated by Parliament?—Precisely; and to take pains that all those moneys are brought in as soon as possible.

605. Do you consider it as a part of the functions of the Comptroller of the Exchequer to see that the Paymaster in any way makes a proper use of the money when once paid to him?—Certainly not; when withdrawn from the Exchequer account, I have no such authority; when withdrawn from the Exchequer credit account, I have neither authority nor knowledge given me by law.

606. Mr. Wilson.] It is no part of the functions of your office, and you have no responsibility with regard to it?—No; I have only the responsibility of seeing that the Parliamentary appropriation is not exceeded, and I do that under the supposition that a party so receiving appropriated funds is bound to employ them for the purpose to which they are appropriated by the Act of Parliament, and for such purposes only.

607. Mr. Cardwell.] Therefore it is that you object to moneys being in the hands of the Paymaster-general which have not passed through your scrutiny?—Yes, on the two grounds of not being certain of receiving them soon enough, and having no control whatever, and no power of restraining their issue to any but a definite legal Parliamentary purpose.

608. Mr. Wilson.] When you speak of Parliamentary appropriation, of course you speak only of the whole vote for each department; you have no control over the specific appropriation of those monies when they are out of your hands?—A question has arisen between me and the Treasury upon that subject, which has rendered it necessary to take the opinion of the law officer: the papers respecting this case may advantageously be produced. See Appendix.

609. Mr. G. A. Hamilton.] There were two items in the evidence which you gave with regard to payments into the Exchequer. I understood your Lordship to say that the greater part, but not the whole of the duties upon pensions of officers and surplus fees, were paid directly into the Exchequer?—The whole of the first; the 1 s. 6 d. and 4 s. duties come through the Inland Revenue; the other branch used to come in various ways from the parties collecting those fees in many instances; they now come, I believe, almost entirely through the Paymaster; I think there may, perhaps, be some small exceptions to that, but I cannot speak from memory; the papers called for will show the fact.

610. Can your Lordship explain why there are any exceptions?—I have not it distinctly in my mind now; but the present system is open to this additional objection, that I get fines and fees paid in one sum by the Paymaster; if I received them separately and distinguishable, I should know the amount of each, they being separate heads of revenue account; the fines are parts of the hereditary revenue, and belong to the account of the public revenue as such; by the intermingling of those two accounts I am deprived of a check of account, which casts a certain degree of uncertainty even on the account which you have in your hand.

611. Mr. J. M'Gregor.] Is it within your Lordship's cognizance whether the moneys received by the Paymaster-general which did not find their way into the Exchequer for two years, appeared as part of the public revenue or receipts when received, or only at the end of the two years?—The case immediately in my memory at that time was a case of vote; it was the issue of a Parliamentary vote, on which a credit had been issued, a balance of which was retained for about three years, and is still retained.

612. Mr. Wilson.] Am I to understand you to say, that you have known cases where moneys which have been received by the Paymaster on behalf of the Exchequer have remained with the Paymaster unaccounted for for two years?—No, I never stated any such thing as the usual practice; I have not found that for such a period; but I have a variety of instances here, which I could produce, in which the money received has remained in the hands of the Paymaster a longer period than if the old system had been continued, which transmitted moneys to me direct; the case to which I alluded was the one of an Exchequer credit on a Parliamentary vote, the whole of which was transferred to the Paymaster, a part only expended, and the balance retained by the Paymaster at his own command for about three years.

613. You have no reason to believe that the Paymaster does not, at the period that he professes to do it, that is, quarterly, pay over to the Exchequer the whole of those small receipts which come into his hands?—I have no means of knowing, and cannot answer that; but this I know, that, as in the case of the Irish payments, that which I paid was paid formerly twice in the week, as an instance of rapid payment, is now postponed for a much longer time. The quarterly payments may postpone the time of payment to the Exchequer, and prolong the time in which these moneys remain to the cash or the drawing account of the Paymaster.

614. Chairman.] With regard to Exchequer bills, do you receive any sums of money on account of Exchequer bills from the Paymaster?—Yes, there have been transactions between me and the Paymaster, where Exchequer bills are issued for the ordinary service, to be sold in the market, to meet the public demand. Issues are made, in Exchequer bills, to the Paymaster for that purpose, he standing now in the position in which the Paymaster of the Exchequer bills, whose office has been very wisely abolished, formerly did. I believe that was the origin of it. I may be directed to make an issue in bills to the Paymaster or the Bank; I make the issue as if I was making it by the Exchequer credit. The Committee will distinguish those bills from the ordinary bills of supply, which are exchanged at periodical times, and also from the deficiency bills. These bills are issued for ways and means purposes.

615. That is in cases in which, instead of issuing an Exchequer credit, you issue Exchequer bills?—Precisely so.

616. Has any question arisen between you and the Paymaster as to such issue?—A question has arisen between me and the Treasury, not the Paymaster. Whether it led to any correspondence between the Treasury and the Paymaster I cannot tell, but it did between me and the Treasury. There was a difference of opinion upon that subject, the papers respecting which are deserving of attention.

See Appendix.

617. In some years there has been a considerable premium upon Exchequer Bills; if you issue Exchequer bills and those Exchequer bills are to be sold in the market at a premium, what becomes of that premium?—That was the question at issue between me and the Treasury. It arose in this fashion. I am dealing with a case in which the bills go to the Paymaster; somebody has to sell them in the market. Suppose the unexhausted vote for Army Services was 500,000 l., and no more; that I was required by the Treasury to pay that sum in bills, and not in money; to issue 500,000 l., and to supply Exchequer bills to the Paymaster to satisfy that Army vote in place of a credit; suppose the Paymaster were enabled to sell those bills at a premium, realising a premium of 500 l. If I did not call for the repayment of this sum of 500 l. in excess of the vote, I should then have supplied the Paymaster with 500,500 l. applicable to Army Services, when, in point of fact, I had an unexhausted vote of 500,000 l. only.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

only. My duties prescribe that I should not issue or sanction the issue of more than Parliament has granted. I held that to restrain me from doing that act indirectly which I am restrained from doing directly. Therefore, in issuing supply bills of this character, I required the Treasury to pay back to the Consolidated Fund at the Exchequer whatever amount of premium might be realised by that sale; that is, that when I had only 500,000 l. as a balance of the Army vote which I was at liberty by law to advance to the army, that I should advance that sum and no more for that purpose.

618. Mr. Hankey.] In the meantime you have over-issued?—Not if the bills were disposed of at par; but if they were sold at a premium, I should then have violated the intentions of Parliament by giving the amount that was voted for the Army, plus the premium upon the bills. I found the Treasury were not disposed to adopt that view of the case. The correspondence on this important question is necessary for its explanation.

619. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] What was the date of this correspondence?—It commenced on the 13th of December 1853, closed 8th August 1854. I stated in my letter to the Treasury, which can be furnished to the Committee if they wish it, the necessity of a special entry being made of this, with respect to the rate of premium that might be received upon the bills, that unless this was done it would affect the public accounts, the Appropriation Act, and it affected also the Exchequer control. I received a letter from the Treasury in reply, on January the 11th, 1854, and there it was stated that the bills were computed at par in the Appropriation Act; that the Exchequer control applied only to them at par; and that the premium or discount question lay not between the Exchequer and the Treasury, but between the Treasury and Parliament. My answer was, that if I got no repayment of the excess of issue, a failure in showing the just balance would be inevitable. I stated that I willingly adopted the principle of the Exchequer control being confined to the exact vote as detailed in the Appropriation Act, provided that any sum received as premium should be paid to the Exchequer, and carried to the Consolidated Fund; I should then have expressly carried into effect the intentions of Parliament. I said, as to the essential and constitutional principle of accounting for the premium on those bills, that it was the Comptroller-general's primary duty, to check and to prevent the possibility of misappropriation of the public money, to any issues unsanctioned by Parliament, or exceeding the amount sanctioned by the law; and therefore that any premium in the case stated would be an over-issue contrary to law, unless repaid to the Exchequer account, and was therefore open to objection. I referred to former proceedings, and especially to a correspondence between the Treasury and the Audit Board in 1829. I did not consider that I was acting contrary to my functions. I received from the Treasury that which seemed to me to concede the point, namely, that they did not doubt that the amount of the premiums should be accounted for, and paid into the Exchequer; but they added that it was not a question with which I had anything to do, but that it was a matter between the Treasury and Parliament. My answer was: that it was a matter of appropriation and not of mere account; that it depended upon the fundamental principle belonging to my office by law of allowing no issue of money, under any circumstances, beyond the sums by law appointed. I had hoped that the matter was satisfactorily disposed of by the Treasury order to pay me the premium, which was all I had asked. I, however, got a repetition of their opinion, that they could not admit the Exchequer authority in the matter; that the duty was imposed upon the Audit Commissioners, and that such powers were wholly inconsistent with the duties and functions of the Exchequer; that if the issues were correctly set forth in the imprest certificates, the Auditors would see that the premium was accounted for. I then transmitted a statement of the whole of the circumstances to the Audit Office, the Auditors having enforced from the Comptroller-general of the Exchequer in 1829 an account of the premium upon Exchequer bills; and I hold in my hand all the ancient authorities in which the premium was accounted for to the Treasury. Here they are in the original Exchequer entries: 1,232 l., at one time, from Lushington & Hill; about 3,000 l. at another time, and 73,000 l. at another time paid into the Exchequer by the Secretaries of the Treasury, being the premium on Exchequer bills sold. I felt I was therefore bound to say, "You for your vote shall get the amount which Parliament has voted you, but if you realise more by the sale of the bills, you ought to pay that back to the Exchequer." I think that question is now settled; but I feel it right to mention it, as the question has been agitated, that The House may consider whether I was right in administering the laws committed to me on that occasion as I did, and in declining to abandon my own proper function in expectation that another department, that of the Auditors, would fulfil this duty. My duty is to prevent an undue issue, and that I endeavoured to perform. The following show the former precedents of repayments, which did not take place through the Auditors, the department to which I was referred.

Sir, Audit Office, 28 Oct. 1829.

I AM directed to observe that the provisions contained in the 1st & 2d George 4, c. 121, for distinguishing in the imprest certificates the issues made in Exchequer Bills from those made in cash, were founded on the recommendations contained in the Fifth Report of the Committee on the Public Expenditure, on the ground, as stated in the Report, that it was extremely important that the Auditors of Public Accounts should be made acquainted with the description of the issue in order that parties receiving bills instead of cash might be made to account for the interest of such bills.

I have, &c.

G. Bedford, Esq. (signed) John Lewis Mallet.

620. Do you receive any other payments from Exchequer bills?—The more ordinary way of disposing of Exchequer bills, laying aside the ordinary exchanges, would be by arrangements between the Government and the Bank of England. Thus, in relation to 1,000,000 l. bills purchased by the Bank in February and March 1840, the Bank subsequently placed 2,500 l. to the Exchequer account as premium on these bills. It was for this principle that I contended, and sought to enforce, but which the Treasury denied to come within my functions and duties. There can be no difficulty arising there. The only other mode of receiving money upon or through Exchequer bills is by loans made from the Bank on Deficiency bills, the use of which I need not explain to the gentlemen in this room. These bills are securities resorted to generally at the commencement of the quarter for obtaining a temporary loan from the Bank of England sufficient to supply the difference between the balances in the Exchequer and the amount which is payable on the quarter day to the public creditor, and to other persons interested in the quarterly payments.

621. How is that account settling the amount of the Deficiency bills made out?—The account depends upon the principle of striking the balance, namely, ascertaining what money is in the Exchequer; and, on the other hand, the charges on the Consolidated Fund which are due at that period. If the Exchequer monies were 3,000,000 l., and the charges 4,000,000 l., an issue of Deficiency bills bills to the Bank, and an advance of 1,000,000*l.* from the Bank would be necessary to enable the Treasury to supply means to make those payments. Therefore the mode of striking that balance becomes a material matter.

622. Do you furnish that account to the Treasury, or in what way is the account made up, because the accounts do not always tally?—I will explain to the Committee what the old practice was till a late period, what the alteration has been, and consequently what it is now. The old practice, certainly, from the 57th of George the Third (1817), the Act under which deficiency bills are made out, was this: the day before the close of the quarter, an able and confidential man, a clerk of the Treasury, known to gentlemen here, Mr. Dwight, came over to the Exchequer to compare the accounts with the chief accountant of the Exchequer. There was no difficulty in ascertaining from our own books the amount of money in the Exchequer; that could be done without fail; but for the purpose of ascertaining the charge on the Consolidated Fund, that could not be completed at the Exchequer. The law shows the power the Treasury possesses, in many instances, of making charges on the Consolidated Fund, but not the amount of the charge made. Mr. Dwight came over to the Exchequer, met my chief accountant, and they went through each for himself the quarterly account, making up their joint view of the charge as it then stood. If there was a case that led to any difference of opinion, that case would have been necessarily brought before me; the transaction was most usefully carried on for the public, and done in perfect union between the two parties. In order to make up the amount of charge, a document was produced from the Treasury, which was termed the Consolidated Fund warrant for the quarter. I hold in my hand one that reached my department. It was invariably prepared at the Treasury, though, when first produced for this comparison, it was not yet signed. It was subsequently signed by the members of the Board of Treasury, and it contained a recital of the payments to be charged on the Consolidated Fund; that was brought me just the day before the quarter-day; consequently a few additional payments were not quite closed at the time this account was furnished, but it was quite enough for calculation; the additional accounts, which were generally trivial matters, were inserted in pencil. When the parties had agreed upon the amount of charge, that was compared with the amount of Exchequer balance, and then I was called upon, in conformity with the invariable usage of the Exchequer, to furnish the Treasury Board with a certificate, of which I hold the original in my hand. Upon the faith of this Exchequer certificate, signed by me, the Treasury warrant was founded. The warrant was to the following effect: "Whereas by the certificate hereunto annexed, and transmitted to us by the Comptroller-general of Her Majesty's Exchequer at Westminster, it appears that the produce of the Consolidated Fund arising in Great Britain will be insufficient to defray the charge thereon, in the quarter ending the 5th of July, by the sum of 4,000,000*l.*; these are to give you a warrant to issue Deficiency bills to that extent," &c. Such was the course of practice at that time. Thus I gave my certificate of the amount of Deficiency bills, and the Treasury recited that certificate in their warrant; and that was published to the whole world as being the maximum amount of the Deficiency bills that would then be required. This was done not only as the opinion of the Treasury, but as the judgment of an independent officer certifying to this important fact.

623. Is that the course at present?—No, it is not.

624. What alteration has been made?—The alteration that was made was, the withdrawal in the notice to me of the information that was contained in the Consolidated Fund warrant; I therefore ceased to have the means of certifying to the Treasury the amount of Deficiency bills that were to be issued, and the Treasury were obliged to alter the form of their warrant, and to make it an act and authority of their own, in place of being an act vouched and certified by me; and the Deficiency bills were issued upon a totally different authority from that which had previously existed; such is the change. I felt it my duty in consequence, when furnishing my quarterly account to the Treasury, the Bank of England and the Commissioners of the National Debt, to state why those accounts were defective, and why I could no longer answer for the correctness of the balance on which depended the issue of Deficiency bills.

625. Sir H. Willoughby.] At what time was that change made?—The change took place in the year 1854. The correspondence is long, but important. See Appendix.

I can

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

2 June 1856.

I can give the dates, and the correspondence books are open to the Members of the Committee, and some of this correspondence, I think, ought to be adverted to in detail. I stated that the necessity for ascertaining the surplus or deficiency of the quarter was for the purpose of enabling the Comptroller to furnish the certificate on which the warrant for making out the Deficiency bills finally rests, and for continuing the subsequent issues upon the Consolidated Fund. I lost the complete power which previously existed, which was abolished contrary to all precedent and all usage in the office; and whatever advantage was derived from having a check interposed was thereby entirely withdrawn. The change was made contemporaneously with the change in the manner of issuing and dealing with Deficiency bills, but it in fact amounted to this, that previously the amount of Deficiency bills was checked by an independent officer, and after that time it rested upon the arbitrament of the Treasury. I can refer to all the dates of the correspondence, and the results of the proceeding. I stated that my duty was to guard against any Treasury abuse or negligence in their department. In consequence of this abandonment some trivial errors have occurred. This change was made contemporaneously with the abandonment on the part of the Treasury of the ancient and invariable method of providing for the payment of the dividends; the two objects seem connected. The papers are before Parliament—No. 465, 1855.

626. Chairman.] Did the Treasury state any grounds for declining to give you the information which you required?—The objection stated to the former practice, and I think it was a valid and good objection (if it could not have been easily and effectually removed), was the labour to the Treasury in preparing this warrant in the great detail in which it was given, because, as there were Issuing Warrants which afterwards came before me, it amounted to double work. I think that the Treasury were quite justified in objecting to that course of proceeding; but what I suggested when called upon was, that on withdrawing this charging warrant they should give me the issuing warrants at least a day before the quarter-day. I could then have ascertained, as I did before, that the Deficiency bills included in the warrant were what the law required. I should have had an effective power of check; I could have issued my certificate, the form of the Treasury warrant would have remained unchanged, and my quarterly accounts would have been correctly completed. The contrary of this is now the case; I am deprived of the means I had for performing my official duties. I was in hopes that the arrangement I suggested would have been carried into effect. I think the subject ought to be reconsidered. I believe the papers are still in the hands of the highest authorities in the Treasury, but as yet I have received no reply to the final statement which I laid before them. In all other issues of Exchequer bills I have an authority of some kind or another laid before me, but in this case the authority has been withdrawn.

627. Mr. Wilson.] You have alluded to two questions of Exchequer bills; first, the issue of ways and means bills, for the purpose of the current expenditure of the quarter; and secondly, with regard to the purpose of Deficiency bills; now the power which the Treasury has to issue ways and means bills, or in other words Exchequer bills to the aid of the ways and means of the year, is derived from an Act of Parliament, is it not?—Certainly.

628. There is no question, therefore, of the legality of the power of the Treasury to create ways and means bills in any one quarter, payable out of the revenues of the following quarter, for the purpose of aiding the receipts of the current quarter for the payments of the Supply services of the year?—The bills which you have described are not the bills in question; you are describing the Consolidated Fund bills. The bills to which, I presume, the question points are ordinary Exchequer bills, not issued for exchange, but to provide for the demands of the year.

629. With regard to the question which you have raised, it makes no difference what bills they are; they are Exchequer bills for Supply services; the bills to which you referred were bills issued under an Act of Parliament; there was no question, therefore, as to the authority of the Treasury to issue those bills?—None in the least.

630. The Act of Parliament authorised the Treasury to issue a certain number of Exchequer bills expressed in money; a definite sum of money?—Yes; 500,000*l.*

631. In the case which you have put, if you had standing at the Exchequer an an unappropriated balance of a vote for the Army services of 500,000*l.*, and if the Treasury had a power by Act of Parliament to issue 500,000*l.* worth of Exchequer bills, is it not clearly in the discretion of the Treasury, whether they request you to make an issue of money upon the Exchequer account, or to issue 500,000*l.* of Exchequer bills under the Act of Parliament?—The money issue and the bill issue are identical as enabling the Treasury to obtain the command of ways and means to pay a given Supply service; both the money and the bills are ways and means; the sum of Supply is fixed and determinate, being by the hypothesis 500,000*l.*; the Treasury have a full command of the ways and means, but they know well, and the House of Commons knows well, that they have no right to apply a larger amount of ways and means than the Supply which that ways and means is intended to cover; they have a right to take either money or Exchequer bills, but in either case they have no right to more than the Supply of 500,000*l.*, and it is my duty to prevent their getting it.

632. Is there anything in the Appropriation Act which gives the Treasury the power of issuing upon Army services, of which suppose this 500,000*l.* to be the unexhausted balance, or is there anything in the Act of Parliament which gives them the power of issuing Exchequer bills, to designate or to point out any question of premium or of discount upon which the Exchequer bills may be sold, at which they may be disposed of, or do not the whole of the Acts of Parliament proceed upon fixed and definite sums, supposing them to be taken at par?—The Act of Parliament provides ways and means to meet the Supplies, and the issue of the ways and means is strictly limited by those Supplies. There is no authority vested in the State to issue one penny-piece of ways and means exceeding the supply that is granted to Her Majesty. There may be in money an excess of ways and means double the amount of the Army wants, but not one penny-piece can be issued beyond the Supply granted. So it is in Exchequer bills. It is a general constitutional principle, which lies at the A B C of all Parliamentary action, that not one penny-piece can or ought to be issued for the Supply service beyond the amount of that Supply. Whether you get it from money or Exchequer bills it is absolutely immaterial.

633. If Parliament gives the Treasury authority to issue a certain amount of Exchequer bills, does Parliament recognise in any way the price at which those Exchequer bills may be disposed of in the market?—Certainly not, because Parliament could not effect an impossibility.

634. Would it be in the power of the Treasury or in the control of the Exchequer, at the time that the issue of the Exchequer bills was made, to state to a precise certainty what amount of money those Exchequer bills would furnish to the public revenue?—Not at the time, but it would be enabled to ascertain in the way suggested by my interposition, that if more were received upon the Exchequer bills than was justified by the vote in supply, that excess should be paid back to the credit of the public; because if you will permit me to make one single suggestion, you will see the consequence of establishing the principle for which your question is contending. Supposing this occurrence took place, that Exchequer bills were at a great discount, and the Army required 500,000*l.* of services, and I were to issue to the Army no more than the 500,000*l.* when they were at 20*s.* discount, I should be entitled to charge the Army with the whole 500,000*l.*, because I have given them 500,000*l.* in Exchequer bills; I hold that the case is exactly the same. They are entitled to get the amount of their money vote out of the ways and means granted; if the ways and means produce more, they are bound to pay it back.

635. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Do not you apprehend that in the case which you suppose, you would be bound to charge the entire amount, even though they were at a discount?—No, not in the least; I should be fully entitled to provide for it by the Army vote by the ways and means placed at the disposal of the public. This principle is best illustrated by reference to the words of any Ways and Means Act. Take, as an example, 19 Vict. c. 19: "It shall be lawful for the Treasury to issue and apply all such money as shall be raised by Exchequer Bills to be made out in pursuance of this Act to such service as shall have been voted," &c. &c. The same principle is affirmed with still greater distinctness in the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 136.

636. Mr. Wilson.] Has there ever been a question, or was there ever a question raised in the case to which you refer, as to whether the excess of premium received upon those Exchequer bills should be repaid to the Consolidated Fund?—I wish that correspondence to be distinctly before the Committee. I will put in the return, and they will see that the original point was an objection altogether to admit any obligation of repaying the premium. I showed them Mr. Hill's precedents, Mr. Planta's precedents, and Mr. Lushington's precedents, and then they told me that it was not a question about paying in, but about my having the right to look into the matter; they said that it rested between them and Parliament.

637. Was it ever disputed on the part of the Treasury that the sum of the premium obtained upon those Exchequer bills should be accounted for to the Consolidated Fund?—It never was stated, directly or indirectly, that it was to be so accounted for to the Consolidated Fund, because that was what I contended for; it could not be accounted for to the Consolidated Fund without paying it in to the Exchequer; and it was that proposition, and my duty to enforce it, that the Treasury never would assent to.

638. Have you in your hand the first letter which you received from the Treasury upon that subject?—No, I have not; I have a précis, and I can get the original paper.

639. If you will refer to the original paper, I think you will find in the last paragraph of that letter a distinct statement that the Treasury never disputed that point, but distinctly admitted that the premium must be paid into the Consolidated Fund?—The case originated in December 1853; the first letter from the Treasury that of 11 January, written in reply, contains no such admission, so far as I remember. On the contrary, it states that the bills were computed at par in the Appropriation Act, that the Exchequer control applies to them only at par, and that premium or discount was a question between the Treasury and Parliament. The letter to which the honourable Member refers was in April 1855. On 31 January 1854, it is true the Treasury authorised an order, placing to the Exchequer account the money arising from premium and interest on the Supply bills issued in the previous quarter; and on 5 April they stated that they never doubted but that the amount of premium should be accounted for and paid to the Exchequer; but they still maintained that this was a question between them and Parliament, and not between them and the Exchequer. I asserted, on the contrary, that it was binding on me, in the control of the issues, that I should not issue for a certain service more than the amount voted by Parliament; for that I contended, and I could not get it admitted.

640. Am I to understand you still to state that the Treasury ever contended that the premium upon those bills should not be accounted for to the Exchequer?—They did, surely, in denying my duty of control; they never stated that it was to be accounted for to the Exchequer. On the contrary, when I requested them to account for it to the Exchequer, they stated that it was to be accounted for, I know not how, to Parliament, but they withdrew it from the control of my office.

641. Are you aware that those bills were issued in the currency of the last quarter of 1853 for Supply services?—Yes.

642. Are you aware that they were issued through the Bank of England, and accounted for by the Bank of England at the end of the quarter to the Treasury?—No, I think not; my recollection is, that the bills in question were sent to the Bank, that they should be placed to the Paymaster's account by the Bank. Payments of premium, or of the interest due on the bills, were made at a subsequent time. Still even on 20 July 1854, the Treasury report that they cannot admit the authority of the Exchequer in this matter, considering the duty to belong to the auditors. I stated, with respect to bills sold to the Bank, that I could at once know from the daily returns from the Bank what the bargain was; I should see at once whether there was a premium repaid; but in the case I have stated, I was obliged to bring it to the point of adding, that if the Treasury did not admit the principle of Exchequer control, I must resort to some other mode of computing issues in bills that would be more complicated and inconvenient; this was on 7th April. It was, in other words, saying that I should ascertain what the premium was, and that I should call upon the Treasury for that exact amount.

643. You are not aware, you say, that those bills were negotiated through the the Bank of England?—Not from memory. I tender you the letters and correspondence, which will speak for themselves.

644. Have not you already stated that that amount of premium was paid into the Exchequer, and accounted for in the month of January 1854?—Yes, but even after that paying back, there was a re-assertion of the principle that it was no portion of the Exchequer duty to enforce this responsibility for the amount of premium.

645. Was not the distinction this, that the Treasury never for a moment doubted or stated that the premium obtained upon those Exchequer bills for the amount more than the issue from the Exchequer, should be paid back into the Exchequer as a receipt or profit, because that was what it was; but that it did not fall to the duty of the Comptroller of the Exchequer either to require or to be responsible for the amount of that premium; that it was a question of profit and receipt in the sale of Exchequer bills for which the Treasury was responsible?—They stated that they were not responsible to me. They stated in the first communication that they were responsible to Parliament; in the second they stated that their responsibility was to the auditors, but so late as in July 1854 the Treasury repeated their opinion that they could not admit the Exchequer authority in this matter; that the duty imposed upon the Audit Commissioners, and such powers as I had claimed, were wholly inconsistent with the duties and functions of the Exchequer. If the issues were correctly set forth in the imprest certificates from the Exchequer to the Audit Board, the Commissioners would then see the profit made upon them satisfactorily accounted for. I therefore entered in my accounts to the Audit Board a memorandum, in which I called attention to the 1,750,000 l. Exchequer bills issued for voted services at par, and I stated to the auditors, that if any premium had been realised, this must be in excess of the vote. I wrote to the Treasury about the same time, replying to their letter of the 20th of July, that as the Treasury stated that if any profit had been realised on the 1,750,000 l., it would have been paid to the credit of the public, I considered this question to be closed. As to the difference of opinion with regard to the obligation of repayment, I referred to my former letter on the views of the law and Exchequer usage adhering to my original statement.

646. With regard to those Exchequer bills, your duty as Comptroller of the Exchequer is to see that the Treasury do not issue a greater amount of Exchequer bills as ways and means than the Act of Parliament enables them to do? That was one duty, but not the only duty. I was also bound by law, and by the usage of the House of Commons itself in its votes, to make my issue of ways and means coincident with the votes of the supply.

647. And according to the Act of Parliament those issues might be made to a certain extent in Exchequer bills?—Certainly.

648. Is it competent for you as Comptroller of the Exchequer to recognise any other sum than the sum stated in the Act of Parliament as the amount of Exchequer bills that may be issued?—I think, whether the ways and means are issued in one way or another, I am equally bound to see that the Treasury gets all that it asks for, and if I have them not, and am driven upon Exchequer bills, my duty is to see that they get no more than the vote; the express words of the law prescribe this.

649. No more than the Act of Parliament enables them to draw?—No more than the Vote of Supply requires and justifies.

650. That amount may be paid either in money or in Exchequer bills up to the sum which Parliament has enabled the Treasury to issue?—I take the Exchequer bills all to represent the money, and I am bound to supply money, ways and means, to meet a given amount; the Exchequer bills are only the mode of raising that money, and if they produced a premium upon them I was not justified in issuing more than Parliament voted. I refer to the mode of dealing with these Exchequer Bills, as set forth in the Ways and Means Acts of Appropriation; take, as an example, 19 Vict. c. 19, and also 18 & 19 Vict. c. 130.

651. Supposing we had unexhausted of the army vote in our hands 500,000*l.*, and supposing that we had unexhausted of our ways and means 500,000*l.* of Exchequer bills unissued, the use of those Exchequer bills in the Appropriation Act would exactly balance the amount of the votes for army services; suppose we were to call upon you to issue 500,000*l.* of Exchequer bills upon army services, and suppose that that 500,000*l.* was sold in the market at a discount of 20*s.*, would you feel justified in granting a further issue for army services upon your Exchequer account in the Bank of England to make up the loss upon those bills?—I think I should be fully justified, if so directed, in relation to the issues of ways and means, in issuing, whether out of one fund, or out of the other, or out of a combination of both, sufficient ways and means to cover the amount of supply. I have already stated that the Exchequer bills are described, by the Acts regulating their issues, as the means for raising money rather than money itself. I think I should be justified in thus making up the 500,000*l.* if it were there; if it were not there, the only result would be that the Treasury would find, from the unfortunate state of the Exchequer-bill market (which now and then happens), that they might have had, as far as the ways and means in bills were concerned, less voted than answered the public service. If by the price of the Exchequer-bill market you had not the means of getting money enough to answer your army vote of 500,000*l.*, but you had 500,000*l.* unissued out of the Consolidated Fund, I think the Treasury would be perfectly justified in asking me to give the full 500,000*l.* ways and means; and if the deficiency was a deficiency in bills, to make up that deficiency out of the Consolidated Fund.

652. Then you think that the sum granted by the Appropriation Act for a specific vote may be exceeded to any extent; that there may be a loss or a discount upon Exchequer bills which have been issued upon behalf of those ways and means?—My argument is that the vote ought never to be exceeded; neither ought it, as long as the Exchequer holds ways and means, to be left less. The public service ought not to suffer by reason of the financial condition of the market. If it was 400,000*l.* that you wanted in Exchequer bills, and you could not get your money to the extent of 400,000*l.*, if you asked for 420,000*l.* I should hold that I was bound to give it you for the army service, to sell more Exchequer bills; that is, dealing with Exchequer bills as the means of raising money; but if there were no more Exchequer bills in my possession, but I had ways and means from the Consolidated Fund, I was equally bound, as long as I had ways and means, to give to the Treasury, when duly required to do so, such an amount of ways and means as were necessary to cover the supply which had been granted to Her Majesty.

653. Supposing the army services were 10,000,000*l.*, and we had issued 9,500,000*l.* from the Exchequer account in the Consolidated Fund, and there was 500,000*l.* then remaining of unissued vote, and suppose we had a power to issue 500,000*l.* of Exchequer bills, and that we requested you to make an issue of that 500,000*l.*, but instead of yielding 500,000*l.* they yielded 450,000*l.*, would you feel justified in making an issue of the other 50,000*l.*, the vote having been exhausted from the general ways and means in your possession?—All ways and means are applicable to all supply services. It is an entire misapprehension to consider that there are ways and means for the army only; all ways and means are applicable to all supply services; and if I had ways and means of any kind to answer what Parliament had voted, I should be bound to issue it.

654. Suppose that the Army Estimates are 10,000,000*l.*, you are aware that Royal Orders are issued for the 10.000,000*l.*; when an issue is ordered upon those Royal Orders, it is provided for, by the regulations of the two offices, that we intimate to you upon each issue the amount which has been issued, and the amount now required to be issued; and the balance, if any, left in your hand, is a memorandum at each office for the convenience of the two departments. Now supposing at the close of the year, at the last order which we make upon you to issue upon behalf of the army services, there is issued of the amount of the Royal Order for 10,000,000*l.*, 9,500,000*l.*, leaving a balance of 500,000*l.*, and we give you an order to issue 500,000*l.* of Exchequer bills to balance that vote, would you consider that that vote, then, for the year, was closed in your books?—No; I have already stated that if that 500,000*l.* only realised 450,000*l.*, and your vote in supply was 500,000*l.*, and I had other ways and means in my possession, I think I should be bound to make up the amount of ways and means to you.

655. Am I to understand that, having exhausted the Royal Order, and having exhausted exhausted the vote of Parliament in your books, if we at the Treasury were to intimate to you a month afterwards that that 500,000 l. had produced us only 450,000 l. by selling them in the market, you would feel justified in exceeding the Royal Order, and in exceeding the vote of Parliament, and issuing, in order to make up that loss, another 50,000 l. to the army services?—I entirely differ from the statement of the question. I deny that I should be exceeding the vote of Parliament if I were providing the Government with ways and means which I held in my hands that did not exceed the supply voted. With respect to the Royal Order (we are dealing with hypothetical cases; no Government would allow this case to occur; it would take care of itself), it is another thing. The Honourable Gentleman is aware that the habit is not to issue the Royal Order for the whole amount of the army votes; the habit is to issue them from time to time; and though they are authorised in large sums of 2,000,000*l.*, 3,000,000 l., or 4,000,000 l., or 400,000 l. or 500,000 l., they are issued according as both supplies and ways and means are voted, and they cannot by possibility go beyond the supplies voted, accompanied by covering votes in ways and means; therefore, before you got to your last Royal Order, you would have been able to look round you, and see how you could provide for this case. But there can be no hesitation in saying that, Parliament having voted ways and means to cover the supply services, if they are exhausted, I think the provisions of the Act will enable them to issue ways and means to cover the supply. But as I have just stated, I consider these cases as hypothetical altogether.

656. If there are ways and means provided in the Appropriation Act of a certain amount of Exchequer bills, you do not regard that amount as being taken for cash, but as being taken for whatever indefinite and undetermined sum they may produce?—Those Exchequer bills are given as an alternative for payments from the Consolidated Fund. The last Ways and Means Act, you will see, gives the alternative to the Government of making advances of certain sums from the Consolidated Fund, or making advances by Exchequer bills; they have the alternative of doing the one or the other, and that alternative, I have no doubt, they would use prudently. They have not the power of issuing both sums; it is not a cumulative power, but an alternative power, and, therefore, when the Government came to the position of finding that they could not issue without losing by Exchequer bills, they would take the other alternative.

657. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Your view is, that when Parliament confers upon the Government the authority of issuing 100,000 l. in Exchequer bills, that is not to be taken as the sum of 100,000 l. in money, but as the power of issuing securities represented by 100,000 l., and that the value is to be estimated at what they will fetch in the market?—Yes, precisely; I refer to the words of the Statute.

658. Is it possible for the Treasury, or the Comptroller of the Exchequer, in all cases, to estimate with certainty the value of a large issue of Exchequer bills before it is made?—Certainly not.

659. If 500,000 l. or 1,000,000 l. of Exchequer bills is issued at the same time, does not it depend upon whether that issue is made upon a previous agreement, for example, with the Bank of England, or whether it is made in the open market, and that large sum is brought at once upon the market?—It does clearly; but the alternative being to the Government either of issuing positively in money or in Exchequer bills, if the difficulty were to arise that was suggested, of making the amount of Exchequer bills less than the amount of ways and means which they were requiring to use, they would then have recourse to the Consolidated Fund issues, and would make issues from thence, and square their account in that way.

660. If your principle is adopted, the value of an issue of Exchequer bills would depend upon circumstances which the Comptroller of the Exchequer would be unable to estimate when the issue was made?—Yes; and therefore the suggestion that I made was adhering strictly to the previous practice, which was, that if the sale of the Exchequer bills produced more than the vote required, that difference should be paid over to me; then I was quite sure my duty was complied with, that I did not place at the disposal of the Treasury, upon which I am check, more than the amount which Parliament intended.

661. Was not that course adopted in the case to which you refer?—It was adopted after a long and somewhat painful discussion.

2 June 1856.

662. Still that course was adopted?—That decision to which the right honourable gentleman refers, as will be seen in the correspondence, was adopted, but the principle was resisted up to the last moment, namely, that I was to be placed in a position which enabled the Treasury to obtain for the public service more than Parliament intended.

663. Have you any objection to make to the practice which was adopted upon that occasion?—I have the greatest possible objection, if it is considered that the Treasury doctrine was a true one, and that I had not a right to enforce the principle of issuing no more than was the amount voted. I hold in my hand now the Appropriation Act of 1830, which explains all that I have said; the Acts are all in the same way. The first section provides that there shall be applied for the service of the year 1830, 1,500,000 l. out of the Consolidated Fund. Then there is an alternative power given of raising by Exchequer bills the 1,500,000 l., and the Bank is authorised to advance, notwithstanding the Statute of William, upon the security of those bills. It is quite clear, therefore, that the Government, if it cannot do it advantageously in one way, will do it in the other.

664. With regard to what I understand to be the present practice, if an issue of Exchequer bills is made, that issue is stated, in the first instance in your books, according to the apparent value of the Exchequer bills?—It is separated as a separate account. In this account, for instance, I separate the issues in Exchequer bills from the issues in money, so as to call the attention of Parliament to the difference between the two.

665. If by the sale of those Exchequer bills, a profit is made, that excess is paid into the Exchequer?—It ought to be.

666. Would it not be according to the present practice?—I do not know whether it would or not. The Treasury disputed and refused to acquiesce in my calling for the repayment.

667. If it should turn out that the practice is as I have stated to you, is there anything objectionable in that practice?—Not in the slightest degree, if it is recognised as a matter of principle and right that the Treasury is to repay the premium upon Exchequer bills when that premium has been realised; that is all that I have ever suggested as being right, but that I hold to be right, and I think that the Comptroller-general is bound to enforce it. There is, however, a better practice which would avoid all these difficulties: sell the Exchequer bills, pay the proceeds into the Consolidated Fund, and issue credits from thence as the public service legally demands. Thus all difficulties respecting premiums and discounts will be avoided, and the principle of the Ways and Means Acts will be carried out.

668. Mr. Wilson.] Would you not hold equally as a principle that the Treasury are bound to pay to the Exchequer any sums of money arising from profits of any kind that arise from any source?—If they come from any source applicable to the public service they are bound to pay. If any departments thought that they could retain in their own hands, to be employed at their own discretion, any sums that had come into their hands, profit or otherwise, I think they would be acting illegally and wrongfully.

669. The simple question is, Is the Treasury not bound to pay into the Exchequer to the public account whatever monies may come into their hands, whether from the profit of the sale of Exchequer bills or from any other source whatever?—Certainly not. For instance, all the repayments made to the Commissariat chest of advances that have been made, I do not think they are bound to pay over. But I believe profits made are repaid; I refer, for instance, to profits on remittances to Hanover for the German legion.

670. Is not that an independent fund, independent of the Exchequer altogether?—Precisely; but the question that you put was a general question.

671. There are sums of profit and original receipts in the shape of profit which may come on behalf of the public into the Treasury in any shape whatever; is not the Treasury bound in its duty to account for that in the Exchequer?—My own impression is, that if it be unappropriated public money it should come back to the Exchequer. If it was a payment upon account of Civil Contingencies, or any other specific account of that description, I do not say that it should come back to the Exchequer. With respect to profits, I think the alternative is, that they have a right to keep the profits, and if they have have a right to keep them they have a right to employ them, and that would surely be contrary to law.

672. You do not entertain it as an opinion that the Treasury would have a right to keep the profits and employ them?—On the contrary, I say that they ought not. The profits are all public money, and, if unappropriated, they should go back to the Exchequer, and be issued under the Appropriation Act.

673. From whatever original source the Treasury may derive money of any kind, as original receipts, it is clearly their duty to place them in the Exchequer, whether profits arising from Exchequer bills, or from any other source?—I am not prepared to affirm that so absolutely, without knowing what the cases may be.

674. Suppose the sale of an estate vested in the Treasury, and the purchase-money comes into the hands of the Treasury, would it not be the duty of the Treasury to place that in the Exchequer?—I believe the sales of land under the Woods and Forests do not go back to the Exchequer, and would not. If the honourable gentleman will ask me a particular case, I will give him a particular answer; but when he says all cases of all profits, I must know what those cases are. The supposition of the sale of an estate entered in the Treasury is too vague; I must know what estate, how vested, and under what authority sold, before it is possible to answer the question.

675. Your Lordship is aware that the Woods and Forests are Crown property, and the capital account is a distinct thing altogether from the public moneys; but suppose there were a quantity of barrack property, which is clearly public property, and the Treasury were to order that property to be sold, and the moneys clearly belonged to the public and not to the Crown, would it not be the distinct duty of the Treasury to pay such moneys as those into the Exchequer?—I think it would, unless some other course were directed by Statute.

676. With regard to the quarterly account upon which the deficiency bills are made out, you used the word "check," and you spoke of the change which had taken place by not furnishing the copies of those warrants in duplicate, over and over again; you said that the change had withdrawn from you and from the public a check upon the exact amount which the deficiency bills ought to represent; what is the nature of the check that is altered?—The nature of the check was this: the power of issuing deficiency bills is one which is most important, not only to the Government, but important to the public at large. Under the former practice, by the words of the Treasury Warrant which I read, the maximum amount that could be issued was, by the Treasury, declared to rest upon the Comptroller-general's certificate as well as upon their own warrant. The certificate was signed by an independent officer, after a careful examination of the facts. There was therefore a perfect security that the amount thus stated was the maximum, and the correct amount that was to be issued. At the present time the Treasury have been constrained to alter the form of their warrant, and it rests merely upon their own declaration without any check at all.

677. In what respect is the form of their warrant altered?—It is altered in this respect, that whereas the former warrant recited the Comptroller-general's certificate (a copy of which certificate I have here) as being the foundation of the order for making out deficiency bills, which certificate the Treasury thus gave to the public; at the present time it is merely a warrant which recites the judgment of the Treasury, unsupported by any foundation whatever but their own arbitrament.

678. Was not the account made up at the Treasury an account of the whole charges upon the Consolidated Fund upon which you yourself certified?—It was made up at the Treasury, but that account was examined at my office, because I never would have given that certificate without having perfect official cognizance that the deficiency stated was the difference between the Exchequer monies and the demands upon the Consolidated Fund. These are the words of my certificate, "I hereby certify that the amount received on account of the Consolidated Fund in Great Britain will be insufficient to defray the charge thereon for the quarter ended the 5th of July 1854, by the sum of 4,029,289*l.*;" and that certificate is recited in the Treasury warrant, and upon that certificate authority is given.

679. Had you any other means of knowing what the amount of those charges was to be, excepting the means furnished by the Treasury?—Yes.

680. What means?—The great bulk of the charges upon the Consolidated Fund go on from quarter to quarter and from year to year; there is the question of the charges for the Civil List, the Judges' salaries, and a variety of other things of that description; they are, to a certain extent, similar in corresponding quarters, subject of course to new grants, alterations of the law, deaths, and causes of the like kind. They amount to something above two millions annually, under three heads. Patents and instruments of appointments, of grants, and of warrants are produced and registered, as evidence of the legality of the charge. What is necessary to know is, what the peculiarities of the quarter's issue are; the Treasury powers and the acts of nature varying the charge. Therefore the consideration is not a very difficult one, but it requires accurate examination; it is one which was made upon the act of the joint departments, and greatly to the saving of trouble ultimately to the Treasury if done in the right way.

681. That document which has been called an account is not, in point of fact, an account; it is an estimate; it is an account, in part, of payments that have been made in the quarter; but it is chiefly an estimate of the payments that are to be made chargeable upon the quarter, but payable during the currency of the following year?—Every charge put upon the Consolidated Fund must in a certain sense be an estimate. This account is an account enabling the Exchequer to examine the legality of the proposed charge on the Consolidated Fund. I can examine that it is accurate and right by applying my own control. Then we come to the remaining portion; these have been long considered in the previous quarters; and we look at the alterations that have been made, and at the authority upon which they are made. If a person dies in the middle of the quarter there is so much less issue; or if, in a case of supply, Her Majesty were to reduce a public department in Her service, that would reduce the amount of issue required.

682. Your control arises at the moment that those payments come to be made; if we issue an order to pay the Judges' salaries, then you see that the payment is according to Act of Parliament, and chargeable upon the Consolidated Fund, and your control arises when the charge comes to be made?—My control with respect to issues arises when I am asked to issue. The control with respect to declaring a balance, and making out deficiency bills, arises at the quarter-day, and at no other time.

683. Is there anything in the Exchequer Act, or in any other Act of Parliament, which suggests a control of that nature as appertaining to your office?—The Exchequer Act not only suggests, but directly transfers to me all the powers and authorities which either by law or usage had antecedently been acted upon by the Auditor and the Clerk of the Pells. This portion of my functions was uninterruptedly acted upon by them, and it was acted upon by every successive Government up to April 1854, from the time of the passing of 57 Geo. 3; therefore this became part of the law and usage that was transferred to me, and that law and usage I was deprived of the means of enforcing; consequently it was impossible that I could sign my certificate, the Treasury could no longer make out the accustomed warrant, and my quarterly accounts were made impracticable; and all this in subversion of all serviceable usage from the first issue of deficiency bills under the 57 Geo. 3, that is, a usage of 37 years, confirmed by every Board of Treasury that has existed during that time.

684. Does the Act empowering the Government of the day to issue Exchequer bills for the deficiency upon the quarter's account require any authority on the part of the Exchequer to enable the Government to issue those bills?—That Act of Parliament was passed, and the successive warrants of every Government were passed under that Act of Parliament. There is nothing in the slightest degree inconsistent in that Act of Parliament with the usage which has prevailed during the reigns of four sovereigns.

685. Is there anything in the Act which imposes any duty upon the Comptroller of the Exchequer with regard to the issue of deficiency bills?—They cannot be issued, except by statutable powers conferred upon me, and they must be exercised in a manner conformable to law.

686. Is there anything whatever in that Act which confers upon the Comptroller troller of the Exchequer any control as to the amount of Exchequer bills to be issued for those deficiencies?—It is quite clear that I should not be justified in issuing one single deficiency bill beyond the balance between the Exchequer monies and the charges upon the Consolidated Fund. The mode resorted to, from the year 1817 to the present time, enabled me to see that no more than what was legal was issued in deficiency bills; but the alteration has deprived me of the power of that check.

687. Mr. Hankey.] How does your Lordship ascertain what is the amount due for dividends?—That is sent to me by the Treasury, and that is investigated and looked to.

688. In your office?—In my office.

689. Have you any possible means of knowing what is due for dividends?—In my department I must be satisfied of the legality of the dividend warrant which I have to issue, or I cannot sign it.

690. Have you any means of knowing the amount due for dividends otherwise than through the Treasury?—I know it through the Treasury, in the first instance, and upon reference to the former payments.

691. How will the former payments of the last half-year's dividend be a guide for the next?—I have the warrants for the payments since the Exchequer has been established.

692. Great changes may have taken place during the half-year by any amount being converted from stock into annuities, or other changes may have taken place; how can your Lordship ascertain the particulars of those changes other than through the Treasury?—I can only get it through the Treasury in the first instance, but it is also examined and checked; if there have been purchases of deficiency bills, or of supply bills, made by the Government authority, I know nothing about it. I must take that upon the Treasury authority.

693. Does your Lordship consider that it is within your department at all to exercise any control as to whether the amount stated by the Bank as due to them to be paid to the public for dividends is a correct amount, otherwise than through the Treasury?—I know it only upon their credit and authority.

694. You have no papers then direct from the Bank which give you information upon the subject?—No.

695. Mr. Williams.] By whom are Exchequer bills signed?—By law they are signed either by myself or by the Assistant Comptroller; the last change in the law being, that whereas formerly they were signed by the Assistant Comptroller writing the Comptroller's name, he now writes his own name, and therefore every holder of a bill sees that the law is complied with. In the old Exchequer, the bills were signed by an Exchequer officer, acting under a deputation or power of attorney from Lord Grenville.

696. There was an extensive forgery some years ago; have any more effective means been adopted for the prevention of forgery since that time?—All those measures have been resorted to with very great industry and consideration, and communication with men of science as well as practical men. All those arrangements are before Parliament already, but if the Committee wish it, I have the papers here; I believe the present system is as perfect as can well be imagined for the prevention of frauds.

697. Has any forgery taken place subsequently to that great forgery which took place some years ago?—No forgery or other offence, nor has there been the slightest reason to suspect any. The whole of the system was revised by myself and carried into effect, with the approval of Sir Robert Peel's Government; and the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goulburn's) approval was stated in the House of Commons.

698. The Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt have very extensive transactions with regard to the monies of the savings banks, have they not?—The Parliamentary accounts will show that.

699. They occasionally sell Exchequer bills, and again buy Exchequer bills; that does not come through your office?—Not the least; I only know of them as a Member of Parliament.

700. Mr. Bowyer.] I think your Lordship stated that Exchequer bills are sometimes sold by the Treasury?—Yes, or by whomsoever the Treasury choose to direct to sell them.

701. What becomes of the produce of those Exchequer bills; is it paid to the account of the Paymaster-general?—Those Exchequer bills, I presume, would would be held in that case when they are issued for army services by the Paymaster for the purposes of the army.

2 June 1856.

702. Mr. Wilson.] They would be issued by the Paymaster in the first instance, and not by the Treasury?—Yes. There is some arrangement between the Government and the Bank in the more ordinary transactions. I think there has been only one case of such sales in the market since I have been connected with the Exchequer.

703. When you issue Exchequer bills for ordinary supply services and not for the Exchequer bill exchanges, you issue them to the Paymaster instead of money?—Not exclusively. Sometimes I issue them to the Bank, and the Bank either carries the amount of money for which it has contracted with the Government to the Paymaster's account, or to the Exchequer account, and then the credit is issued from the Exchequer account for the public accountant. The latter seems to me the legitimate mode of procedure, and that which is the most conformable with the constitution and with the clear intentions of Parliament, by insuring a faithful appropriation of the public money.

704. They do not go to the Treasury?—No.

705. Chairman.] IS there any explanation that your Lordship wishes to make as to the Evidence that you gave on the former day?—I gave oral evidence on the subject of the change made with respect to the issue of the warrants for deficiency bills; it was a verbal explanation. I wish to put in a copy of the warrant itself in its former state, and of the warrant in its present state, which will make my evidence clear and intelligible by the production of the original documents.

No. 1.

TREASURY WARRANTS for Issue of Deficiency Bills.

Former Warrant before the change made on 5 July 1854.

CONSOLIDATED FUND.

Note.—The words in Italics are omitted from the new Warrant, No. 2.

WHEREAS by a certificate hereunto annexed, transmitted to us from the Comptroller-general of Her Majesty's Exchequer at Westminster, it appears that the produce of the Consolidated Fund arising in Great Britain will be insufficient to defray the charge thereon in the quarter ended 5th of July 1854, by the sum of 4,029,289 l. 17 s. 9 d.

These are, by virtue of an Act 57 Geo. 3, cap. 48, intituled, "An Act to make further provision for the Adjustment of the Accounts of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom, and for making good any deficiency which may arise in the said fund in Great Britain Britain or Ireland respectively, and of the consent of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England to make advance on such Exchequer Bills as may be necessary to make good the deficiency of the quarter ended 5 July 1854," to authorise you to prepare and make out Exchequer Bills for the sum of Four millions and Twenty-nine thousand Two hundred Eighty-nine pounds Seventeen shillings and Nine-pence, in the same and like manner, form, and order, and according to the same and like rules and regulations as described in and by an Act, 48 Geo. 3, cap. 1, for Regulating the Issuing and Paying off Exchequer Bills, and in and by another Act, of the 4 & 5 Will. 4, intituled, "An Act to Regulate the Office of the Receipt of His Majesty's Exchequer at Westminster," and the Act 5 & 6 Vict., cap. 66, for Regulating the Preparation and Issue of Exchequer Bills.

Alfred Harvey.

To the Comptroller-general of Her Majesty's Exchequer.

Also, connected with that change, I wish to put in a copy of the accounts which I prepared for the income and charge upon the Consolidated Fund, the quarterly accounts which I make up under the one system and under the other; the one will show the Treasury Warrant, and the other will show the variation in the account. Those are two official documents. The account by invariable custom was furnished quarterly by the Exchequer to the Government, the Bank, and the Commissioners for the National Debt. The note appended shows the incompleteness of the account, and its cause, and is added to each of the quarterly accounts made up since the alteration of practice by the Treasury on 10 October 1854. I was examined on the discrepancies between the Treasury and Exchequer accounts; and I gave oral evidence upon it, and marking particular passages in the different accounts. Here are the actual accounts themselves, showing those differences of practice, and the consequent discrepancies in the accounts; and I ask the permission of the Committee to put those in; for verbal examination upon accounts is a difficult thing to deal with. Here are the finance accounts that I adverted to, and also accounts of the same transactions, as appearing in the Exchequer accounts. The variances arising from the altered mode of proceeding will be manifest on inspection.

706. Mr. Wilson.] These are all before Parliament now, are they not?—The following is not. It shows the effect produced on my accounts by the act of the Treasury in withholding the information contained in the quarterly warrant for harges on the Consolidated Fund.

The Account now furnished quarterly by Comptroller-general, the change in the Treasury Warrant for Deficiency Bills rendering the completion of former accounts impossible.

Note.—The want of the information invariably furnished to the Exchequer until the 10th October 1854, and indispensably necessary to show the amount of the charge on the Consolidated Fund, makes it impracticable to complete these accounts in the accustomed manner. The same cause makes it also impossible to strike the balance and sign the certificate on which the amount of Deficiency bills which may be required for the public service formerly depended, and which was formerly recited as the voucher on which the Treasury Warrant for making out such Deficiency bills rests.

Exchequer, 31st day of March 1856.

Monteagle, Comptroller-General.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

5 June 1856.

I was asked by an honourable gentleman, a Bank Director, what the extent of the control was that was exercised by the Exchequer upon the dividend warrants. I stated, I think, that the control was imperfect, which it is, and that I had relied to a certain extent upon the Treasury; that is the case; but I wish to state exactly to what extent it is imperfect. It is complete, except in respect of one very insignificant account. In the first place, with respect to the list of charges on the Consolidated Fund, annuities, pensions, salaries, courts of justice, diplomatic and miscellaneous expenditure; all these, both in England and Ireland, are exclusive of dividends, and amount to upwards of 2,000,000 l. annually. I produce the warrants which come to me for these issues, and I have the power, and am bound to apply myself to examine, not only the issues of gross sums, but to the detailed issue, examination, and control, ascertaining the legality of each separate sum. So far as the dividends themselves are concerned, with the exception of the account of stock transferred from England to Ireland, we are able to check the dividend warrants with accuracy, subject to the single exception I have named, so that in both respects, with the exception of the transfer account from Ireland, the matter is done correctly and rightly in my accountant's department. This account has not hitherto been furnished by the Bank of Ireland; but I have written to require its production in future; and the only defect existing, in itself but a trivial matter, will be supplied hereafter. To this extent I wish to correct my former evidence. Then upon the next point, some questions were put to me by the honourable Secretary for the Treasury. He asked me, supposing, in the event of Exchequer bills used for ways and means being at a discount, and consequently the amount realised by those bills, as compared with their value at par, being less than the latter amount, how the deficiency was to be made up. I said, if I had ways and means unappropriated in the Exchequer, it was my duty to make up the ways and means to cover the vote. That is a case which has never arisen to my knowledge, and is never likely to arise. It was a hypothetical case; but I have now a very important document to put before the Committee; it is a document in my office, a Treasury Minute, dated 26th of October 1810, addressed to Lord Grenville, providing what I consider to be a right mode of dealing with the contingency of a premium realized on the sale of such bills; it was addressed to the Auditor of the Receipt of that day. I wish to put it in.

[The same was delivered in, and is as follows:]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer acquaints the Board that he has had various communications with the Governor and Deputy-governor of the Bank of England upon the subject of the arrangements which it may be expedient to adopt for the issue of Exchequer bills, and that the following plan has been agreed upon as a temporary measure, and until the subject can be more fully considered, and that it should be acted upon during the current quarter; namely, that the Exchequer bills intended to be sold on account of the public should be taken by the clerks of the Bank from the Exchequer to the Bank, and be then placed to the credit of the Treasurer of the Navy, the Paymaster-general of the Forces, or the Treasurer of the Ordnance, on whose accounts they shall have been respectively opened; and that the officer of the Exchequer whose duty it shall be to deliver out such Exchequer bills, shall annex to each parcel thereof a note under his signature, stating on whose account such bills are issued, and the dates, numbers, and amount of all the Exchequer bills contained therein, and shall also deliver to the clerks of the respective departments for which the same shall be issued copies of such notes. The Bank will from time to time, during the usual bank hours, deliver the Exchequer bills so issued to the brokers appointed by this Board for the sale thereof, as they shall be authorised to apply for the same by drafts signed by the proper officer of the department on whose account the bills shall be lodged at the Bank; and the brokers shall pay the produce arising from such sales (exclusive of the interest and premium on the bills sold) to the credit of the Treasurer of the Navy, the Paymaster-general of the Forces, or the Treasurer of the Ordnance, as the case may be, on the day on which such sales shall have taken place, unless from any unavoidable circumstance any part of the money for which such bills shall have been sold cannot be received in the course of that day before the Bank closes for the receipt of money, in which case the same must be paid to the account to which it may belong early on the next morning; and shall on the same day pay the amount of the interest and premiums received on all the bills so sold into a separate account at the Bank to be raised in the names of Richard Wharton and George Harrison, Esqrs., two of the secretaries of this Board; and no department shall issue any more Exchequer bills to the brokers for sale until the produce of those sold on the preceding day for that department shall have been paid into the Bank as before directed; and in case any of the Exchequer bills issued to the brokers on any day shall remain unsold, no larger quantity of Exchequer bills shall be issued to them on any succeeding day; those, together with those remaining unsold in their hands, shall be necessary for the service required.

The

5 June 1856.

The brokers are also to send to the respective departments on whose accounts the bills are sold, and also to the Secretaries of the Treasury a daily account signed by them, containing the amounts, dates, and numbers of the Exchequer bills sold, with the names of the purchasers thereof, distinguishing in the account transmitted to the Treasury, the respective departments on whose accounts the bills shall have been sold, and in addition to the above account, shall also transmit to the Treasury an account of the interest and premiums received on all the bills so sold and paid into the Bank, to the account of Mr. Wharton and Mr. Harrison. At the end of the quarter the respective departments on whose account Exchequer bills shall have been sold, are to transmit to the Treasury an account of all Exchequer bills sold for the service of such departments in the course of the preceding quarter, distinguishing the respective amounts, dates, and numbers of such bills, and the days of sale, and the names of the purchasers thereof.

And Mr. Wharton and Mr. Harrison will immediately, on the receipt of such account, examine the same with the daily accounts received from the brokers, and report thereon to this Board; and their Lordships will thereupon direct a warrant to be prepared, authorizing the payment to the brokers of a commission of 1 s. per cent. on all the Exchequer bills sold by them during the quarter to the public (no commission being allowed to them on such bills as shall be sold to the Bank of England), and authorizing the payment of the remainder of the sums standing in the Bank to the account of Mr. Wharton and Mr. Harrison, into the Exchequer, to the account of the Consolidated Fund.

My Lords approve of the arrangements proposed, and are pleased to direct that the several departments abovementioned shall, for the present, employ Messrs. Templeman, Cole, & Child, the brokers to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, as their brokers for the sale of Exchequer bills."

This provides consistently with the principle for which I contend, for the execution of the duty of making up the amount of the ways and means, and providing, at the same time, against the absorption of the premium upon Exchequer bills by the Paymaster, when in excess of the Parliamentary vote. It provides that the bills should be sold in the market, through the Bank of England; that in this instance the Secretaries of the Treasury should be constituted trustees in relation to the premium and interest; that the premiums made upon those bills should be kept to a separate and distinct account at the Bank, and that they should be paid to the Consolidated Fund, or, in other words, paid to the Exchequer, the net amount only being payable to the departments of Navy, Army, and Ordnance. I beg to call the attention of the Committee to the annual Acts, the Ways and Means Acts, which give the power of providing for the public service by Exchequer bills. I have here a paper which contains the balances of Exchequer credits at the close of each financial year, from 1850 to 1856; it not only contains that, but contains also the number of heads of account to which the balance was applicable, being, for instance, in 1852, when there was a balance of 920,000 l., it stood to 40 separate accounts. In the year 1856, when the balance amounted to 1,483,000 l., it stood altogether with the Paymaster and three small accountants, the Mint, the Church Commissioners, and the Inclosure Commissioners, or to four accounts only. Practically speaking, the 1,400,000 l. stood then to the Paymaster's account.

707. Chairman.] Will you have the goodness to state to the Committee what the practice has been with regard to the great services, the Army, the Navy, and the Ordnance, and with regard to the Miscellaneous Services; the practice and the law differ, do they not?—Am I to understand by that, the terms in which the votes are taken?

708. The terms of the Act of Parliament, and the way in which the votes are taken?—The terms in which the votes are taken vary considerably; they seem to me to vary somewhat fancifully; it seems to me very difficult to reconcile the words used to any principle; some votes are taken "for the year;" others are taken "for payments up to" a given time, a fixed period, we will say "the 31st of March," in the year, which means pretty nearly the same as for the year. The votes for the great services are to provide "for the means of meeting payments which become payable within the year;" the Army, Navy, and Ordnance, come under that category; the phrases are sometimes varied; but I am not able to resolve them into any fixed reason or principle applicable throughout; as, for instance, the words are different if you take the vote to the 31st of March, or if you take the vote for the year ending on that day. With respect to the votes for Army, Navy, and Ordnance form, the words of the vote differ, but the issues are made from the Exchequer in the same manner. Resorting to the mode of dealing with Ways and Means Exchequer bills, looking at the words of the Acts, it appears that it is not contemplated to use Exchequer bills, but the money raised upon those Exchequer bills; what is contemplated by those Acts is the sale of the Exchequer bills, the payment of the produce of that sale into the Exchequer, and the issues from the Exchequer, under the provisions of the law and the votes of Parliament of the sums realised by such sales of Exchequer bills. In that way there will neither be the question of premium to deal with in the way of returning, nor of discount to be supplied; and any abandonment of that principle is, in my judgment, objectionable. There are, however, precedents for the abandonment of that principle, and I do not speak of it as being anything erroneous in point of law, but any abandonment of it introduces the confusion to which I have referred, and on which I have been examined.

709. Mr. Wilson.] Perhaps your Lordship may remember, on the last day, stating that under the present change of system pursued at the War Office now, compared with what it was, everything being concentrated into the hands of one Paymaster, the effect was materially to increase the balances; and, as an illustration of that, you stated that the balance in the hands of the Paymaster-general of Exchequer Credits, on the last day of the last quarter, was 1,400,000*l.*?—Yes.

710. And which you stated, although standing to the Exchequer account in the book still, yet being issued to his credit, was entirely out of the Comptroller of the Exchequer. I wish to ask your Lordship whether, on the last day of the quarter, by Act of Parliament the whole of the money remaining in the Consolidated Fund, that is, on the evening of the 31st of March, is not applicable to the payment of the public dividends?—Certainly, all that is to the Exchequer account. On the 31st March 1856, being the balance of income, independent of credits.

The Irish Exchequer balance amounted to - -	£. 1,283,574
And the English to - - - - - -	4,319,573
Total - - - - -	£. 5,603,147

711. The whole of the money remaining to the Exchequer account on the evening of the 31st of March, is applicable to the payment of the public dividends?—Certainly.

712. Then does it not, in consequence of that, become absolutely necessary to provide for the supply services which shall come in payment during the following fortnight or week, a large sum in the hands of the Paymaster, prior to the arrival of the evening of the 31st of March, to enable him to make his payments?—It must be necessary for him to strengthen his balance; but my evidence referred to anterior years as well as the last, and I showed too what the increase, under the new system, was. I have now the figures before me, showing the details of these balances. I have here the balances at the close of the years 1854, 1855, and 1856.

713. The former years to which you have adverted were years of peace, with the exception of 1855?—The earlier years in the series first given were so. But 1854, 1855, and 1856, came under a different category. I believe I stated in my evidence, that with respect to a portion of this last increase of balance with the Paymaster, it was probably attributable to the war expenditure.

714. If the Paymaster-general had not been put in funds before the evening of the 31st of March to a large amount, he could only have relied upon the receipts of the revenue after the 31st of March to make his current payments?—That applies to balance of credits for Army, Navy, and Ordnance alone; but I find that he is put in funds for 367,000 l., the convict expenses in the colonies, which leads me to imagine that it was possible to be used for other purposes than that for which it was issued. Why was this large sum withdrawn from the Exchequer account on the 28th and 29th of March; and the entire sum, 367,384 l., taken to the Paymaster's working accounts between the 1st and 3d April. This could not have been for the purpose for which it was nominally issued.

715. I want to know this: would the Paymaster-general have any source from which he could pay his current expenses, whatever the urgency of those expenses might be, except from the accruing revenue, after the 31st of March?—Certainly not, if his other balances were exhausted.

716. The whole of the money at his command on the evening of that day is absorbed, is it not, to the last penny for the dividends?—Yes, as applicable to the

5 June 1856.

the funds for which it was appropriated; but this is not peculiar to this year. It is only describing a deficiency.

717. Is your Lordship aware that we had in March of this year a loan of 5,000,000 l.?—Yes.

718. Is your Lordship aware that one of the dividends on that loan was payable on the 30th of March?—I cannot speak from memory of the date.

719. And therefore, that instalment of the loan being paid on the 30th of March, would fall into the Consolidated Fund; would all moneys in the Consolidated Fund be handed over to the Bank for payment of dividends on the 31st of March?—If there were not funds otherwise to be had for that purpose, when the dividend became due, undoubtedly they would. The case is, however, no novelty in this respect. It must be the same in all years where deficiency bills are required.

720. The whole of the Consolidated Fund up to the amount of the dividends?—Yes; as usual in such cases; it cannot be otherwise. But it never before, in my experience, led to such accumulation of balance in the hands of the Paymaster as in March 1856.

721. Does your Lordship remember that the next instalment upon that loan was payable on the 26th of April?—No; I cannot speak to that from memory. I can give the information from the accounts.

722. If I state that it was payable on the 26th of April, your Lordship will admit, of course, that there was no further part of the loan applicable to the supply services until the 26th of April?—I rely upon the accuracy of the questioner, but cannot speak from memory.*

723. Therefore, notwithstanding the loan that we had for the purposes of the war, one instalment being payable on the 30th of March falling into the Consolidated Fund, and being absorbed in the payment of dividends, the next instalment being payable on the 26th of April, the only sources that the Paymaster could have for paying the current expenses of the year, would be from the accruing revenue in the intermediate period?—Yes.

724. If the fact was, that from the 1st of April 1856 to the 7th of April, the first week, the revenue receipts which we expected, and which really were received, were 770,000 l., and that the necessary payments, of which we were aware, from the different departments, for the war and otherwise were 1,897,000 l. during that same week, leaving a balance between the receipts which alone could have been applicable to those purposes, and the payments which the Government was bound to make, of 1,127,000 l., I ask your Lordship in what position the Government would have been had they not put the Paymaster on that day in receipt of the very large balance as you have stated?—I have no doubt that the balance required to be recruited at that day, but to what extent I know not; I stated that in my former evidence, I think; but how that balance was to be applicable in the way mentioned, by a large sum taken for a different service altogether, unless it is to be admitted that the money issued for one service was, by right, applicable to another, which I deny, I cannot understand. I do not see how that balance for war expenditure could have been lawfully recruited by an issue for colonial convicts to the extent of 367,000 l.

725. I ask you whether you were not aware that the rule is to keep the Paymaster's balance as low as it is practicable on Exchequer credits, and that in point of fact, in the majority of days his balance is nothing at all?—I am not enabled to say how the transactions of the Paymaster's office are carried on, except so far as it stands exposed upon the Minutes now before the Committee, on the Exchequer warrants and on the Bank returns, which show me the account withdrawn from the Exchequer credits. I should refer to the Paymaster for the information sought for.

726. You are not aware that the rule of the Treasury is, that they issue to the Paymaster, from day to day, the exact amount as nearly as it can be computed, of the requirements of that day upon the Exchequer credits?—Does the honourable Member mean the issue from the Exchequer credit account, or to the Exchequer credit account.

727. The issue of Exchequer credits upon the Exchequer credit account?—I believe that is the rule; I think it ought to be the rule.

728. If

* By subsequent reference to 19 Vict., c. 6, s. 2, it would appear that an instalment of 15 per cent., or 750,000 l., become due on the 10th April; and the Exchequer books show that 752,000 l. was actually paid into the Exchequer, 11 April.—Exchequer, 11 June, Monteagle.

728. If it be the rule to issue only from day to day as much as will keep the Paymaster in funds from the Exchequer, he cannot have as a rule any material balance accumulated at his command?—Pardon me; supposing that rule laid down and carried into effect, it will limit the amount which he has upon his Exchequer credit account, but of what he may have transferred to his drawing and bill account I know nothing.

729. Are you not aware that his drawing accounts are only fed from day to day from the cash accounts of the Exchequer credit account?—To what extent they are fed I know nothing complete. I know, however, that on the 1st and 3d April 1856, a sum of 367,384 l. was withdrawn from the Exchequer credit account, which was legally applicable to colonial convict service. To what it was applied I know not.

730. I will read to you the state of the balances at the end of every year, furnished from the Bank to the Treasury for the quarter; on the 29th of March, which was the day before, when the balance had been strengthened with a view to the 31st, it was 881,434 l.; 22nd, nil; 15th, 408,700 l.; and they were Exchequer bills; 8th, nil; 1st, nil; February 23d, nil; 16th, nil; 9th, nil; 2d, nil; January 26th, 80,000 l.; 19th, nil; 12th, nil; 5th, 40,000 l. Those are the balances which remained on Exchequer credits at the command of the Paymaster, at the close of every week during that quarter, and upon which alone he could operate at that time. Is it your opinion that that state of things would bear out the reply that you made to Question 576. "But where you have the offices united, you have a confusion of account, and a larger balance; and when I tell you that the balance at the close of the last quarter on Exchequer credit accounts which might be all operated upon by the Paymaster himself, amounted to 1,400,000 l., you will see that at no previous time was such an amount at his command;" an answer which conveyed the impression that the Paymaster had very unnecessary balances at his command; would that state of facts alter your view?—That state of facts speaks for itself; but the Committee would not have before them all the elements of an accurate judgment, without seeing what other funds, beyond the Exchequer credit account, were at the command of the Paymaster. It leaves untouched the fact that the Paymaster's balance, 31 March 1856, amounted to the sum I stated, 1,483,049 l. It omits all notice of his cash balance, of his bill and drawing accounts, and of any other sums remaining in his hands. These returns are indispensable in order to answer the question, and also on account of the expenditure of the 1,483,000 l., and of all other issues in April 1856.

731. Your Lordship is aware that by the rule he must exhaust his cash account before he takes his Exchequer account?—That is the rule laid down; how far it is acted on, I know not.

732. Your Lordship is also aware that the drawing accounts are fed from day to day only from the cash account of the Exchequer account; therefore, the Exchequer account, being the last resource, ought to show the greatest amount at his command at any particular time?—Supposing all those rules observed, I conceive that it would.

733. Chairman.] Where there is a surplus in the votes for the year, is that returned into the Exchequer, or in what way is it dealt with?—The great services come under the regulations of what we call Sir James Graham's Bill, originally passed for the Navy, and afterwards applied to the other great services, and from the annual accounts presented Parliament have before them the exact state of the expenditure for the great services, and as far as I can observe,—and honourable Members here know that as well as I do,—there are savings declared, and those savings being once declared to me, I receive a letter from the auditor to know whether they are declared in such a manner as will preclude the re-issue of any of those sums which have been declared savings for the greater services. My answer is, that my books are so regulated, that these sums made savings cannot be afterwards drawn, and that closes the transaction. The amount of savings rests between the auditors and the authorities of the great service departments and the Treasury; I have no reason to doubt that this duty is carried on with efficiency with regard to the public service; but no official information is given me on the subject of the mode of proceeding; I am only cognizant of the result.

734. What I wanted to know was this. Suppose in the naval service the Paymaster may have drawn, either into his Exchequer credits or into his own account, beyond what was absolutely necessary for that service, and beyond what what would have appeared to have been expended for that service, do you know in what mode any such surplus is dealt with?—You must divide the question. Suppose a surplus standing to the Exchequer credit account first. you ask how this is dealt with. There have been very few such cases; I think only two or three; I have traced some of them; I believe they were old cases, occurring before I was in office in the Exchequer, in which, at the desire of the Treasury, on finding a surplus upon a particular Exchequer credit account, the Treasury have authorised the re-transfer to the Exchequer account properly so called to the Consolidated Fund. This rests with the Treasury entirely, and I carry into effect their desire upon the subject. I have no means by law of judging whether this sum is in excess or not; I know not what demands may be upon the balance of the vote; but if the Treasury reported that unexpended excess to me, and authorised me to have it transferred to the former account, I should not hesitate to do so, but I have no means whatever given me by law of acting spontaneously in this respect as Comptroller.

735. With regard to Exchequer credit accounts they cannot be drawn upon after the termination of the year, can they?—Does the honourable Chairman mean the Exchequer credit accounts for the Army, Navy, and Ordnance?

736. Yes; how is that?—I do not draw upon that account at all, either at termination of the year or before. The Committee will get that information better from the Paymaster, who does draw upon that Exchequer credit account. I have no control over it; it has passed altogether out of my hands.

737. Supposing it is not an Exchequer credit, but supposing it is a surplus in the hands of the Paymaster?—If it has been transferred from the Exchequer credit account either to his drawing account or his bill account, that is to be dealt with as the Treasury think fit, subject to the legal appropriation under which it has been issued from the Exchequer, which controls it throughout; it is out of my control. I know not how it is dealt with, but I know this, that the Treasury frequently declare certain amounts to be savings; they communicate with me; I also at times communicate with them, showing unissued balances, and, if they think fit, they declare those unissued balances as savings in the same way in miscellaneous matters, as they do through Sir James Graham's clauses in the great services; but those clauses, and that system of audit, apply only to the great services, and not to miscellaneous matters; therefore those savings declared by the Treasury are their own individual act, and not the result of any force, I may say, ab extra, which is put upon them. The suggestions I thus occasionally make may be considered to be ultra vires, not being required by law; but I have made them on various occasions, and they have never been complained of, but, on the contrary, they have been acted on by the Treasury.

738. But in the great services to which I confine myself, do they merely declare the unissued balances?—In respect to the great services, supposing the regulations, as I collect them from the minutes, are carried into effect, namely, that the cash account and the bill account are fed from day to day only; if that is complied with there can be very little saving there, therefore it is a balance upon the Exchequer credit account that could be by that hypothesis a saving. The Exchequer credit account has been in a few instances worked upon by paying it back into the Exchequer, but there are very few instances of this.

739. Whatever the declaration is, it is a declaration of what is in the Exchequer; is that from an account furnished by you of the balances unissued from the Exchequer?—This has no reference to the Exchequer account properly so called; it applies to the Exchequer credit account, which is different from the Exchequer account; one is mine, upon which I alone can act; the other is an account upon which the Paymaster acts. As to any declaration of savings, I have nothing to say further than that which I have mentioned. I have reported to the Treasury on balances unissued on the votes, which was rather going beyond my ordinary functions; I have had no concern in the Exchequer credit account; it rests with the Paymaster, and the Treasury alone can know what there is of savings, for they alone can know the demand which there is upon the fund.

740. Now as to the Miscellaneous Estimates not under Sir James Graham's Act; in those estimates there is no examination under that Act, and no declaration that the surplus is unexpended?—No, there is no such examination as that, and I have thought it a great defect in the principle of the law; but without any law for the purpose, whenever I have found any accumulation of balances balances of that description, though I have no authority to deal with it myself, I have occasionally reported the amount of accumulated balances to successive Boards of Treasury, and the Treasury have, in cases which I have now before me, upon that report inquired into the matter, and made those balances savings, thus making them future ways and means. I will give the Committee, as an instance, an important one: in the year 1848, in the month of March, I called the attention of the Treasury to certain unissued balances on the Consolidated Fund, charges outstanding in the months of July and January, forwarding a statement of those balances; I did that again in 1851, and I find that the Treasury in reply directed certain balances to be declared savings, and requested the Comptroller-general to report particulars. In the case of the Queen Dowager's annuity there was a saving upon that charge of 25,000*l.*, in consequence of the law regulating the original grant. I find that there is a vote for public works, also granted in the year 1841, and the last issue upon that subject was in the year 1854; for the Indian Department in Canada there was a large vote in the year 1849, and the last issue was in November 1854; and then the balance of the vote was declared a saving by Treasury Minute. There were a variety of cases of this description, as to which I had always found the Treasury thankful for any suggestion I might make to them upon points on which such a saving might be effected, and they were ready to apply it, but I may refer the Committee here to the Exchequer Report of 1834, in which they give a recommendation for a systematic rule on this subject. This rule should, in my judgment, be adopted.

741. Did I understand you rightly, that there was a vote in 1841 for public walks, and that in 1853 there was an issue upon that vote?—Yes, there was, and another issue in 1854, which closed the issues. Here is another case; these were balances of votes remaining in the year 1852, on the 29th of March; they were certain old balances of Exchequer credits, namely, Danish claims, 94*l.* 17*s.* 8*d.*; instruction of Negroes, 1,100*l.*, and Spanish claims, 1,136*l.*, making 2,331*l.* These were voted in 1839, 1841, and 1845 respectively. Those were withdrawn in the year 1852 from the Exchequer account; at that time they were very old balances, but they were returned to the Exchequer account by the Bank of England as being payments actually made by the Governor and Company of the Bank of England on account of the credits which were so granted; they were credits for the several parties for those specified services; but on the 15th of December 1852 the very same identical balances above-mentioned, which had been voted in the years stated, were, without diminution or alteration of any kind, with others, repaid to the Exchequer account under the authority of the Treasury. Thus they were drawn previously for specified payments; they were kept from the time that they were first drawn until they were repaid in the hands of the Paymaster-general, and then the same sums were repaid to me, showing that they had never been applied for that appropriated purpose at all, but had been the whole of that time in the Paymaster-general's hands, applicable to other purposes as part of his balance.

742. What time were they in his hands do you suppose?—They were drawn out under the circumstances which I have stated on the 29th of March 1852; evidently they were not employed for the purposes for which they were drawn, and they remained in the Paymaster's hands until the 15th of December of that year, when they were repaid in the sums as issued.

743. That is a case in which they had been in the Paymaster's hands. Except that repayment, are there any other cases of repayment from the Paymaster into the Exchequer?—There are, I have no doubt, but I will fill up the answer with other cases if required.

744. There was a vote of 80,000 l. for the Duke of Wellington's funeral, and it has been stated that a sum of money to the amount of 25,000 l. beyond what was actually expended remains over; does that remain in the Exchequer?—It does not. It has been in the Paymaster's hands since April 15th, 1853, or more than three years; the facts of that vote are somewhat peculiar; I shall confine myself to the question of the Duke of Wellington's funeral, without adverting to other votes that were taken at that time. The facts were these: the expense of the funeral of the late Duke of Wellington was estimated at 80,000*l.* The vote took place in the short Session during Lord Derby's Government, in November 1852. I was asked to issue the amount of that vote. I was applied to most urgently by the Board of the Treasury, but I declined doing so, because from the terms of the vote it was not lawfully applicable to the service of the year. I said, you must wait for the issue till the period comes for which it is appropriated by Parliament; when that period came I issued, on the 1st of April 1853, 10,000 l., on the 5th of April 4,000 l., and on the same day 66,000 l., being a total of 80,000 l.; and I got certificates from the Bank of England of actual payments on the 2d of April of 10,000 l., on the 13th of April of 40,000 l., and on the 15th of April of 30,000 l., balancing the 80,000 l. voted by the 80,000 l. certified as payments. I have since seen, as the right honourable Chairman suggests, the statement reported to have been made in the House of Commons, that 25,000 l. of that has not been expended; that 25,000 l. has consequently been in the hands and under the control of the Paymaster from the month of April 1853 up to the present time in 1856. This must have been in his balance which he is directed to exhaust, and must consequently have been used for other purposes. That was included in the sum issued and certified to me as the final payment for that service by the Bank in April 1853; and it thus appears that there has been 25,000 l. from 1853 to 1856 remaining in the Paymaster's hands. I beg to hand in the following statement with regard to this vote.

7 December 1852. Voted (on Estimate) for Expenses of the Funeral of the late Duke of Wellington, £. 80,000.

See Correspondence, Vol. 7, p. 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 247, 248.

745. Have you got the certificate of the Bank by accident with you?—No, but I can procure it.

746. Will you just state that part of the Bank certificate so far as the form goes?—The Exchequer Act forbids the transfer being made from the Exchequer credit account, if I recollect rightly, without the Bank knowing that it has been paid over first. I think those are the words of the Exchequer Act, 4 & 5 Vict., c. 15, s. 14.

747. Have you any certificate of the Bank by you; I want the form of words in which the certificate is given?—No, not here; but I will supply that. In this case the 25,000 l. was out of the hands of the Exchequer; it passed out altogether under a certificate of payment actually made by the Bank of England. I was wrong in saying that the surplus was 25,000 l. I see it was 24,886 l.

748. Do you know where that is?—No, it is out of my hands; it is not in the Exchequer account, and it has been out of the Exchequer credit account since April 1854. I have traced it by the certified payments specified above into the hands of the Paymaster-General.

749. If it had been returned through the Exchequer in any shape, must you have known of it?—It was never returned. I must have known of it if it had been returned.

750. If it had been declared as an unexpended balance, must you have known it?—I must have known it. I know that it was issued from the Exchequer account, and it has not been repaid.

751. With regard to civil contingencies, how is it with regard to them; the civil contingencies are somewhat of a different nature from the usual vote; it is more like the Commissariat Chest Vote; is the surplus of one year carried on to the expenditure of the civil contingencies?—I believe very regularly a sum equal to the whole of the Civil Contingencies Vote is exhausted in the year. The Committee will see from a paper that I have put in, that the amount of the Parliamentary vote for the civil contingencies is greatly reduced of late; and the whole of the Civil Contingencies Vote was exhausted in the Exchequer.

752. When you say "exhausted," you mean that it has been drawn out of the the Exchequer?—That it has been drawn out of the Exchequer account, properly so called; it is taken annually from the Exchequer account, over which I exercise control; that is a vote which is placed at the unreserved disposal of the Government, for the general purposes for which no special vote has been taken.

753. Your Lordship is aware, probably, from the accounts that must pass before you, that during these last three or four years, the expenditure on the Civil Contingencies Vote has been considerably under the vote itself; the Civil Contingencies Vote being 100,000 l. a year for some time, for the last three or four years, the civil contingencies expenditure has been declared to Parliament to be under 80,000 l., or about 80,000 l. a year, and that 20,000 l., which has been the surplus for these three or four years, is not in the Exchequer?—That is not in my Exchequer account.

754. Not in the Exchequer credits?—No.

755. If it is anywhere, it must be in the Paymaster's office?—I am not quite certain whether it may not stand, or a portion of it, to the Exchequer credit account, but that is equally out of my control. I think it can be explained in this way. If I found, when I was connected with the Exchequer and the Treasury, that there had been, say, a saving of 20,000 l. in one year in the civil contingencies, I considered that as so much available for the service of the next year, and diminishing the amount of the vote of Parliament by so much. This did not appear on the face of the estimate or vote, I believe, but it affected the amount asked for.

756. Is there any balance in the Exchequer on the civil contingency account?—My own impression is, that there is no balance, and has been no balance for a considerable time; no Civil Contingency Vote in the Exchequer or placed within my control at all after its issue.

757. Therefore, if it is not in the Exchequer, nor to the Exchequer credit, the surplus must exist in the hands of the Paymaster, must it not?—That is my supposition; but of that the Paymaster will be a better judge than I.

758. Have you any mode of checking what there is remaining from the civil contingencies in the hands of the Paymaster?—No. The Committee will always see that I am bound to obey the Act of Parliament. If there has been a vote given upon a given amount, I must give it in the terms of the vote; if Parliament intended it to be for a lesser sum, or that there should be a deduction, by reason of the Exchequer balance, they have only to state it on their vote, and I carry it into effect. If the vote is absolute the issue must be absolute. I judge of that from the printed papers.

759. Have you those printed papers before you?—Yes.

760. You state that it was your practice, that if there was a balance from the former votes, you deducted it, and took a vote for less, leaving the expenditure, say, at 100,000 l.?—Yes; I think that is the course I should have taken at the Treasury in preparing the estimate, and it may be taken by the Treasury now for what I know. If I had a sum applicable to that service which enabled me to reduce the expenditure of the next year in drawing up the Estimates for the Civil Contingencies, which is done in a single line, I should have diminished the amount by so much in the vote.

761. Your Lordship must know by the Vote Warrants that the vote has not been diminished in the last three or four years?—No; but the vote has been greatly reduced in a series of years, from the average of about 250,000 l. to 100,000*l.*

762. I was asking what became of the surplus?—That I cannot tell. The control over monies which issued from the Exchequer does not rest with me by law. The Paymaster, I should think, would give an explanation of that.

763. With regard to the Civil Service Votes, you have stated that they are not under the same supervision as the great service votes under Sir James Graham's Act, and under the Audit Board, and the different checks that there are upon them; does your Lordship see any objection whatever to placing the Civil Service Votes under the same control and checks, giving Parliament the same knowledge of the facts of a surplus or a deficiency, as exists in the case of the great service votes?—I not only see no objection, but consider that there is every reason for taking that course. I am sure that it would be a great assistance to the Treasury itself, bringing under its notice that which is of serious inconvenience to the public service, but which, in the press of business, must occasionally be forgotten; I mean outstanding balances upon any any votes or accounts whatever; it would give the Treasury the immediate means of sweeping off those small balances which are open to objection, and of closing the accounts. This duty is not assigned by law to me, though, as already stated, I have on various occasions suggested it to the Treasury.

764. At the present moment your Lordship is not aware of any power which gives Parliament a knowledge of the balance existing in the Pay Office upon any of those votes?—I have not the means of knowing. There is no law requiring the communication of such knowledge systematically to Parliament. It is an account which could always be produced if moved for.

765. With regard to the Civil Contingencies Vote, it probably might be necessary to take a larger vote than the 100,000 l., in case it was placed under the supervision of the Audit Board?—It might, though I do not exactly see why. The Civil Contingencies Vote is a banking account made up of advances and of repayments, to a certain extent: if a picture is to be bought, it is perhaps bought out of the Civil Contingencies Vote, an estimate is afterwards submitted to Parliament, and the civil contingencies are repaid out of the vote, for the money originally advanced for the picture; it is a very convenient and necessary part of the financial service of the country; you could not get on without some power of that description.

766. The Commissariat Chest Fund comes in no way into the Exchequer, does it?—The Commissariat Chest account is, in principle, very analogous to the Civil Contingencies Vote; it is a banking balance, and stands to the credit of the Government, and out of that chest advances are made for various services, Army, Navy, Ordnance, and Colonial; when those services are voted the repayment is made to the Commissariat Chest Account. That is the general leading principle of the matter, but it does not come under my control at the Exchequer. This fund rightly managed should not decrease; the repayments should balance the advances. The Civil Contingency Vote is different; there is a vote upon that, and it includes final payments; but there is no vote with respect to the Commissariat Chest Fund.

767. The Contingency Vote is partly payment of final expenditure, and partly lending and receiving repayments?—Yes, it is.

768. Mr. Wilson.] You have been asked with regard to the different natures of the votes, and you have stated very properly that they are in different terms; that the votes for the great services are made for services payable within the year?—Yes.

769. That wording is clearly adapted to the regulation of Sir James Graham's Act, where no payments can be made from those votes excepting those made within the financial year?—Yes.

770. Another term is for the sum of money for the service "in the year" 1855–56?—Yes.

771. That vote would be applicable only to that particular service within that particular year?—Yes.

772. You have also stated that there is another term used, "up to the 31st of March in the following year," which is not the financial year; that would be analogous to the last, and be applicable only to the particular service within that particular year. With regard to salaries, it would be applicable to the payment of salaries falling due within the year; but there is another class of votes for which there is no term specified at all for specific services; for example, the one your Lordship quoted, namely, a vote for public works of 10,000 l.?—Yes, the execution of the given work, without reference to time, is the object contemplated. But it seems clear that if the work is completed or abandoned, a saving of the vote should then be made.

773. And the vote for the funeral of the Duke of Wellington of 80,000 l.?—Yes.

774. Those two votes would be applicable to any expenditure on those accounts, at whatever period the Treasury found it necessary to make the issue?—Certainly, provided the expenditure was made for the purpose voted, and no other.

775. With regard to these there would be no limit in point of time; therefore, the four distinctions in the wording of the votes are clearly explained by these four distinct principles?—Yes.

776. You were asked the question whether an issue had been made as lately as the present year upon that vote of 10,000 l., which was taken in 1841 for public walks?—Yes.

777. Is

777. Is it not strictly in accordance with Parliamentary rule that until that vote has exhausted the specific works for which it is granted, that vote may be acted upon by the Treasury till it is exhausted?—Certainly, that is the legal state of the case. I hope I was not misunderstood as suggesting anything illegal in that; but it cannot be diverted from the purpose to which it was appropriated without the commission of a breach of the law.

778. With regard to the vote of 80,000 l. for the Duke of Wellington's funeral, the vote was taken in November 1852, and the issue of money was made in the month of April 1853?—Yes, the whole sum was issued on 15 April.

779. Your Lordship is aware that the Treasury had the full right to have that money issued to the Paymaster, in anticipation of the expenditure which was contemplated by Parliament, to the full amount?—Yes, for that funeral, but for no other purpose.

780. In a service of that kind, where there are many persons employed, and when it is difficult to get their bills in for a considerable time, and when they may be subjected to a great deal of contest and examination afterwards, is it not obviously impossible to issue the exact amount required; may it not be convenient to issue the whole amount, and pay the bills as they come in?—There is nothing illegal in it, if, in point of fact, circumstances exist to justify the retention of 25,000 l. for so many years; but that would not justify the application of this money to other purposes.

781. Then until the whole of the expenses connected with the service of the Duke of Wellington's funeral are ascertained, and we are sure that all the outstanding claims have come in and have been adjusted and paid, the Treasury would be justified in keeping the balance in the hands of the Paymaster, until they could ascertain what saving would ultimately be made on the vote?—I think that the more prudent course would have been leaving such sum in the Exchequer until it was wanted; it has been in the hands of the Paymaster for more than three years, and at his disposal.

782. Supposing it out of the Exchequer, with the expectation that it would be all wanted within a very moderate period?—It was drawn on the 5th of April 1853, and now there is 25,000 l. taken out of the Exchequer, which has been for that interval in the hands of the Paymaster; and what has it been doing all this while?

783. Has there not been a payment made from that sum in the present year?—There has been no such payment made; the whole was drawn from the Exchequer account on the 5th of April 1853, and the last payment certified to me was on the 15th of April 1853, exhausting the whole of the vote.

784. When you speak about the last payment, do you mean the payment by the Treasury, or do you mean the transfer from the Bank of England to the Paymaster's credit account?—I mean the transfer from the Exchequer credit account to the Paymaster's account; I have used the word "payment," and the questioners have used the word "payment" in that sense. I make no payment properly so called; I do not pay a farthing in cash from the Exchequer.

785. If the Treasury had to make payments on behalf of the service, the Paymaster must be placed in Exchequer credits on that vote in time to make those payments, and when you say that the last payment which was made was in the month of April 1853, all that you mean is, that that was the last date when any part of the vote was transferred from your account in the Bank of England to the account of the Paymaster?—The last issue from the Exchequer account was 5 April; the last issue from the Exchequer credit account to the Paymaster's drawing account was 15 April 1853.

786. Therefore you have no cognizance of the payments which the Paymaster had to make with the funds in his own hands?—No. It may have been applied, and must have been applied in my judgment, to other purposes in the meanwhile. The Paymaster is instructed to exhaust this account. I find in the finance account of the year 1853 ending January 1854, showing how the monies of the year 1853 had been disposed of; it is stated that the sum voted or granted for the Duke of Wellington's funeral was 80,000 l., and it states in the second column the sum paid, and in the column showing the balance remaining to be paid, I find Nil in the latter column; and I cannot imagine anything more decided to confirm my opinion than such a communication made two years back to Parliament.

787. This really has nothing to do with the question; this is merely a transfer of the money from your Exchequer account to the Paymaster's account. The whole gist of the question is this: when the Paymaster had this money transferred to him, what payments he had to make on account of the service for which the sum was voted. Now, no doubt the whole sum of money was transferred from your account in the Exchequer to the Paymaster's account; the whole 80,000 l. was put at his control and at his service; would it not be necessary that he, the Paymaster, before he could return any saving upon that vote, should ascertain finally the whole of the payments that were to be made on behalf of that service, and then having finally ascertained that no further payment was to be made, make the remainder a saving?—I do not think that that describes the regular course of proceeding in the slightest degree; if there had been an expense incurred, the honourable Member will see by the account I have read, that it could have been paid out of the vote which was drawn out in sums of 10,000 l., 40,000 l., and 30,000 l., but there has been 25,000 l. of that retained in the hands of the Paymaster, and not left in the Exchequer, from April 1853 to 1856; and I have now before me the entry of the Bank on this subject; here is the certificate to me of the amount of the several payments actually paid by the Governor and Company of the Bank of England in the course of the 15th day of April, in which appears "Funeral of the Duke of Wellington, 30,000 l.," that is the final and conclusive payment. We are only confusing ourselves if we attempt to draw distinctions between payment and transfer. All my transfers are payments, practically speaking.

788. But this is simply a transfer from your Exchequer account to the account of the Paymaster?—But in the accounts signed by the Secretary of the Treasury, which he holds in his hands, the finance account of the year, that transfer from my account to the Paymaster's account is stated to be a payment leaving nothing due.

789. Leaving nothing due upon the vote?—Certainly not.

790. There is no question about that, but it would be the duty of the Paymaster, when he had ascertained what saving there was upon this vote, if it was not all required for the service for which it was voted, to make that saving and to return it back into the Exchequer, would it not?—The Paymaster cannot do that; he has no power of declaring a saving.

791. Has the Treasury no power to do so?—I said the Paymaster cannot declare a saving; the Treasury may; it is the Treasury which is responsible on this occasion.

792. The Treasury would declare a saving upon this service in the Paymaster's hands?—Yes; and my surprise is that they did not declare it between the years 1853 and 1856.

793. Suppose the payments going on during the whole of that period, and not yet completed, how can we declare what the final saving will be until the whole object is finally completed?—If a grant is made for the payment of the expenses of a funeral, and the payment was demanded with such urgency that I was asked to pay before it was legally payable, and refused it, but made it on the very first day on which it could be legally paid, in the first week of April 1853, I can hardly conceive that the funeral account would remain outstanding to the year 1856. If so, I believe it is the only undertaker's bill in England that would be allowed to outstand so long.

794. May it not be that for the main portion of the claim there may be an urgent demand, and may there not be parts of it as to which there may be a great difficulty in ascertaining what ought to be paid, and therefore that it may not be possible to ascertain the final saving for some considerable time?—I cannot pass an opinion as to what might occur, under those circumstances. I know the fact of the issue at the period in question, and of the saving now admitted of 25,000 l., which has been left in the meanwhile with the Paymaster, at his disposal, and employed necessarily by him for other purposes.

795. Mr. Bowyer.] Does not your Lordship think that the Treasury might have waited till the bills were sent in by the persons to whom the money was due for the Duke of Wellington's funeral, and on those bills being sent in, have applied to the Exchequer for the money to be transferred to the Paymaster's account?—The Treasury applied pressingly to me even before the vote was payable to get it transferred to the Exchequer credit account, and it was so transferred immediately, when it could be transferred legally, in the three sums which I have stated; the last transfer being on the 15th of April; out of that that credit the expenses of the funeral were to be paid, and the balance, if there was a saving, and I conceive it was a legitimate ground of saving, ought to have been returned to the Consolidated Fund.

796. What I meant to ask was this, whether your Lordship does not think that it would have been better if the Treasury had waited till the bills were sent in by the persons to whom money was due for the Duke of Wellington's funeral, and then, on those bills being sent in, had required the sums necessary for the payment of those bills to be transferred to the Exchequer credit account?—That is the course which I should have thought would have been adopted.

797. Sir Henry Willoughby.] Do you know any similar case to the one of the 80,000 l. vote for the Duke of Wellington's funeral?—There have been, as I believe, more instances in former times than in the present, of an amount of surplus votes allowed to outstand for a considerable time, but they have outstood in the Exchequer, I am inclined to think, and were left to the Exchequer account; but the case that we are dealing with was a transfer from the Exchequer account to the Paymaster's account, and the subsequent remanet of that money in the Paymaster's account, from 1853 to 1856, namely, for three years; and I do not know of such a precise case as that is.

798. When once the 80,000 l. passed from your Exchequer account, you had no knowledge of what was done with the money?—I know how far the Exchequer account is exhausted; the action on the Exchequer credit account is also made known to me by the Bank; but under what circumstances the latter is exhausted, to what account it passes in the Paymaster's hands, whether to his drawing account or his bill account, I cannot judge; it ought to go to one or the other; then it becomes applicable, and stands as money paid in the Paymaster's hands, and it is at his own disposal for any other services.

799. When it was transferred to the Paymaster-general and there was a balance not wanted for the Duke of Wellington's funeral, was it in the power of the Paymaster-general to apply that money to other purposes?—It was in the power of the Paymaster-general to transfer it to his drawing account and his bill account; he had the power of applying it as he thought proper, subject to the control of the Treasury.

800. With regard to the application of that money, reference must be had to the Paymaster-general?—Certainly.

801. You as the Comptroller of the Exchequer know nothing of it?—Nothing officially; it is taken out of my power. If it had been drawn to the extent of the Parliamentary Vote, that is to say, the 80,000*l.*, minus 25,000 l., I should have had the full control over the 25,000*l.*, but by their withdrawing the whole I lost that control over it, and the control I lost was transferred to the Paymaster.

802. Does it occur to your Lordship, in consequence of what has happened in relation to this vote, that some provision is necessary for the repayment of unexhausted votes into the Exchequer?—I consider that to be very much required; I have already stated that without a strict law for the purpose, I have on various occasions, with the perfect good will of the Treasury, I have reported to them balances which remained unexhausted, and in several of those cases the Treasury have been ready to declare those savings, which I think is the constitutional mode of proceeding; but this should be made systematic, and enforced in some form or other by a stringent law.

803. Mr. G. A. Hamilton.] The only effect of exhausting the vote for the Duke of Wellington's funeral, as regards the Exchequer, was to transfer that amount from the control of the Comptroller of the Exchequer to the control and under the responsibility of the Treasury?—Precisely so; but in the hands of the Exchequer it could only be applied for the Duke of Wellington's funeral; whereas with the Paymaster it could be diverted from its just Parliamentary appropriation.

804. And that at a period when it must have been supposed to be impossible to judge whether there could be any saving or not?—Certainly.

805. Mr. Wilson.] What the saving might have been could not have been determined till the whole accounts had been balanced?—No.

806. You have been asked whether the Paymaster could have applied that money to any other purpose; in the answer you gave did you mean any other purpose than that for which he could rightly issue the money standing to his account?—The best answer that I can give to that is, to ask whether any portion of that 25,000 l. has been applied by the Paymaster-general to any purpose than the cost of the Duke of Wellington's funeral; if it has, he has applied it, in my judgment, contrary to law. There was another vote made at the same time under somewhat analogous circumstances, of 150,000 l. to purchase the land at Kensington Gore, and it is but right I should say I had to violate the law in relation to that vote; I believe it is almost the only case in which I have knowingly violated the Act of Parliament. I should like to be asked a question about it, and I will tell the Committee how the matter stands.

807. Your Lordship will remember that there was a vote for 150,000 l. to purchase land at Kensington Gore, in addition to 150,000 l. that was subscribed by the Exhibition Committee in 1851, and your Lordship will remember that towards the end of March the deeds were completed for the purchase of that property, and it became necessary that the purchase should be completed before the first day of the new financial year, when the money would have been under ordinary circumstances strictly issuable. Will your Lordship state whether any unusual step was taken to render that public service possible?—Those votes were votes taken in the short session of November 1852, at the same time with the vote for the funeral. I was applied to, after the votes had passed, to make issues for this service; I found that this had been voted for the service of the subsequent year; and therefore, in point of law, I was obliged to exercise the power of control, and say, "No, I can make no issue until I come to the year to which this money is legally applicable." And therefore this as well as the vote for the Duke of Wellington's funeral was postponed till it should come within the terms of the House of Commons' Resolution. With respect to the ground for the new National Gallery, I was told that the case was most urgent and most pressing; that a contract had been entered into with a private party, partly entered into on the part of the Treasury, and partly on the part of the Royal Commissioners of Arts, who were jointly interested in the purchase, and who furnished a large part of the money; and that the contract fixed the payment of the purchase-money before the exact legal time prescribed by the vote. I was assured that very great public inconvenience and possible disturbance of that contract might take place, if the payment were not made as promised, the party entitled intending to go abroad, and I was asked to pay it. It was contrary to the strict law, but it has been shown the case was urgent. The Treasury, after having frankly told me the reason and the pressing nature of the demand, unreservedly offered me any indemnity that I might wish to have from their department; but I said, "No, this is a violation of the Act, the indemnity of the Treasury is not a sufficient indemnity, and you will have the goodness, if you please, in the Appropriation Act to introduce words that will make it a sufficient indemnity, and render the act that I do now legal; and I shall then get my indemnity from the only parties who have a right to give it, namely, from Parliament itself." Words were introduced accordingly in the Appropriation Act, and I hope therefore I stand excused for the payment in question. It would have been a great public inconvenience if the engagement made had not been observed, and I think I was right in what I did; but I do say that I think in any case in which, like this, any violation of an Act has occurred, it ought to be specially noticed and specially reported to Parliament.

808. Mr. G. A. Hamilton.] Was not that a case in which, but for the largeness of the amount, the payment might have been properly made out of the civil contingencies?—Yes; but when the amount was 150,000 l. to be paid on the instant, the vote for civil contingencies being only 100,000 l. would not have sufficed for the purpose.

809. Mr. Wilson.] You have been asked as to the amount of the civil contingencies vote, and it has been stated truly that the amount of money actually expended upon the civil contingencies, as presented to Parliament year by year, rarely exceeds 80,000 l., while the vote for the last three years has been invariably 100,000 l.; is it not the case, that the civil contingencies votes are used for two distinct purposes, first, for payments which are final upon the civil contingency account, and secondly, for sums, and very considerable ones, advanced either in anticipation of a vote of Parliament, or by way of imprest to be repaid from some other department which had not funds at the time; and therefore is it not the fact that the accounts delivered to Parliament, which include only those payments which are made final upon the civil contingency vote, do not represent the entire amount which may be issued from the civil contingencies contingencies account at any one particular period?—I believe that practice is accurately stated.

810. Therefore it does not follow, that because the vote of Parliament has been 100,000 l., and the amount expended upon that class of payments which finally rest upon the civil contingencies account, is only 75,000 l., that therefore there is a surplus of that vote unused, or at the command of the Treasury?—No, but all that is not final is advanced on repayment; and when that repayment takes place, it is so much paid into the credit of the fund, and therefore, whether it is a credit actually existing in money, or whether it is a credit which subsists in the hands of other parties bound to pay it back, the difference between the two is only a question of time, not of fact.

811. Yes; but that time varies according to the nature and the purpose for which the advance has been made?—Yes, certainly.

812. Your Lordship, I think, is of opinion, are you not, that the use of a sum of that kind to a very considerable amount, certainly not to a smaller amount than you have now given, is an extremely necessary discretion to give to the Executive Government of the day?—I think a contingent fund is absolutely required; and not only is it absolutely required in that case, but it is also required with respect to a similar fund, the commissariat chest account.

813. Chairman.] Do you know the amount of that?—I have no means whatever of judging at the present time, but is very considerable, exceeding 1,000,000 l.

814. When you say you think it expedient that there should be an amount, do you speak as to the particular amount now disposable?—I have given an opinion as to the principle, not as to the amount.

815. Mr. Wilson.] What I meant was this, that because I present to Parliament, as Secretary of the Treasury, an account showing an expenditure of 75,000 l. upon civil contingency payments the year before, with a vote of 100,000 l., it by no means follows that the vote was too large for the purposes for which the civil contingencies vote is applicable?—No; but, as I have stated, it is as if a banker having money in his chest, had also bills payable to himself outstanding; the money and the bills form his fund, but the bills differ from the money by the date at which they become payable, and so it is with the civil contingency fund; if you are certain of the repayments of advances those are funds at your command which become realised capital when paid.

816. Mr. G. A. Hamilton.] Must it not be calculated that there will at all times be a necessity for a floating balance to meet additional advances?—Yes, quite so, but respecting amount and possible accumulation I cannot speak.

817. Mr. Wilson.] Seeing that the amount advanced is quite optional, it would not be wise to keep that balance down to a very small sum; the object would be lost if kept down to a very close sum?—If so, it would be as if you had no vote at all.

818. Sir H. Willoughby.] Assuming that in the last four years there has been an excess upon the Civil Contingency Fund of 15,000 l., making the sum of 60,000 l., how would that be accounted for?—The civil contingency account is a very strict and accurate one, as I believe. It is kept at the Treasury.

819. My question had reference to that portion which is not accounted for?—I have no power over that at all, neither do I believe that the auditors examine the Civil Contingency Fund. I do not think that it goes to them. I have already strongly expressed my opinion in favour of extending the system of audit to the miscellaneous votes, as well as to the greater services.

820. Is it to be understood that that extra sum which is not wanted for the civil contingencies in the year is not accounted for at all?—It is accounted for to the Treasury, I presume, but this is no more than the Treasury accounting to itself. I do not know of any other account of it except the account which is made by its own officers to the Treasury. I need hardly say that an effectual audit should be independent.

821. Is there no annual account laid before Parliament?—There is the civil contingency account, but that is not a system of audit, and it has been stated to relate to final payments only.

822. I limit my questions to that portion of the Civil Contingency Fund which is not spent in civil contingencies?—I understood by the question that was put to me just now, that the account rendered to Parliament is an account of the final payments. If that be so, from the account must be excluded the amount which has been a matter of advance, and which will be matter of repayment. How that account is controlled at all, I mean in the way of audit, I do not know. I believe that there is no audit except in the Treasury itself for those advances or for any part of the civil contingencies expenditure. A more effectual audit should be provided.

823. When those advances are repaid what becomes of the money?—Then I assume that there is a strong probability that there will be other advances required, for similar loans and advances, and if you have a civil contingency account on the average resulting in final payments, the amount of which appears on the Parliamentary Return, and that the advances with their repayments stand, as is probable pretty constant, from year to year, the amount of the advances on one year, when it is repaid, will become the amount, measuring the advances which you have the capacity of making in the next year, with the view to repayment likewise; but I do not believe that there is any audit, nor do I know how these transactions are carried on.

824. If accurate information is required upon the expenditure in the final account of that money, must not the inquiry be made, not from you, but from the office of the Treasury?—Clearly; they alone can give an answer upon this subject; it is exclusively under their control. I can, however, furnish an account of the annual votes, the issues from the Exchequer, and from the Exchequer credit account to the Paymaster.

825. Mr. G. A. Hamilton.] Are you not aware that a regular ledger account is kept at the Treasury of the civil contingencies, including both advances and repayments?—I have not the slightest doubt that all the information at the Treasury stands as it did in my time. Then there was an account with respect to all disbursements of the Civil Contingencies Fund.

826. The civil contingencies are an item for which the Treasury is peculiarly responsible?—Specially responsible; and more so, because it has no distinct and independent audit to control, and certify on its behalf.

827. Mr. Wilson.] Your Lordship knows, I believe, that no money can be issued from the Bank of England upon the Paymaster's account, either for civil contingencies or otherwise, that must not come under the cognizance of the auditor of the Board of Audit, and be accounted for strictly to that Board?—I am not in the least aware whether the auditors have any control over the audit of the civil contingencies account; it is so long since I was in the Treasury that I cannot speak to the point with any confidence. I resigned the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1839.

828. Are you not aware that it would be impossible for any sum of money to be drawn by the Paymaster, whether as payment or advance, that would not come under the control of the Board of Audit, and be traced to its final appropriation through all its stages?—In the observations which are here made by Mr. Romilly, the head of the Board of Audit, he reports distinctly that he considers it absolutely necessary to apply the principles of the audit to the Treasury accounts. There are the words in page 116: "The appropriation of the miscellaneous votes does not come under the control of the auditor. It can hardly be contended that the Treasury, as the supreme department of the State, should be exempted from the control to which the subordinate departments of the Army, Navy and Ordnance are subjected, when it is remembered that this principle, if contended for, has already been deviated from in the case of the commissariat services vote, which is equally taken by the Treasury. If, again, it is considered derogatory to the Treasury that a subordinate office like that of audit should in any way control their proceedings, and act as a check upon the issue of public money, that argument should have been used before; for if the expenditure under the commissariat vote is submitted to Parliament by the auditor, upon the same principle all other votes taken by the Treasury should be subject to the same ordeal." In this I entirely concur.

829. You do not infer from that that the Board of Audit have no cognizance of the expenditure of the civil service votes?—I have read you the words of Mr. Romilly as applicable to the miscellaneous services.

830. Are you not aware that that distinction applies to the difference to which your Lordship has already adverted, that of the votes for the great services being applicable only to the year, and the other classes of supply services being applicable to a longer period?—I think it involves a much larger principle. The Treasury will tell us whether the civil contingencies vote is or is not audited. I may be wrong, but from Mr. Romilly's evidence I imagine that it is not audited; and that is my answer to the question which is put to me.

831. In

831. In the case of the great votes, the Audit Board not only have a certain degree of audit, but they report to Parliament whether the vote has been misapplied within the service, and if it has been exceeded; but there is no such report made as to the civil service votes?—No, but there ought to be.

832. So that if they should be audited at the Audit Board, Parliament is perfectly unaware of the result of that audit?—It is so; a report to Parliament would render the audit more effectual.

833. Mr. Wilson.] Your Lordship will observe that this has reference only to appropriation and not to anything like payments; what we are speaking of now are payments of money?—The questions which the Right honourable Baronet put, had reference to the application of monies; this may have reference only to the appropriation of votes; in either respect it is perfectly right, and I agree with what Mr. Romilly says upon this.

834. Chairman.] Therefore although the Audit Board would ascertain that the payment had been made, yet the Audit Board would not report to Parliament the improper use of the vote, though they would do so in the case of the great services?—I presume that they ought to be called on to do so. Sir J. Graham's Act and its extension applies, however, to the great services only. When I was originally at the Treasury, there were Treasury auditors acting within the Board itself. I think very justly that practice has been discontinued, because it is to the Board of Audit itself, acting judicially, being an independent Board, that I think Parliament ought to look, rather than to any audit within the department itself. No audit can be relied on but such as is independent, more especially independent of the accountant.

835. You have been asked whether it is not a great advantage to have a certain sum out of which the Treasury can advance to other departments in case of a special emergency; but from your long experience do not you think it rather a temptation to other departments to exceed their estimates, if they know that there is a large fund at the Treasury, and great facility in obtaining advances?—I admit that there is that temptation; but at the same time, if you can rely upon the just administration of that fund, I have no doubt that it is infinitively better than running in debt on the part of the department. The contingent fund should not be administered by any department but the Treasury. If it is carefully and usefully administered by the Treasury, you provide for contingencies which otherwise I should consider could not be provided for at all, except by incurring debt. Let the sum be limited and accounted for, and placed in responsible hands, then I think it is all right; but any one of those checks wanting, it becomes a source of evil.

836. At the present moment Parliament is not aware of the funds in the hands of the Paymaster-general?—No, I conceive not.

837. At the present moment Parliament is not aware of the sums advanced which would be repaid in the course of the year?—No.

838. That repayment is generally made from sums voted by Parliament, so that those repayments are sure?—Yes; and therefore by analogy the bills payable to a banker form part of his assets, like the cash at his command; if they are good bills; the payment is quite certain, and in the case of Government repayments it is still more certain.

839. Sir H. Willoughby.] Is the amount which is capable of being devoted to advances constantly on the increase?—No, I should think not; it is rather on the decrease; it has been, so far as I have been able to observe the proceedings of Parliament, the policy of the Government from 1830 down to this period, to limit the amount of discretionary votes, and to increase the amount standing on estimate, and subject to Parliamentary control. I should think the amount referred to in the question would be rather a decreasing demand than an increasing one.

840. Assuming that in the last three years there has been an available surplus on the Civil Contingencies Fund of 20,000*l*, in each year, would not there be in the present year 60,000*l*. that could be devoted to loans and such purposes?—Supposing there had been an accumulation in the way suggested, no doubt it would be an increasing fund; that is a matter of fact upon which I can pronounce no opinion, but the tendency would be that way.

841. Chairman.] To that you must add any advances that had to be repaid the first year?—Yes; and the account of civil contingencies should include, I think, not only the final payments but the amount of advances and repayments. I think that would make the matter more complete.

842. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Is it your suggestion that the Government should take every year a vote of credit for the civil service of the Government?—I think it absolutely necessary that there should be a civil contingency vote, and a commissariat chest account; and to enable the Government to avoid the temptation and difficulty of misapplying sums appropriated, that they should have these sums free from any special appropriation to meet the peculiar circumstances that may arise.

843. To what amount do you think it is desirable to take a vote of that sort?—Within the last 25 years the amount is very much reduced. I presume that we may assume that it is not too small a sum. The Government would take care, I think, in preparing their estimate, to take a sum likely to cover all that they expect; whether it is too large or not depends upon the question whether the repayments form an accumulating sum, increasing from year to year; this should be looked into; but to do without a contingent vote would be very dangerous. I have already recommended an audit.

844. The present vote for civil contingencies is in the nature of a vote of credit for civil services, is it not?—No doubt, but not exclusively so; it calls itself a civil contingency vote, but it is frequently applied for other matters, not perhaps strictly civil services.

845. According to your plan of regulating the balances in the hands of the Paymaster, do you think that the present amount of vote for civil contingencies would be sufficient to enable the Government to carry on the current expenditure?—For those civil services I think it is quite so; at the same time that is a mere surmise. I cannot know exactly the state of the Government wants in those things; but as the Government has been satisfied with the vote of 100,000 l. for a certain number of years, it is probable that that is sufficient for the purpose.

846. You stated, did you not, that if a change was made in the arrangements with respect to the Paymaster, it would be necessary for the Government to take additional powers of applying an indefinite fund for the current services of the year?—No, not an indefinite vote; that question has not been put to me, and I should have been far indeed from affirming such a proposition; but if it were necessary, by the enforcement of strict appropriation, to augment in some degree the Contingency Vote, comparing the consequences of the one plan and the other, I say, let Parliament increase the Contingency Vote, and enforce strictly the principle of appropriation. On its powers over the finances the power of the Commons of England depends, and that power will be but a delusion if the strict appropriation of the public money is not rigidly enforced at every cost. On this question our Parliamentary constitution depends.

847. Chairman.] With regard to the memorandum which you laid before the Lords of the Treasury in February 1854, will you state to the Committee why you thought it necessary to lay that memorandum before the Chancellor of the Exchequer?—Its origin, so far as it requires explanation, other than the memorandum contains in itself, was this: in the early part of that year, finding that, to my judgment, a system had been introduced which was extending itself, under which the principle of appropriation, the especial principle which led to the formation of my office, and had previously been guarded by the ancient Exchequer, was to a certain extent abandoned, and the abandonment of this constitutional principle being evidently increasing, I took the liberty of writing, on the 11th of January 1854, to the then Chancellor of the Exchequer a semi-official letter, which I signed as Comptroller-general, and addressed to him. It was to this effect: "It appears to me a matter of positive duty to call your attention to the mode in which the expenditure is now carried on, that you may be enabled to judge how far it is consistent with the statutable regulations and to the Treasury Minutes passed on the subject. As it is more than probable that this question may be made a matter of consideration during the approaching Session, I feel it but just to you that the facts of the case should be brought clearly before you, with a view to the exercise of your own judgment on a matter of such primary importance. With this view, I shall be ready to wait upon you at any time at which you may be desirous of seeing me." In consequence of this letter I received an appointment and waited upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who received me with the utmost courtesy and kindness. It would be very irregular, and might be dangerous, to repeat conversations, but I may say that which is contained in the memorandum itself; that the Chancellor of the Exchequer requested me to draw up for him, and put in writing, that which I had communicated to him verbally.

verbally. I did so, and the result was the Exchequer Memorandum. It was enclosed to Mr. Gladstone in the following letter, dated 16 February 1854: "I have the honour to enclose for your consideration the memorandum on the present mode of making issues for the public service, which I stated verbally to you I considered indefensible and highly dangerous. I had it put in type that it might be read with more facility, and I send you half a dozen copies that you may be enabled to obtain upon it the opinion of others. You have great facilities of obtaining the aid of men experienced in such questions. Lord Lansdowne, and Wood, your colleagues, have both been Chancellors of the Exchequer. Baring and Goulburn, two friends of the Government, likewise filled the same office. Experienced members of the Board of Audit have also means of forming an opinion. In my time, the steady experience of Brooksbank, and the spirit and energy of Spearman, would have supplied all that I required. But in another of your colleagues, you will find as thorough a knowledge of the whole subject as in any, or perhaps in all those that I have named. Sir James Graham was one of the Exchequer Commission in Lord Grey's Government. It was he also who introduced and carried the Exchequer Act; it is he who has explained, defended, and enforced the doctrines of appropriations with the greatest ability, and with the strongest sense of its importance. My memorandum is written strongly, and without the absurd pedantry of official professions of deference and respect; such nonsense would be misapplied in calling your attention to a matter of practical business. Brooksbank always relied on the Exchequer as the real protection and safety of the Treasury in its financial receipts and issues; it is only in later times that it is viewed as a troublesome check and restraint; but such by law it is made, and intended to be. Consider what may happen during—1st. A war expenditure; 2d. A weak revenue room; 3d. One single pay department in the room of five; 4th. £. 4,000,000 added, or likely to be added, to the supplies for revenue services; 5th. The system of payments and advances unauthorised by law, and subsequent adjustments and rectifications of accounts. These five sources of difficulty, more especially without the aid of an Army Extraordinary Vote (which in your case I should be inclined to renew), make the future very doubtful and gloomy unless the strictest system of administration be enforced." I had the memorandum printed for reference and for convenience, and I furnished the Right honourable Gentleman with 12 copies, which I thought might be interesting to the Members of the Cabinet. I also communicated it to certain persons whose names I afterwards made known to the Treasury, who were official persons, or who had been official persons. I placed it in their hands, not in the shape of a publication, but in the shape of a communication; and as I had adverted to other departments, I thought it was right that such departments should be aware of what I said. It was under those circumstances that the paper was drawn, and it remained in the hands of the Government, though not made an official document at the Treasury until a change of Government and the accession of my Right honourable Friend the present Chancellor of the Exchequer to the office which he now holds. I did not think it would be just or right that such a document should be withheld from him, and I took the liberty of writing to the Lords of the Treasury upon that subject, on the 24th of March 1855. My official letter was to this effect: "As being necessary to explain to your Lordships the alteration which has of late been introduced into the mode of transacting branches of the public service in which this department is concerned, and as explanatory of my letters of the 22d and 23d inst., I have the honour to lay before you, and to request your Lordships' consideration of a memorandum which I prepared in 1854, and submitted to the leading members of the late and present Government." I may state that the Assistant-secretary of the Treasury were so obliging and courteous as to give me a copy of Mr. Anderson's answer to my memorandum, which is included in the papers laid before this Committee; in so doing it was a personal attention; but I was not called upon to report upon that memorandum, or express any opinion upon it. It was under these circumstances that the Exchequer Memorandum was prepared.

848. It states fully your Lordship's views, and the objection that you have to the course which you supposed to be carried on at the Pay-office?—I think it states them with as much clearness as I am able to bring to the subject; and having read the papers in reply upon that subject, ably written by men of eminence in their respective positions. I allude to Sir C. Trevelyan and Mr. Anderson. I see no reason whatever to vary the judgment which I pronounced, as being a judgment which to me appears conclusive, if you wish to maintain the constitutional principle of Parliamentary appropriation. If that is to be abandoned, this Exchequer Memorandum is absolutely good for nothing, and so is the Appropriation Act likewise. In the abandonment of the Appropriation Act the highest privilege of the Commons and the constitution of the country are identified.

849. Independently of the expediency as a Parliamentary question, your Lordship stated that you then considered that the present practice, or the supposed practice, was illegal, and you requested that the opinion of the law officers of the Crown should be taken upon the legality of the practice; have you received any answer to that question?—I have not received any answer whatever upon the memorandum since it has gone out of my hands. Whether the opinion of the law officers has been taken or not I am wholly uninformed. I have had no official reply whatever to my memorandum. My judgment respecting the illegality of the present system is unchanged.

850. Your question as to whether the practice was illegal or not has received no reply?—No, it has not.

851. In addition to the paper of Mr. Anderson, there was a paper written by Sir Charles Trevelyan; was that paper ever submitted to you at the time that it purports to have been drawn up?—I was examined at great length before the Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, 1848. Sir C. Trevelyan's paper of 1848, though stated to have been prepared for that Committee, for some unexplained reason does not appear to have been laid before them; it is not printed in their Minutes, nor was I aware of its existence until a few days back, when I first saw it printed in the papers I now hold in my hand. I was not the least aware of its existence; and though it refers in great detail to my own office, I was never called upon to report upon it. Mr. Anderson's paper was kindly communicated to me, but this paper of Sir C. Trevelyan was not, to my knowledge, communicated to the Committee, though as it now appears it was prepared for its use; why kept back is not explained.

852. In that paper Sir Charles Trevelyan expresses an opinion as to the advantage of the Comptroller's office or otherwise. He states, "When Her Majesty graciously determined that her income should be subjected to the income tax, the Comptroller-general objected to issue money from the Exchequer on this account, and the amount has therefore been drawn in full, and the income tax has been made good partly by payments from the Privy Purse, and partly by deductions made at the Treasury. I mention this as being the only instance in which, as far as I am aware, the Comptroller-general has exercised a practical check over the Treasury. His predecessor, the Auditor of the Exchequer, demurred to the Treasury issuing the interest on the Russian-Dutch loan after Belgium had been separated from Holland, but he withdrew his objection upon Lord Grey directing him to make the issue on the responsibility of the Executive Government, which, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, was the course which the affair ought at any rate to have taken." First, with regard to this representation of Sir Charles Trevelyan's as to the conduct of Lord Granville, is he correct in stating that it was issued upon directions from Lord Grey?—I have the original papers. Sir C. Trevelyan's statement does not appear to me that that is consistent with the facts of the case; but if the Committee wish to see the papers themselves I shall be very glad to produce them. My recollection of the facts of the case is this: there was a difference of opinion between the Government and Lord Grenville respecting the legality of the continued payment of the Russian-Dutch loan after the separation of Holland and Belgium. Acting in conformity with the principles which I think should regulate the Auditor, which would govern me as Comptroller-general, fulfilling the Auditor's duties, when asked to issue a sum, the legality of which appeared to be questionable, suspended such an issue. Letters passed on both sides, but ultimately the opinion of the law officers of the Crown was taken, a copy of which I have in my possession and can show the Committee. I think it was Denman and Horne who were the law officers, and they stated, distinctly, that upon their construction of the law of the case the Government were bound to pay that money by our treaty obligations; and it was to the force of that legal opinion that Lord Grenville gave way, and not to a mere command on the part of the Government. And that is a result which has arisen in my own case: I have resisted an advance upon my own judgment, and I have abandoned my opinion, it being a legal question, when I got got the opinion of the law officers of the Crown in contradiction to my own. The Treasury has acted in the same way in another case I had resisted them in making a payment, and required the opinion of the law officers of the Crown; that has been taken, and as the opinion justified the principles upon which I resisted the payment, the Treasury with perfect readiness acquiesced in my objection. In like manner I think that Lord Grenville's case was precisely analogous to this which I have stated. I believe that in addition to the opinion of the Attorney and Solicitor-general, there was also an opinion taken from the Queen's Advocate, who is a civilian, advises the Foreign Office; the opinion of a civilian and two Crown lawyers were then taken, and they, holding that we were bound by the terms of the treaty, and Lord Grenville sanctioned the payment.

853. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] What was the date of that transaction? —I think it was in the year 1831–32.

854. Supposing that the law officers gave it as their opinion that the Government was legally bound to make this payment, would it follow that the Auditor of the Exchequer was also bound to permit the issue to be made from the monies in his hands?—Not in the least, unless that opinion was in his judgment so authoritative as to vary his judgment; his individual judgment is to be the rule for the control he is to exercise; but in forming his judgment, even so considerable a man as the late Lord Grenville would not have rejected, on a legal question, the judgment of the Crown lawyers. With respect to my own functions, I have already referred the Committee to the 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 5. I am bound, before I make an issue, first to satisfy myself that it is legal.

855. Supposing that the Government was bound to make certain payments, but Parliament had provided no funds at your hands to make that payment, the Auditor of the Exchequer as he was then, or the Comptroller of the Exchequer as he is now, would not be authorised to allow the issue?—Without a Parliamentary provision of funds of course no legal issue can take place. I cannot issue my Exchequer warrant till I shall have first satisfied myself of the legality of the order I have received. In the case of the Russian-Dutch loan a charge was created on the Consolidated Fund; funds were provided by Parliament; the only question was with respect to the legality of the issue. The order came to make the issue; Lord Grenville refused to obey it, acting on his own judgment, but after the opinion of the law officers of the Crown had been laid before him, he made the issue.

856. The question was, then, as to whether it was a legal charge upon the Consolidated Fund?—No; but the charge being upon the Consolidated Fund, whether an occurrence had not taken place which prevented the legality of the issue; that occurrence was the separation of Holland and Belgium.

857. Virtually the question was, whether there was a continuing legal charge upon the Consolidated Fund?—Whether there could be a legal issue made. There was no doubt that the charge was strictly legal; the doubt was, whether the issue could be made under that charge.

858. Sir H. Willoughby.] Is there any allusion to that legal opinion in Sir Charles Trevelyan's Minute?—No, rather the contrary; he seems to think that Lord Grenville submitted merely to the command of the Government. The contrary was the case.

859. Chairman.] Sir Charles Trevelyan mentions likewise a case with regard to income tax paid by Her Majesty; do you wish to state anything upon that point to the Committee?—Yes; I will state to the Committee what that case was, and then I can show them that, so far from that being the only case, I am afraid, if they were to ask me all the instances of my control from 1839 to 1856, since I have been at the Exchequer, I should perplex them with a recapitulation of cases, the number of which I do not pretend to state; the case of Her Majesty was this: the Committee are aware that, upon the introduction of the first property tax, a communication was made by the Government to Parliament that Her Majesty was graciously pleased to express an intention of contributing Her proportion to that property tax. I received, soon after that occurrence, a regular official letter from the Treasury, directing me to make a deduction of that property tax from the issues made to the Crown from the Exchequer. It occurred to me that this was not the right mode of proceeding; the law of the land exempted the Crown from the operation of the Act, and Her Majesty's intention in assisting towards the necessities of the State was her own gracious act, and was only to be considered or recognised as such. I saw Sir Robert Peel, and I stated to him that I thought that this was to be dealt with with in the spirit of being a voluntary payment, like the contribution of the King of the Belgians, Lord Camden, or any person who felt a generous disposition to make a voluntary grant in aid of the public wants, and that I had no power by law to make any such deduction unless there was an Act of Parliament passed. Here is the letter that I received, dated 24th March 1843, from the Treasury: "The Lords Commissioners of the Treasury desire that you will authorise the Governor and Company of the Bank of England to grant out of the general fund of the Exchequer at the Bank of England a credit of 1,257 l. 16*s.* 3 d. to William Sargent, Esq., Paymaster of Civil Services, for property tax due on the third class on account of the sum of 96,250*l.* set forth in the warrant of appropriation, bearing date the 6th day of January 1843, for the quarter ended 31st March 1843, and place the same on the accounts of your department as an issue out of the monies set apart from the Consolidated Fund to defray the charge of the third class of Her Majesty's Civil List, for the quarter ended 31st March 1843." That was the letter, dealing with it as if you could recite an Act of Parliament, to carry it into effect. I wrote the following note to Sir Robert Peel, dated the 27th March 1843, "I should be glad to see you for a few minutes if you will inform me when you can receive me, on the subject of the mode in which it is proposed that Her Majesty's voluntary contributions to the property tax should be made. I think there is an objection to the mode proposed, which, however, can without much difficulty be obviated." Upon my having made my communication to Sir Robert Peel, he thanked me for it, and adopted my views. I received a letter from Sir George Clerk, dated 29th March 1843, stating, "I herewith return the Treasury letter which you gave to Sir Robert Peel, and I have given directions that a public letter should be written to you requesting to withdraw the letter, which I regret to see has been inaccurately prepared." That is the question referred to by Sir C. Trevelyan. I presume that every one in this room and elsewhere will think that I was right in treating Her Majesty's contribution as an act of grace and patriotism on the part of the Queen, in place of stopping at the command of the Treasury, as if there was an Act of Parliament authorising me to do so. Had I done otherwise, I think I should have acted inconsistently with law.

860. Sir Charles Trevelyan says, "I mention this as the only instance in which, so far as I am aware, the Comptroller-general has exercised a practical check over the Treasury." Do you concur in that view, or are you able to show the Committee that you have been more troublesome than Sir Charles Trevelyan seems to suppose?—I believe I can appeal both to the Right honourable Chairman himself, and all his successors, that the objection to the control of the Exchequer is certainly not from any want of determination on my part to enforce the principle of appropriation by my control to the uttermost, and on every fitting occasion. I think there must be some mistake in the paper before me, this assertion is so entirely absurd. I hold in my hand a long list, showing a number of specific cases of control exercised by me, beginning with the Right honourable Chairman, if I remember right, and continued up to the present time, to every Board of Treasury which in my judgment was disposed to overlook or violate the principle of the law of Parliamentary appropriation. I hope it was not done with any want of courtesy or in any captious spirit. This list of cases of control is merely an index. I have thought it right to give the Committee access to the cases; the headings are explanatory, the pages of my correspondence are referred to, and the Committee can call for the papers in any one or all of those instances. The folio volumes of my correspondence are all in the room, at the command of the Committee.

861. Is there any particular case that you would like to mention?—There are many, but I can refer the Committee to one which is before me. If the Right honourable Chairman recollects, just before Sir Robert Peel came into power, Parliament determined before the general election and dissolution to refuse one-quarter out of the votes of the year; one-half of the miscellaneous supplies only was voted, and the balance was left to be voted by another Parliament; there were consequently, with respect to the services of that year, two service votes, and two Acts of Appropriation. Upon the change of Government, and upon the meeting of the new Parliament, it was contended by the Treasury that issues might be made indiscriminately, as for the services of the year, out of the two quarters' votes which had been taken under the first Act of Appropriation, and the balance, voted after the dissolution, and contained in a new Appropriation Act. I felt that such a course would be wrong in point of law, and that I had no such power of, as it were, consolidating two Acts which Parliament had passed separately; it was not for me to say what the motives were of Parliament to vote them separately; but what was clear was, that my duty was to adhere strictly to the Parliamentary appropriation that was given me by law, and I consequently declined making the issues. There were upwards of 100 Royal Orders and Treasury Warrants sent to me, signed by Her Majesty. I hold one of them in my hand under Her sign manual, and countersigned by the Lords of the Treasury. I considered that the issue demanded was illegal, and that it could not be carried into effect legally. I put a different construction upon the Act of Parliament. After some discussion, my late lamented friend, Mr. Goulburn, who was Chancellor of the Exchequer, said, "If we continue to differ will you submit this question for legal consideration?" I said, "I will submit this question to your own law officers, to see whether I am right or wrong." He said, "You may do so; but you must draw up your own case; we will not bind you by our statement of the case to them; you shall draw up your own case, and submit it to the law officers on your own behalf. I took that course. The case was laid before the Attorney and Solicitor-general, and they gave their opinion that, according to the strict letter of the law, I was justified in refusing to act upon those warrants. Here are upwards of 100 Royal Orders and Warrants which were all set aside by one stroke of the pen. Upon obtaining the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, the Government of the day instantly submitted to that opinion. They saw that I was justified in the objection that I had taken, and they admitted that it must be corrected. It was set right, by one governing warrant prepared at my suggestion, which recapitulated all those instances of errors. It recites the errors; it recites the former warrants; and it recites and authorises the mode of correction; and it was acted upon. The same course was also taken under somewhat similar circumstances in the year 1852. In that case there was also an error in the Royal Warrants, applicable to upwards of 50 or 60 cases, and the same course was taken; I refused my sanction, the Treasury consulted the validity of my objections, a governing warrant was issued, and the amendments were consequently made, and the illegality, such as it was, was corrected. Those cases, amounting to nearly 200 instances of control, were all before Sir Charles Trevelyan at the time when he says there was no control exercised, except in the single case of the Queen's property tax; he must understand the word control in a totally different sense from mine. I cite these cases as examples only. The list I produce will exhibit a continued chain of precedents of control, with a precis of the more important instances of the use of this power.

Vide Appendix.

862. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] With regard to the case which occurred in 1841, do you consider that the correction of a substantial error on the part of the Treasury, or of a technical error?—I considered it the correction of a substantial error. It is not for me or any subordinate officer to put a construction upon an Act of Parliament. Parliament had some object or other in dividing the votes between two appropriations, and I was bound strictly to conform to the intentions of Parliament; therefore it was an error of substance, varying the appropriation which Parliament had made, and determining whether the warrants were legal or illegal.

863. By the control that you exercised, did you make any alteration in the amount of the funds which were at the disposal of the Government?—No; but I took care that they were issued at the right time and for the right services; that involved the whole question of appropriation, with which no person, at least no Comptroller-general, is at liberty to trifle; he cannot say whether the law is right or wrong, but he has to obey and to enforce what the law commands.

864. It was a mere question of the form in which the warrants and the orders to pay were made out?—I cannot admit that. There was this distinction, that the money being appropriated for the service of one half year, the Treasury wanted my sanction for its application to another, in the same precise manner as if the money had been voted for one year, and I was called upon to appropriate it for another. Besides which there was another fatal objection: there was a want of ways and means to cover this supply in the mode asked for.

865. By the control that you exercised, you did not diminish the amount of money at the disposition of the Government?—Not the least; I only fixed its appropriation according to law.

5 June 1856.

866. Nor did you vary the purposes to which that money was to be appropriated?—Yes, I did, because the purposes were connected with the time; if it was not so the Comptroller of the Exchequer would be at liberty, contrary to law, to issue money in the year for which it was not voted; he is not at liberty to do so. But, in addition to this objection, there were no ways and means applicable to these votes in supply.

867. Take again the example of the sums voted for the Army Estimates for the year; I presume three-fourths were in one vote, and one-fourth in another vote, and each vote was included in a separate Appropriation Act?—Yes.*

868. According to the course that seems to have been originally adopted, those two sums were consolidated and a warrant issued for the entire sum?—Yes.

869. According to the amended warrant the issue was made, first, for the three-fourths, and then in another sum, for the remaining fourth?—Precisely so.

870. If you added up the three-fourths and the one-fourth, did they not make precisely the same sum as that which was included in the original warrant, and was not that sum equally applicable to the Army Estimates?—Yes, it was in amount the same, but in the time it differed, and the time is of the essence of the matter; nor were there ways and means legally applicable to the vote.

871. How was the time altered?—In this manner I show its importance; suppose, for instance, that the three quarters had represented the expenditure of a given character, and that the one quarter had represented the expenditure of another; assume three quarters peace, and one quarter war, if you have the power of varying the time, you have the power at once conceded of varying the appropriation of Parliament in an essential matter; you cannot draw a line, the Comptroller-general must steadily adhere to the Appropriation Act. In this case there was the further objection of want of ways and means, which was conclusive.

872. In this case there was no distinction between peace and war?—No.

873. Was not that vote taken in this way, that each vote was divided into two portions; three-fourths were taken first, and one-fourth was taken afterwards?—Yes.

874. Both, of course, for the service of the year, taken upon the estimate of the service for the entire year?—Yes.

875. How can you show that the time was material in this case?—What makes the time material in this case is, that I cannot under any possible circumstances admit the principle of appropriating or issuing money for a period for which it is not granted, and if because there were no special inconvenience in the peculiar instance, I claim the power of setting aside upon the grounds of convenience, or my own judgment, a Parliamentary appropriation, I get a power that is inconsistent with the law, and I establish the arbitrary judgment of the Comptroller-general in place of a rule of law.

876. We started upon the assumption that your construction of the Act was correct, being supported by the opinion of the law officers of the Crown; but the question that I put to you is, whether when that construction was adopted, the amendment which you were able by your control to introduce was anything more than a mere technical amendment of the practice, or whether it went to the substance and essence of the issues for the expenditure of the year?—It produced no difference in the amount of the two votes taken together, but it affirmed the principle; that of obeying the law implicitly, and not allowing the Treasury by its warrant in any respect to set aside the obligation of that law, and that was admitted by two eminent lawyers. If I had acted otherwise in this case, I should have laid down a fatal principle, rendering my power of control an arbitrium, and not a legal act.

877. When the Treasury issued their warrant, did they believe that they were violating the law, or did they not take a different view of the construction of the Acts, from that which it seems you more correctly took?—I have not suggested, for a single moment, that the Treasury did anything knowingly wrong. They put one construction upon the Acts of Parliament, and I put another. The construction which I put upon the Acts of Parliament was adopted by the Crown lawyers, and I acted, as I presume I was bound to act, strictly by the law of the land. I cannot go beyond that.

878. Mr. Cardwell.] Practically, the Treasury would have just the same power over the whole amount of expenditure for the year under the one plan, that they had had under the other?—Yes, only making the issues in a different manner. But they could not issue without ways and means.

* The three great services, I find, were voted in the first session. The votes withheld were one-half of the Miscellaneous Supply.

879. Chairman.] The object of voting for three quarters of a year, was to compel Parliament to assemble at the end of the year?—I presume so, but I could not put any new construction in reference to my own hypothesis respecting the motives of the Legislature.

880. Suppose that, instead of being in the minority on that occasion, and being turned out, the Whig government had returned to office, and the estimates had been voted for the other quarter, would not the way in which that warrant was proposed to be issued, have covered any peccadilloes of which we had been guilty during our three quarters of a year; I mean, would it not have entirely cancelled any over issues which we might have had during the year?—It might have had that effect; there was a control put upon the issues by the interposition of the House of Commons, and the control was put by Parliament upon the then political state of the case. Supposing that the result of the general election had been different from what it was, and that I had put on the Royal order and instruments of issue the same construction that the Treasury originally put, which was negatived by the Crown lawyers, and had issued the votes indiscriminately, I think that I should have been open to a very severe animadversion, if it could have been said the Act of Parliament prescribes so and so, and you now in deference to political exigencies have given it a different construction.

881. Mr. Cardwell.] The real object of passing supplies only for a portion of the year was, to compel the Ministry to assemble the new Parliament in the autumn?—Yes, that may be probable; but many more objects might likewise be suggested. But that supposition, even if capable of proof, would not justify me in giving any but the lawful construction to the Act of Parliament.

882. The construction of the Treasury could not have come into existence until the second Act of Parliament had been passed, or in other words, until the new Parliament had assembled?—That is true.

883. Therefore, the object of the proceeding might have been equally attained in either case?—I deal with the law. I cannot say what the object of Parliament was, but if it had happened that the second Act of Parliament had been passed, as was the case, and if there had been no change of Government, and I had given supplies indiscriminately, whereas Parliament had given them by two distinct appropriations, I should have been open to a very severe censure, and have exercised a most dangerous power, that of dispensing with the law.

884. But we have a different object in view at this moment. There can be no doubt that holding the high office that your Lordship does, it was your duty to execute that office in connexion with the intention of Parliament; but that being conceded, we are now, with a view to the future, considering what practically we ought to recommend Parliament to enact; the practical object in that case being to compel the Ministry to assemble a new Parliament, was there any difference in that respect, whether the Treasury construction prevailed, or your Lordship's more accurate construction prevailed?—I think it was of the very first importance that the accurate construction, whether it was with the Treasury or with me, should be adhered to, because departing from it in any respect or in any instance, sanctions a departure from it in others.

885. That I quite agree to; but have you any objection to address yourself to the practical object mentioned, namely, the control by Parliament over the Executive, and compelling the Executive to take the opinion of the new Parliament as early as possible; would not that object have been attained equally in either case?—I have no right to assume that motive, but if I had, and that such object would have been gained if it was the sole object in view, I must have acted as I did, and refused to make the isses. A similar case occurred at a later period, and under a different Government. I pursued the same course; and that was not in the case of a dissolution of Parliament. A demand was made upon me, in 1852, for advances under Royal Orders that were irregular in themselves in respect to the time of issue and the failure of ways and means. I have a list of them; and acting distinctly upon the same principle that I had acted upon before, not having it within my power to assume what the objects of Parliament were, or whether they were answered or not, but being bound strictly by the law, I acted in respect to the Government of 1852 in the same manner; following the precedent that I had established upon the opinion of Sir William Follett and Sir Frederick Pollock, I showed to the Government of 1852 that objection applied to those warrants, and I got them corrected in the same manner. In that case, as in the former, no ways and means existed legally provided to meet the supplies. The question is a question, I say, of principle, and not of technicality; for whether it applies to great things or small things, you cannot preserve your principle of appropriation, if public officers bound to administer the law are not strictly guided by the direct letter of the law in the issues of public money. It is right to inform the Committee that in this case an irregularity had occurred at the Exchequer, per incuriam, and therefore I take leave to put in the whole correspondence, that the mistake of the Exchequer may be shown, as well as that of the Treasury.

886. Mr. Wilson.] You have been asked a question by the right honourable Chairman, whether, supposing that the Government of Lord Melbourne had had a majority, and had remained in office, the construction which the Treasury put upon those two Acts might not have enabled the Government to cover the peccadilloes of the Government, in having over-issued previously to getting the remaining quarter; I ask you whether it is possible that could occur; would not that be limited to the issues, in the first instance, for the three quarters of the year, the same as if it had been for the whole year?—I think so, admitting my principle.

887. Therefore the Government could not have had power to issue more money than Parliament had voted in that case than it has now; your control is limited to the extent of the vote of supply, and when that supply is voted by Parliament, you feel authorised to issue up to the amount of the supply, and no further?—Yes; but the two series of votes might have been issued indiscriminately, if the legality of consolidating the votes were conceded.

888. Therefore no more over-issue could have taken place upon the three quarters than upon the whole year?—No, but their distribution might have been varied. I may state that these two cases, to which I have referred, include above 200 instances of control, and I mention it in reply to the statement made, that no instances of control have occurred except in the Russia Dutch case of Lord Grenville, and my case of the Queen's property tax.

889. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Do you consider that the most important instance of control exercised by you?—Most assuredly not. I refer to the catalogue or index which I have produced to exhibit many others.

890. Mr. Hankey.] Supposing that the Treasury view of the case in the former instance, to which Sir Charles Trevelyan alluded, had been acted upon, would the Treasury have had any power of using money to a greater extent than had been voted by Parliament?—They would have applied it in a different manner; not that there would have been more money, but it would have been subjected to a different application. I could not admit the principle of allowing the Treasury to alter the law in one instance, without giving them the power of altering it in others.

891. Mr. Bowyer.] Might not this case have arisen, that it might have been of consequence to the Government to apply the amount of the one-fourth before the supply was voted, and before the re-assembling of Parliament?—No, I do not think that it would.

892. Might not this case have arisen, that the Government might have wished to apply one-fourth of the supply before that one-fourth had been voted by Parliament; and if that had been the case, would not then the control exercised by your Lordship's office have been a material one?—I do not think that the Treasury construction could have enabled them to issue money for unvoted heads of services; that would not have arisen; but Parliament in its ordinary practice votes monies for particular accounts, and not only for particular accounts, but for particular periods. I have given the Committee the case of the Duke of Wellington's funeral, and of the votes for the purchase of land at Kensington Gore, which were voted as part of the services of the next coming year. If the service were voted for 1852, and I had issued that money in the year 1851, I should have violated the law, and set aside the intentions of Parliament. And I show you that the question of time as to payment may become just as material as the question of amount to be paid. Therefore, in this instance, as in all others, I was bound to look to the whole of the enactments of Parliament, and to hold to the time legally fixed for payment as well as to the amount legally fixed for appropriation.

893. If your Lordship had not refused to make those payments might not the money intended to go to the payment of the three-fourths of the supply have been been applied to the payment of the one-fourth before that one-fourth was voted by Parliament?—It could not have been done properly or legally.

5 June 1856.

894. If your Lordship had not exercised your control, and refused to make those payments, might not the effect of your consenting to make them have been that the money which was intended to be voted to pay the three-fourths of the supply would have been applied to the payment of the one-fourth before that one-fourth was voted by Parliament?—If I had in such case exercised the powers that were inherent in me I should not have allowed the misapplication of the monies for services not voted, and I should have been protected either way by not making any issues. In the other case I got a legal authority for making the issues. It is just the same case as the Duke of Wellington's funeral. This would happen if I had not put the right construction, as it is determined to be, upon the issues. The ways and means that were voted for the three-fourths might have been applied to the one-fourth for which there might have been no ways and means at all provided. The Committee will observe that it leads at once to that point, and shows how essential is the question of time in this case.

895. Might not a case possibly arise in which it would be of consequence to the Government to anticipate the payment of a portion of the one-fourth which had not been voted by Parliament, and if so, would not the facility which they would have obtained, if your Lordship had not exercised your control, have enabled them to put off the assembling of Parliament?—No; if ways and means had not been voted they might have postponed it by misapplying the public money; but that was not the intention of either Government, I am quite sure. The real point seems to be this: in the case of the vote for the Duke of Wellington's funeral, 80,000 l. was voted, which I was asked to advance at a particular time, but there were no ways and means appropriated for the advance of that particular time. Here is the original order under the sign manual. I did not cancel the warrant, but suspended it, but here is my note upon it, "Suspended upon the 11th of March until we have the ways and means." There is apparently time only engaged, but in that time there is matter actually of essence, because if I had acted upon the Treasury warrant, and the Royal order that came to me in 1841 I might have paid the votes of the fourth quarter out of the ways and means that were provided for the three first quarters.

896. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Is there not a difference in those two cases: with regard to the Duke of Wellington's funeral there is a single vote, for which, according to the supposition, no ways and means are provided; but in the other case that you are mentioning there is a single vote which is divided into two portions, and the question is, whether you could apply a part of the ways and means that were intended for the first portion to the second portion; will you explain how it is possible that that case should arise; supposing that the vote for stores is a million, and supposing three-quarters of a million are at the disposal of the Government as ways and means, how can it be said that they apply any portion of that three-quarters of a million to the stores of the last quarter of the year?—The thing can be as clearly done as possible. Supposing you have your three quarters supply voted; supposing you have ways and means voted for three quarters, and supposing you have in respect to the fourth quarter the supply voted; by a construction of law you consolidate the two services, and call upon me to advance for the supply of the fourth quarter, and pay it out of the ways and means that were provided for the first three quarters, I am doing that which is plainly and obviously wrong.

897. What possible inducement could the Treasury have to call upon you to issue out of the supply for the fourth quarter when they had ways and means for the first three quarters, and which were applicable to the head of stores?—I do not see the particular relevancy, taking the particular instance. The construction put by the Treasury would have enabled them, by applying their ways and means voted for the three first quarters, to issue money for supplies in the fourth quarter, for which no ways and means had been provided; this would have been contrary to law.

898. Mr. Wilson.] Suppose you take a vote of three-fourths of the army services for five millions of money, and then take ways and means for five millions of money with regard to the army services for the whole year, you can make no distinction as to the purposes to which that vote is to be put, excepting for army services generally; you will issue ways and means up to the extent of 5,000,000 l. and no further, and therefore it would be impossible, would it not, for the Treasury, under any circumstances, till they had a further vote of supply and and further ways and means, to exceed the original vote?—If you have got supplies voted in the first instance for three quarters, and if in the last vote in the fourth quarter. you take a vote for the remaining fourth of the supply, and if you then call upon the Exchequer to issue upon the supply votes included together in the fourth quarter, and to pay that by the ways and means provided in reference to the three-fourths, you are paying money out of a fund not appropriated for such purpose.

899. How could that take place; there is no distinction; the whole is for army services, and if the Treasury could call for an issue at all it must be within the ways and means as you have stated, which have been granted for that supply. The Comptroller of the Exchequer could make no distinction whether it belonged to the three-fourths or the one-fourth, it is all for army services; his limit would be the amount of ways and means that he possessed towards that service?—It must be the service for the time for which the issue is to be made; here is a case; here is a regular Royal Order, asking me to issue, upon a day stated, the 11th of March 1856, that being for the service of the next year, for which no ways and means were voted, if I had made that issue at the time that I was asked to do it, I should have paid it out of ways and means that did not belong to that vote.

900. Mr. Bowyer.] In short, the case did happen which the honourable gentleman said could not have occurred?—It exactly occurred there, my object being to show that time in all these matters is material.

901. Mr. Peacocke.] Practically speaking, the case could only occur where there was an excess of supply over the ways and means in the first three quarters?—There is no objection to there being an excess in supply; there is a Parliamentary objection to an excess of ways and means; but you may be short in your ways and means; you may have ways and means voted for the first votes and not for the others; and if you take the power of issuing under those circumstances, the time is shown to be of the essence of the whole matter, distinguishing between what is legal and illegal.

902. Mr. Bowyer.] There the control of the Exchequer is very material, is it not?—Yes; but whether it was so or not, what I take the liberty of representing to the Committee is that a strict and invariable adherence to the law of the land, and Parliamentary appropriation, is the question which is the essence of the whole, and the opinion given by the Crown lawyers was in my favour.

903. Chairman.] Though practically this exercise of your control may not have been of very great importance, do you not consider that the question which was involved in it was of the utmost importance?—The principle is the whole principle of appropriation and obedience to the law; and if the Committee wish to receive (which I shall be most happy to lay before them), the correspondence with Mr. Goulburn on the matter, they will find that he considered it a matter of vital importance.

904. In point of fact, is it not the same question upon a small point as it would be of applying the ways and means of one year to the service of another?—Precisely the same.

905. If it had been yielded to on that occasion it would have formed a precedent, would it not, for similar cases, such as you have alluded to in the case of the Duke of Wellington's funeral?—I think if I had conceded this point, of putting a construction upon a vote of Parliament, in place of looking to the law of the land, or abandoning the strict appropriation of Parliament, the sooner you put an end to Appropriation Acts, and the sooner you get rid of the Comptroller-general of the Exchequer, the better.

906. Mr. Bowyer.] In fact, in the case to which your Lordship has referred, the Government wanted to have the money for the one-fourth (for which there had been no supply of ways and means), and which was intended for the three-quarters for which there had been ways and means voted?—They wanted to get the indiscriminate power of issue, and it was upon that point that the law officers decided that my construction was the legal one, and that the construction put by Mr. Goulburn was not sustainable in strict law.

907. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Do you remember whether the warrants that you have referred to were issued after the second Ways and Means Act had passed, or prior to it?—I would like to put in the whole of the correspondence upon this subject. The Committee will find that a real question at issue was the want of ways and means, and this rested on the question of time.

time. The date of this Royal Order in question was the 27th day of December 1841; that was a correction of the mischief.

908. Were the original warrants issued subsequently to the end of the second Session?—There were no ways and means; it was before.

909. Chairman.] At the time when those warrants which were incorrect were issued had there been ways and means voted?—No, there had not.

910. Mr. Cardwell.] Then the real difficulty was, as I last understood your Lordship, that the warrant to which you were asked to give effect would have exceeded the ways and means which Parliament had placed at your disposal?—No; but it would have misapplied the ways and means. You cannot apply the ways and means except under an Appropriation Act.

911. Do you mean, that there being ways and means for three quarters, they would have been applied to the expenditure of the fourth quarter?—Yes, exactly, being under another Act in another Session when no supply had been voted; to which ways and means were legally applicable.

912. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] How did the plan adopted by the Treasury increase the quantity of ways and means?—It corrected, by the Queen's authority, and that of a Treasury warrant, the instruments which otherwise were irregular and inoperative. The correction was afterwards sanctioned by Parliament; for the whole of these there was an Act of Parliament passed afterwards; the inconvenience would have been so great, that an Act was brought in, which Mr. Goulburn laid before me, and that did consolidate all the votes of supply, and all the votes of ways and means.

913. That was before the end of the short Session, was it not?—Yes, I think it was, and that made it all right; but in the meanwhile I was enabled to act, if the case required it, upon that correction.

914. Then the course that you objected to was in fact ultimately made legal by Act of Parliament, was it not?—The course that I objected to was made legal by Act of Parliament. I proved that it was illegal without such an Act of Parliament being passed.

915. It was found to be illegal, but convenient, and therefore it was legalized by Act of Parliament, and ultimately acted upon by the Government?—No doubt; and if I had been vested with the power of making law in place of administering it, I might have done what the authority of Queen, Lords and Commons were afterwards required to do; it was a special Act to meet that particular case.

916. The amended warrants probably were issued under that Act of Parliament?—No, certainly not; because the Royal Order was for the purpose of meeting the objection as to the ways and means; and Mr. Goulburn's correspondence will show that that was the point. The Royal Order is dated the 27th day of December 1841, and the Treasury Minute bears the same date.

917. Mr. Cardwell.] You cannot operate upon ways and means before Parliament has placed them at your disposal?—No, nor for any uses unsanctioned by law.

918. Mr. Wilson.] Was this Royal Order made after the second Appropriation Act had been passed?—Yes.

919. The Royal Order recites that the Appropriation Act has been passed?—"Whereas by various Royal Orders, as hereinafter set forth, given by us, bearing date on the 1st day of October 1841 next, being prior to the day of passing the Act in the last Session of Parliament, entitled, 'An Act for funding Exchequer Bills, &c.,' and another Act for raising the sum of 10,626,000 l. by Exchequer bills for the service of the year, we authorise credits to be given by you for certain services voted in the last Session of Parliament, at such times, and in such proportions, and out of such funds as should be specified in the warrants and directions to be given by the Commissioners of our Treasury. And these are to declare it to be our Royal will and pleasure that the said Royal Orders, and the directions contained therein, shall be taken, received and acted upon in the same manner as if all such Royal Orders had been dated subsequently to the day of the passing of the said Acts." Then follow a list of services, 106 in number, with a corresponding Treasury warrant of the same date to the same effect. Errors of a like character occurred in the year 1852, which, upon an objection raised by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, were corrected by Royal Orders and Treasury Warrants, bearing date the 24th and 25th day of June 1852.

920. Mr. Bowyer.] The object was to cure what was wrong?—Yes.

921. Mr. Cardwell.] We want to find out what was wrong. The first warrant had had gone on ways and means not yet placed at your Lordship's disposal, and therefore it was necessary to have a warrant that should operate after the Act had passed, and when the ways and means were at your Lordship's disposal?—Yes; it is very much plainer upon the face of the opinion of the Crown lawyers themselves. I was asked by the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether this was to be taken as an exponent of the most important cases of control exercised by me; I answered in the negative; it was brought forward in answer to the supposed non-existence of any cases of control; but I can put the Committee in possession of cases of a very different character. I am, however, far from underrating the import of this case.

5 June 1856.

922. Mr. Williams.] The amount of the Civil List is 385,000 l. a year, is it not?—Yes.

923. It appears by the account rendered to Parliament that the expenditure for the year ending the 31st of March last, was 396,457 l. 10 s.; will you explain how that extra sum has been paid?—The one includes the Civil List pensions, those that are granted at the rate of 1,200 l. a year, under the Civil List arrangement; that sum includes the payments of those Civil List pensions. The Civil List is limited exactly as the Honourable Gentleman suggested; but Her Majesty has the power of granting, under the Civil List Act, pensions to the amount of 1,200 l. every year; therefore the accumulation of those grants forms an issue beyond the actual amount which is issued for the regular Civil List purposes; but no more than the amount granted by Parliament is ever issued for Civil List purposes.

924. The pensions formed one of the items of the Civil List, did they not?—No, they did not. There is the sum which has been stated, a fixed and definite sum, and there is the power of granting Civil List pensions to the amount of 1,200 l. a year; so that the second year it would be 2,400 l., and the third year 3,600 l., and the fourth year 4,800 l., supposing no deaths to occur.

925. I understand that those pensions are not dependent upon deaths, but the Queen has the power of granting pensions to the amount of 1,200 l. every year?—Not exceeding that amount; but that has nothing to say to the amount fixed by the Civil List; the Act of Parliament provides for that separately.

926. Here is a payment in excess, 11,457 l. 10 s.?—That is the way in which it is partly accounted for. As a further explanation, I have to state that there were savings of the Civil List, in former years allowed to remain in the Exchequer, but which were drawn in this year. I can tell you that not one farthing is issued for the Civil List beyond the amount of the Parliamentary grant.

927. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] I am desirous of knowing what is the most important instance of the exercise of the control of the Exchequer during your incumbency of the office?—I shall be able to refer to that; it is a difficult case to explain; but I will say that the number of instances of control in itself do not exhibit the whole operation of the Exchequer, because it has been the usage of the various Governments, from 1839 to the present time, when they have had to prepare warrants or other instruments, in respect to which any difficulty might arise, to send me those warrants, &c. in draft before they had passed the Treasury, to know in what way, in my judgment, they might be made conformable to law, and that advice has been given before the issuing of the warrant, greatly to the convenience of the Treasury, and not to my inconvenience, though it has been more laborious. I hold in my hand a list of the cases in which the control has been exercised, as it were, by anticipation, in which the instrument has been sent to me for my observation and correction, and that correction has generally so taken place.

928. I understand that you wish to contradict the statement which Sir Charles Trevelyan made in 1848, that there were but two instances in which the control of the Exchequer had been exercised; he mentions Lord Grenville's case, and one other, in which the control of the Exchequer had been exercised; I am desirous of learning from your Lordship what you consider to be the most important case in which that control had been exercised for the protection of the public against the Executive Government?—I have already shown in two instances above 200 cases, in reply to the assertion that there was but one. With respect to the importance and materiality of those cases, it will be for the Committee to determine. With respect to the exercise of control generally, I can give the Committee a list of every case in which it has been exercised. The Committee can select instances for themselves; I am ready to produce those instances, and to give them the documents, and they will themselves selves be capable of judging how far they were important or not. But as to there being only one single case in which the control of the Exchequer has been exercised by me, I have shown the Committee that in point of fact that is a mistake. I have shown you already above two hundred.

5 June 1856.

929. Mr. Bowyer.] To show control on the part of the Exchequer, it is not necessary to show cases of refusal?—In the most important way in which the Comptroller of the Exchequer can act, he acts in the way of prevention; and the knowledge of that check prevents the necessity of exercising it.

930. In more important cases probably there would be no occasion for the Comptroller to refuse?—I have been asked to pay without having ways and means to pay, contrary to the intention and enactments of Parliament, and I have exercised control in those instances, and this I conceive to be material in the highest degree; but I can select many other examples if the Committee wish me to do so. I refer to the index I have put in, and more especially to the précès and correspondence on the most important cases. This is also before the Committee.

THE RIGHT HON. SIR FRANCIS T. BARING, IN THE CHAIR.

William George Anderson, Esq., called in; and Examined.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

9 June 1856.

931. Chairman.] WHAT office do you hold?—I am Principal Clerk in charge of the financial business of the Treasury.

932. How long have you held that office?—Since the commencement of the war in April 1854.

933. Before that you were Deputy Paymaster?—I was Assistant Paymaster before that.

934. How long did you hold that situation?—From 1838 to 1854.

935. From the time when the Bill of 1835 was passed?—About 15 months after that Bill was brought into operation.

936. Then a great part of the arrangements consequent on that Bill were made in your time?—Yes. I had to carry out many of those arrangements; the principles were settled before I was appointed.

937. Mr. Wilson.] Before that, what office did you hold?—I was in the Navy Office from the year 1825 till that department was consolidated with the Admiralty.

938. Were you in the Navy Office when the great reforms were introduced by Sir James Graham?—Yes; that took place in the year 1832.

939. What, in your opinion, is the great object of the finance system?—It appears to me that the objects of such a system should be, the security of the public money, the utmost simplicity of management, and the greatest economy in the employment of the public balances.

940. How do you think that those three objects are to be best attained, as a general principle?—I think that those objects will be best attained by placing the finances under one undivided control and responsibility, consolidating all the public monies into one fund, and issuing them from that fund under one direct authority,—the direct authority of the controlling department.

941. Will you describe, as briefly as is consistent with the object of the Committee, the sources of revenue and the other receipts of the public money?—The sources of revenue are, the great branches of revenue which are controlled by the revenue departments; those take in all the ordinary revenues; and there are various miscellaneous receipts which come in principally through the departments of expenditure, such as old stores, and a variety of other items, which are detailed in the finance accounts. Another item of receipt arises from the repayments of advances, which are the reimbursements of loans which have been made out of the Consolidated Fund for a variety of public services. In addition to those, there are special receipts, such as loans, Exchequer bills, and Exchequer bonds. There are also temporary advances which are required to make up the deficiency of the Consolidated Fund, or sometimes to make up the deficiency of the revenue to meet the supply services. These are the great branches of the public revenue, and other receipts, making up the aggregate account of the Exchequer.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

942. In what way are those monies made applicable to the public service?—As regards the Consolidated Fund services, the Acts under which the grants are made create a charge at once upon the Consolidated Fund. No further authority, therefore, is required than the Act itself for the issue of those monies from the Consolidated Fund. The supply services are also issued from the Consolidated Fund, but through the medium of Ways and Means Acts.

943. The supply services are services voted by Parliament in each Session; are those votes applicable to the public services before they have received the assent of Parliament in an Appropriation Act, simply upon the vote of the House of Commons?—Yes, they are immediately available for the public service, provided a Ways and Means Act has passed both Houses and received the Royal Assent; an Appropriation Act afterwards confirms those votes, but the issue is made notwithstanding the Appropriation Act has not been passed.

944. According to the practice from time immemorial, a vote of the House of Commons has been considered, has it not, sufficient authority for the issue of money for the supply services, provided a Ways and Means Bill has passed the Legislature covering a sufficient sum to cover those votes of supply?—Exactly so.

945. After the votes of supply are taken, a Ways and Means Bill is passed in general terms for a given sum of money, the Legislature generally not exercising any direct control over any particular vote?—The votes in supply are specially applicable to the services for which they are given by the House of Commons, but the grants of ways and means are general, and they over-ride the whole of the supplies.

946. In the Appropriation Act the whole of the votes of supply are set out in detail, and the ways and means made applicable to these votes, and by that means the whole of the votes of supply obtain legislative force as well as the ways and means?—Yes; in the Appropriation Act the ways and means granted equal the supplies voted, with the addition of the interest of the Exchequer bills, which is not a voted service, but is charged on the supplies. The House of Commons, or rather the Speaker, in fixing the amount of balance of ways and means which shall be granted in the Appropriation Act, allows, in addition to the amount of the votes, the interest of the Exchequer bills.

947. Will you describe generally the application of those monies?—The monies paid into the Consolidated Fund are applicable, in the first instance, to the payment of all those charges which by law are payable directly out of the Consolidated Fund, the interest of the debt (which is a prior charge), the civil list, the annuities, the pensions, and certain salaries, the courts of justice, and a variety of miscellaneous charges; they are next available for the services charged on supplies, through Ways and Means Acts, for the army, navy, and ordnance, and the various supply services. There are other services, such as advances by way of loan, and any deficiency bills, or any ways and means bills, issued to make good the deficiency of the Consolidated Fund, which are also payable out of any monies that are paid into the Exchequer to the account of the Consolidated Fund.

948. According to the existing state of the law, has the interest upon the debt a prior claim upon all other charges at the moment it becomes due?—It is a prior charge upon the whole balance of the Consolidated Fund. On making up the account of income and charge upon the Consolidated Fund at the close of each quarter, the whole balance which remains is set aside, provided it does not exceed the amount of the charge for the payment of the debt; so that we generally commence the quarter without a sixpence in the Exchequer.

949. That is, unless you have more balances than are sufficient to pay the interest of the debt?—The interest of the debt, and other charges upon the Consolidated Fund; the whole of the charges upon the Consolidated Fund have a prior charge.

950. But

9 June 1856.

950. But the other charges upon the Consolidated Fund, though made up, are not due at any moment?—Some of them are due; the Civil List is due on the last day of the quarter; many of the other charges are not due till the old quarter days, the 5th of July and the 5th of January.

951. Of course the Consolidated Fund charges have in that way a prior claim upon the monies in the Consolidated Fund, at the close of the quarter, to the supply services?—Exactly; and any deficiency between the full amount of the charge and the amount of that balance makes up the amount of the deficiency bills required to make good those charges.

952. Therefore it becomes absolutely necessary, at the time when the quarter's account is made up, to make a provision which shall be sufficient to carry on the supply services for a reasonable time after the close of the quarter, till the revenue of the succeeding quarter may be adequate to meet those occurring expenses?—Unless that provision were made, we should stop payment in the early part of the quarter, or be compelled to borrow from the Bank on ways and means bills.

953. Therefore it is necessary for the Paymaster, on the last day of each quarter, prior to the Exchequer being exhausted, with reference to the Consolidated Fund charges, to make a provision for a short time, and to be put in a condition to meet the expenditure of the next 10 or 14 days?—Yes, to meet the expenditure of the next 10 or 14 days, in order to carry on the public service until the accruing revenue of the following quarter furnishes the means of carrying on the public service.

954. Mr. Henley.] It has been stated, that owing to the prior charges upon the Consolidated Fund at the end of each quarter absorbing all the monies in the Exchequer, and leaving the Exchequer for future purposes bare, it was necessary that the Paymaster should be in funds to meet the accruing charges upon him for 14 or 15 days, till the revenue comes in again. From what sources are those funds to be obtained, and by what process is it that the Paymaster is to be put in funds to meet those charges?—By an issue out of the Consolidated Fund, on or before the last day of the quarter; you may make any issue up to the close of the quarter for supply services, but when once the quarter is closed, and you have made up your charge upon the income, whatever balance is struck must be set aside for the debt. Practically it is giving priority to the supply services; it is so far a fiction.

955. Then, in point of fact, by means of this process, the putting the Paymaster in funds, if there were a deficiency, and that deficiency were not supplied by other means, would be defeated?—Yes.

956. In what mode does the 14 or 15 days' revenue come in, which you say comes in to the Paymaster; will it not first go into the Exchequer, and then be issued to him?—Yes, in the ordinary course; the money is paid into the Exchequer, and then in the ordinary routine it is issued through the Exchequer, and the Paymaster is funded again from day to day.

957. Mr. Williams.] Is there any public money existing now that does not form a part of the Consolidated Fund?—All public monies pass into the Exchequer.

958. As part of the Consolidated Fund?—The last year is the first year in which we may say that the whole of the public monies have passed into the Consolidated Fund. During the old war a large portion of all the war taxes, and all the loans and other monies raised for war services, were made directly applicable to the supply services, and they did not form part of the Consolidated Fund, though they went into the Exchequer; therefore, when you had closed the account at the end of the quarter, those monies were not set aside for the debt, because Parliament had appropriated them specially for the supply services, and they could not be issued for any other; but in this last year, 1855–56, for the first time, the loans, the Exchequer bills, and the proceeds of every security upon which the Government has been authorised to raise money, have passed into the Consolidated Fund, and all issues for the supply services have been made out of the Consolidated Fund under the authority of Ways and Means Acts.

959. Was there a certain reason for making the alteration to which you have alluded, within the last 12 months?—It promotes simplicity in the accounts; and altogether it is more regular that all monies should pass into one fund and out again under the usual forms.

960. Chairman.] As it was recommended by the Committee of 1831?—I do not think that they entered into that question of extraordinary receipts, such as loans; as to the revenue generally, they recommended that the whole of the proceeds of taxation should be paid into the Consolidated Fund.

9 June 1856.

961. Sir Henry Willoughby.] Are the accounts made out quarterly; the accounts, for instance, of the supply services?—The accounts are made up every quarter; they are made up for official purposes more frequently than that, of course; but an account is prepared for Parliament at the end of each quarter, embracing the preceding 12 months; so that it is a quarterly account and an annual account at the same time.

962. Are you aware that the quarterly accounts of the supply services do not tally with the annual accounts?—I am not aware that they differ.

963. Mr. G. A. Hamilton.] Will you be so good as put in evidence precisely what is meant by the term Consolidated Fund?—It is the great account into which all the public means, and all the revenues of the State pass, and it would be represented by the capital account of a merchant.

964. Chairman.] The Ways and Means Acts are the foundation, are they not, of that power of applying money to any services voted by Parliament?—To any services voted in the particular Session in which the Act is passed.

965. They are confined to that, are they not?—They over-ride the whole of the supplies for the particular year.

966. Sir James Graham.] The Consolidated Fund charges, as contradistinguished from supply charges, are fixed by Act of Parliament, and are permanent charges?—Precisely so.

967. The supply charges vary from year to year according to the vote of Parliament?—Yes; they are only granted for a limited period, that is, for that one year.

968. With respect to the first class of charges, the fixed Consolidated Fund charges; from time to time, when payments are made in pursuance of those Acts of Parliament creating the charge, does any warrant issue from the Exchequer directing payment quarterly or half-yearly, as the case may be?—The warrant is prepared quarterly; the Treasury send a warrant to the Exchequer, and the Exchequer then issues the amount of that warrant to the Paymaster-general. A duplicate of that warrant goes from the Treasury to the Paymaster-general to authorise him to pay; that is the form in which the transaction takes place.

969. With respect to the charges invariable and fixed by Act of Parliament, invariably on the Consolidated Fund, prior to each of those payments quarterly or half-yearly, as the case may be, there is a Treasury warrant?—Yes, for each issue.

970. Does that apply to the dividends?—Yes; there is a special warrant from the Treasury each quarter for the payment of the dividends, authorising the Comptroller to place the money to the credit of the chief cashier of the Bank of England, and the sums for life annuities to the National Debt Commissioners.

971. Does that warrant embrace the aggregate charge, or is it subdivided into different heads?—It sets forth merely the amount of each stock, and the interest upon each.

972. With regard to the payment of salaries, or the judicial branch, or the Civil List, is it in one lump sum, or are there different heads set forth in the Treasury warrant?—The Treasury warrant sets forth the whole of the charges in detail; in some cases they are taken in classes, but those cases are very few; the rule is, that they are all set forth in detail in the warrant to the Exchequer as well as in the warrant to the Paymaster-general.

973. Then the warrants are in duplicate now, are they not?—Yes, they must be, for we have two authorities to supply.

974. One goes to the Exchequer, and the other to the Paymaster-general?—Yes; the Paymaster pays upon one of the warrants, and it becomes his voucher.

975. Are both of these sets of warrants kept?—Yes.

976. Are they filed?—Yes; the Paymaster's warrant is finally deposited, with his vouchers for the payment, with the Commissioners of Audit.

977. And the Comptroller of the Exchequer has a warrant as a voucher for the issue of the same?—Yes.

978. Mr. Henley.] The warrant to the Comptroller of the Exchequer being to issue to the Paymaster, and the warrant to the Paymaster being to distribute to the parties?—Yes.

979. Mr. Williams.] Would it not be an improvement if a warrant were made out for every distinct item of payment?—To issue a separate warrant for for every item would only multiply the labour unnecessarily; one warrant covers perhaps 200 or 300 charges.

980. Do you detail those charges in that particular warrant?—They are scheduled, and the warrant covers the whole.

981. Still a detail is given, accompanying that warrant?—Yes, a detail is given in the warrant, which goes to the Exchequer for the issue of the money.

982. Chairman.] Are the warrants printed?—In most cases; they are so voluminous that we could not write them.

983. Mr. Wilson.] Reference has been made to the Report of the Commissioners in 1831; will you describe to the Committee the state of the Exchequer at that time, and the alterations recommended by that Report?—It would be rather difficult to give the state of the Exchequer prior to the change that took place in 1834; it is detailed in this Report. There was a vast number of ancient formalities which it was considered desirable to get rid of. There was the fiction of paying the revenue into the Exchequer instead of the Bank of England. I believe cancelled notes were taken up; the Exchequer was also at that time partly a pay-office. The Commissioners of Account in 1831 limited the duties of the Exchequer to the receipt and custody of the public money, and to the issue of that money under the authorities which are defined by the Act of Parliament.

984. Does it appear to you that the regulations of the Exchequer as they then existed had arisen, in a very great degree, from the fact that the Government was its own banker, and held its own money, and that provision had to be made for the safe custody of it, but when the Bank came to be employed to retain that money, the whole object of those regulations ceased?—Precisely; prior to the change in 1834 their functions were to receive, hold, and disburse the public monies. In ancient times it was an indispensable institution, because we had not the facility now afforded by the Bank of England to take charge of the public money, and it was necessary that the different receivers should pay the money into the Treasury itself; but the adoption of banking facilities, both for the remittance of revenue from the different parts of the country, and more especially the facilities given by the Bank of England in taking charge of the whole of the public monies, appears to me to have removed the foundation upon which the ancient Exchequer rested.

985. Up to that period, although banking accounts were kept, clerks attended from the Bank of England to receive money from the various receivers of the revenue?—Yes, they did.

986. Will you just describe the chief recommendations of the Commissioners of 1831, and what the object of that change was?—The chief recommendations of the Commissioners of 1831 were, that the revenues should be paid into the Exchequer in gross; that all incidental receipts, which up to that time had been appropriated on the estimates of the different departments of expenditure, should also be paid into the Exchequer. They also recommended that the revenue should be paid directly to the Bank, instead of being paid to the Exchequer. They further recommended that all the Exchequer monies should be consolidated into one fund at the Bank, that the forms of issue should be simplified, and that the establishment should be largely reduced.

987. The whole object being a great consolidation of labour and of the functions of the Exchequer?—Yes.

988. In pursuance of that Report, an Act was passed in 1834; did that Act carry out the recommendations of the Committee?—It carried out nearly all the recommendations of the Committee as regards the alteration of the functions of the Exchequer, with the exception that it did not require that the gross revenue should be paid into the Exchequer; nor did it touch those incidental receipts, such as old stores, which continued to be deducted from the estimates of the different departments. Those changes have been carried out at a subsequent period, one of them only the year before last.

989. Under that Act the Exchequer was remodelled, was it not?—Yes, upon the Report of the Commissioners of 1831, but with these exceptions.

990. Will you just describe what the formation of the Exchequer is as it stands now under that Act of Parliament and the present system?—The functions of the Exchequer, as described in the Report of the Commissioners of 1831, embrace the receipt, the safe custody, the legal appropriation, and the record of the public monies. The Committee are aware, as regards the receipts, that that the great revenue departments collect the revenue under the authority of Parliament, and they are charged in fact with administering the laws by which the taxes are levied on the people. The revenue is assessed and collected by various collectors, stationed in all parts of the United Kingdom, who are accountable solely to those great departments. The functions of those departments are to enforce all the checks necessary to secure the correct assessment of the duties, and the safe custody of the monies collected; to regulate also the modes and forms of transmission of those monies to the head office in London, and the final deposit of them in the Exchequer. It is also their duty to see in those cases in which the revenue is applied for the public service at the places where it is collected, that it is advanced for services authorised by Parliament, or by other competent authority, and to effect the recoveries as speedily as possible, and pay them to the credit of the proper branches of the revenue in the Exchequer.

991. The Exchequer has no function of control over the collection of any monies, or over any part of the public revenue, until it is paid into the Exchequer?—It knows nothing of the monies until they are placed to the Exchequer account by those whose duty it is to collect them.

992. All the other previous steps are taken under other and distinct authorities?—All the revenues are collected under the responsibility of the Executive Departments.

993. There is no money, properly speaking, now paid into the Exchequer at all?—No, the Exchequer officers cannot touch the money; the monies are placed to the account of the Exchequer at the Bank, and they can only write off or transfer to other accounts.

994. Every private payment of any kind on account of the Exchequer must be made direct to the Bank of England, and a mere intimation is made to the Exchequer of that payment?—Precisely. The Bank furnishes daily returns of the sums which have been placed to the account of the Exchequer.

995. So that what is called the "Receipt into the Exchequer" is now only the intimation of the monies which have been paid on the Exchequer account into the Bank of England?—Nothing more. Another function of the Exchequer is the safe custody of the public money.

996. When you say "the safe custody of the public money," do you mean the safe conduct of the account in the Bank of England known as the Exchequer account?—I allude to what the Commissioners in 1831 describe as the second function of the Exchequer, which is, that they are charged with the safe custody of the money; that is a duty which is, in fact, done by the Bank of England. Formerly the Exchequer, when it had the receipt of the monies, and held them, had a distinct responsibility for the custody of them. At present that duty is entirely superseded, and done for it by the Bank of England.

997. Under the old system the Exchequer held money in cash and notes in a strong chest, and one of their most important functions was the safe custody of that money; but now there is no money going into the Exchequer, but it all goes into the Bank of England; the Bank of England are the custodiers of the money, and the Exchequer merely control the account of the Bank of England?—It is simply now a matter of account with the Exchequer, and not a question of the custody of the monies.

998. Will you explain to the Committee the functions of the Comptroller of the Exchequer over the issues of money out of the Exchequer, and also the control which he has over any payment that is to be made, first of all, upon the Consolidated Fund charges, and, secondly, on the supply services?—No issue of public money can take place from the Exchequer account for the Consolidated Fund services, except upon a Treasury warrant. The Comptroller has the examination of that warrant, and some of the charges he is obliged to take for granted; but in some cases, by a comparison of the documents with former vouchers, and the Acts of Parliament by which the charges are authorised, he can exercise a check, so as to see that those payments are correct; in fact, he can do, before payment, what the Audit Board does after payment. As to the supply services, his check amounts simply to this, that you cannot exceed the aggregate of the supplies voted; for although issues are made under distinct votes, he cannot follow up the payments made out of those votes; he must issue to the full extent of any vote, upon the orders of the Treasury, and of those monies, when once they are gone from him, he knows nothing more.

999. Then

999. Then the control which the Comptroller of the Exchequer exercises is, that upon all issues which are made upon the Consolidated Fund it is his duty to see that those issues are made under the Acts of Parliament which are referred to in the Treasury warrant?—Yes.

1000. It is his duty to see also with regard to those issues upon the supply services, that no issue is made exceeding the amount voted by Parliament?—That is his duty.

1001. Will you describe to the Committee the formal documents that are used in order to get money out of the Exchequer, or rather from the Exchequer account into the Pay-office?—As regards the services charged on the Consolidated Fund, it is simply a Treasury warrant. The Act of Parliament makes a charge upon the Consolidated Fund, and it only requires the authority of the Treasury for the issue; but as to the supply services the form is this: the Crown presents estimates to Parliament, votes in supply are obtained, and Ways and Means Acts are passed; the supply being granted to the Crown, it is necessary to have the authority of the Crown for the issue; a Royal Order is therefore obtained, which is prepared at the Treasury, and sent to the Queen for signature, authorising the Comptroller to issue, on the authority of the Treasury, the whole amount of the vote. This Royal Order is always accompanied by a Treasury warrant in the same terms, and also embracing the aggregate of the vote, authorising the Comptroller to issue upon special applications, from time to time, as money is wanted. The Comptroller receives, very soon after the grant is made, full authority for the whole issue for the year, and then, when money is wanted from time to time, there is an issuing letter, signed by one of the Secretaries of the Treasury, and upon that the actual issue of money takes place.

1002. Then there is not a Royal Order required or used for each particular vote; but supposing that the appropriation account had been closed for the year, a Royal Order would be issued for the whole amount of the services remaining for which Royal Orders had not been previously given?—The army grants are usually included in two Royal Orders, and the same for the navy. As to the miscellaneous services, it was formerly the practice, up to the last year, to have a separate Royal Order for each separate vote, but the number of votes was so much increased last year, that we did not like to place before the Queen 200 or 300 Royal Orders to sign at once; and we placed the whole of each class in one Royal Order, so that the Queen had to sign once instead of 50 or 60 times. There are eight classes in the Miscellaneous Estimates, and we had eight Royal Orders.

1003. Each Royal Order describing the separate vote for which it is made up?—Each Royal Order enumerates in the body of the document, in the terms of the resolution of the Committee of Supply, each separate vote to which it applies.

1004. Could you see any further security in multiplying the Royal Orders?—None at all; if the Crown granted one Royal Order for the whole of the civil services it would do equally well; it is a formal authority, but it is no check; it is prepared by the Treasury itself, and it is a necessary authority, because the grant is made to the Crown, and the assent of the Crown for the issue must be obtained.

1005. Therefore a fewer number of Royal Orders, if they could be compressed into one for the convenience of the service, would be an equal check as if there were a Royal Order for every single vote?—Precisely so; there is no check in the multiplication of those formal documents.

1006. When a Royal Order for the whole amount of the supplies of a year, Treasury warrants are lodged in the Exchequer, both of which are acts of the Treasury, and there is then nothing further to be done with regard to the Treasury but to send issuing letters from time to time to keep the Paymaster-general in funds out of the Exchequer?—When the Royal Orders and the Treasury warrants are lodged at the Exchequer, all the legal forms which sanction the issues are completed.

1007. Then the function of the Exchequer, as it now exists, may be said to be confined to these objects; first, to see that no issue is made upon the supplies of the year after they are voted, beyond the amount of the Ways and Means Bills, or until they are passed in that Session, to cover them; secondly, to see that no Treasury warrant is issued for charges upon the Consolidated Fund that are are not authorised by Act of Parliament; and thirdly, to see that no issue is made in the course of the year that exceeds the votes of Parliament as contained in the Appropriation Act?—Those are the duties of the present Exchequer.

9 June 1856.

1008. Has the Exchequer any power whatever of following those issues after they are out of the Exchequer?—None. The Exchequer has no power either as regards the Consolidated Fund services nor as to the supply services; when the money has once passed from the Exchequer, it is beyond Exchequer control, and the application of it rests entirely upon the fidelity of the Executive.

1009. Mr. Williams.] You are aware that the Commissioners in 1831, in very strong terms, recommended that all the public money should be paid into the Exchequer, or into the Bank of England, subsequently?—Yes; that was one of their leading recommendations.

1010. There was an Act passed in 1834 for the carrying out, to a certain extent, but not entirely, of that recommendation?—Precisely; that was the Exchequer Regulation Act.

1011. Can you state the reason why the whole of that recommendation was not carried out?—I suppose that the Government was not disposed to carry out the whole reform at once.

1012. That recommendation quite accorded with your own opinion, did it not?—Certainly. I think it is the foundation of a correct state of public accounts.

1013. There was no difficulty whatsoever, was there, in adopting it?—It has been done without difficulty; and as there has been no change of circumstances in the interval, I think that it might have been done with as little difficulty then.

1014. Under Mr. Gladstone's Act, I believe, the practice now is, that all the money since the passing of that Act has been paid into the Bank of England, on account of the Treasury?—No. Mr. Gladstone's first Bill, when submitted to the House of Commons, contemplated the removal of all the charges upon the gross revenue, with the exception of certain hereditary pensions, which he thought it would be better to redeem out of revenue, and to get rid of altogether. In the progress of the Bill in the House of Commons it was considered that there were vested rights. There were, for instance, Scotch charges, some judicial charges, and persons who had received salaries from the time of the Union out of the gross revenue, and it was thought that it would be a breach of faith to place them on the Votes of Parliament, and they were therefore left on the revenue. There were other matters, such as salaries, which were chargeable on the Consolidated Fund, which that Act also contemplated removing from the Consolidated Fund and placing on the votes in supply, and the same arrangement was made with regard to those; so that when the Act finally passed through Parliament, its chief object was defeated, because charges were still left on the gross revenue; the largest charge was the superannuations and pensions of the revenue departments; there was some want of information, or mistake in the House of Lords (I believe, they did not positively recommend that they should be struck off), but they were not able to come to any satisfactory conclusion, and they were left on the revenue.

1015. Was it not a departure from the terms of the terms of the Act for the Treasury to pay 213,000 l. for the redemption of those pensions out of the revenue without the authority of Parliament?—It was no departure from the terms of the Act of Parliament, because the pensions were chargeable upon the revenue, and as they had been paid for 200 years out of the revenue, I think the 27 years' purchase that was paid to extinguish them might very fairly come out of that revenue also. But it did not come before the Treasury as a new question: in the first place, there were precedents; and in the second place, Mr. Gladstone in moving the Bill had given, I think, a distinct intimation to Parliament that that course would be adopted; and again, the object for which it was done was, to enable the Government to place at the disposal of Parliament the gross revenue, and bring it under their control; looking therefore at the object and the precedents, I think that proceeding was justifiable.

1016. You have stated that all remittances of revenue are now paid into the Bank of England, and that the Bank of England acquaints the Treasury with the amount that they have received; do you receive also advice from the parties who make the payments, of the amounts which have been paid into the Bank of England?—Yes; the revenue is paid in daily, and the departments paying paying in the revenue send an advice to the Treasury, and also one to the Exchequer; and the Bank send a daily account current of all the receipts and payments to the Exchequer, and they send an account also to the Treasury, so that we have duplicate accounts of the transactions of the Bank on account of the Government.

1017. Mr. Henley.] You have stated in your evidence that the system of the Exchequer is a check upon the issue of the public money before, in the same way that the auditors check it afterwards. Are the Committee to understand that the audit does nothing more than that?—The Audit Board require all that the Exchequer require, but they require something more, they require proof of payment.

1018. In point of fact the Exchequer issues the money voted under the service of the army, for instance, and the audit sees that it is appropriated and actually paid to the different parties, getting the receipts and vouchers thereof?—The audit does not follow the appropriation upon the Paymaster's account; the appropriation audit is still a limited duty; it is applied to the great departments of the naval and military expenditure, but it has not yet been extended to the miscellaneous votes.

1019. In your judgment is that check, by means of the Exchequer, upon the issue of money for a particular service, a wholesome check?—No, I really see no check which is attained by the Exchequer.

1020. Are the Committee to understand, by your saying that it is of no service, that you think it better to let the money go in the first instance, and to look for its application afterwards, and not to have a check upon its issue, as well as upon its application?—I think that the only practical check that you can have is after it has been applied, and not before. You must issue the money on trust. The great departments of expenditure receive it on trust, and they distribute it on trust to the various imprest accountants, and it is not till it is finally paid away upon vouchers that you can really come to the true and final appropriation of the public money. That is a function which the Audit Board has performed very efficiently for many years in regard to the great naval and military departments.

1021. Then if I understand your opinion rightly upon this subject, it is this, that there ought to be no check whatever upon the Treasury as to any issue of money from the Exchequer, but that the only check, so far as the public is concerned, would be in the other departments, or parties to whom this money is issued?—I think that the Treasury should be the department of check, and its control is far more efficient than any which the Exchequer can exercise; it has the control over the expending departments. The Treasury spends but little itself, but it can control those by whom the public money is applied.

1022. Whether the Treasury have or have not exceeded the limits of Parliamentary authority in the issue of money, you think that there ought to be no machinery, whether of the Exchequer or otherwise, by which it would be at once controlled, and an improper issue prevented from taking place?—It is very difficult with regard to the great departments to exercise a perfect control even at the Treasury, because when the money is issued from the Exchequer we cannot say precisely to what year, or to what vote it is to be applied. A large proportion of it for foreign expenditure goes into the commissariat chests in large sums, and it is like a transfer to a sub-exchequer, you cannot make out your account of the sums expended under any vote for these great departments till their whole accounts are received after payment.

1023. Assuming that the army vote was 20 millions of money, are you of opinion that there ought to be no check upon the Treasury in issuing orders for payment out of the Exchequer funds to the amount of 25,000,000 l.?—I think that there might be a check, and that it is practicable to have a very simple one.

1024. What check would you suggest if you say that the Exchequer is no check now as it is constituted?—I think it is a simple banking question. The House of Commons gives a certain credit to the Government; let that sum be placed to the credit of the Government in the Bank, and let it have no power to draw beyond that. A check of that kind might be exercised through a counter signature, without going through the operation of doing the whole business twice over.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

9 June 1856.

1025. That might be done by whom?—By any authority which Parliament might choose to appoint.

1026. Then that would be another authority analogous to that of the Exchequer, only in a more simple form?—Yes.

1027. In what way would you make it more simple?—I think that a concurrent audit is the best check that you can have in any department; that audit which is now established in the great departments. The auditors see the payments made from day to day; they sit in the offices in which the accounts are made up, and in which the orders for payment are issued; and a check through them, I think, would be sufficient.

1028. That is rather upon the expenditure of the money after it gets into the Paymaster's hands than upon the first issue out of the Consolidated Fund?—But extend it to the Treasury itself, where it does not exist; I think it ought to be extended to the whole, from first to last.

1029. If a Treasury warrant were to be framed to an amount not authorised by the Appropriation Act, or the Act of Parliament authorising the issue, will you state whether, in your judgment, there ought to be any check upon the power of the Treasury to grant such warrants against the banker holding the public money in his hands?—I think the Treasury itself should exercise a check of that kind; but even under the present system it is very difficult to apply it, because though you may not issue more than the credits granted, yet the year's supplies run so completely one into the other, that it is difficult to draw the line. Though you do not issue in the aggregate more than Parliament has voted, you may have issued more than is allowed for the expenditure of the particular year.

1030. Still, keeping to the question of the army service, and a given sum of money, if I understand you, you are of opinion that there should be a check upon the Treasury; but from your last answer, I gather that you think that the present check is not sufficient?—The present check of the Exchequer, I think, is ineffective; it prevents your issuing beyond the total amount of the grants, but not being able to follow the amount, it does not see the appropriation of the issues.

1031. That is altogether another matter; do you think that the present Exchequer system is sufficient to prevent the Treasury from drawing out the funds of the country and placing into the hands of the Paymaster-general that sum which is appropriated to a particular service; do you think that it is sufficient for that end?—The check is sufficient as to the total of the grants, but as to the detail of the application of them it is insufficient.

1032. Do you think that it would be desirable that the Exchequer control should be extended as to the separate items of those large grants?—In theory that control does exist, for the monies are drawn out under each vote, but as the Exchequer cannot follow the money it does not see the application thereof.

1033. I am confining myself to the question as to the issue from the Exchequer; do you think that the present system is sufficient in the control of the issue of money from the Exchequer?—No, I think it is not sufficient.

1034. In what way would you suggest that the control should be made more efficient?—I see no way in which that control can be made efficient; the Exchequer can have no control over the final appropriation of the public money.

1035. I am not inquiring about the final appropriation of the public money; be so good as to confine yourself to the issue of money into the hands of the man who has to appropriate it; do you consider the control now exercised by the Exchequer a sufficient check for that issue?—It is the utmost that you can have. I see no means by which you can make it more efficient than it is.

1036. In your judgment, it not being possible to make it more efficient than it is, I ask you next, is it so far sufficient as to prevent the possibility of larger sums of money being issued from the Exchequer, under a Treasury warrant, greater than that which the authority of Parliament has sanctioned?—It prevents the issue of any sum of money under a vote larger than the amount of the vote sanctioned by Parliament; but it would not prevent the application of a vote granted for one service for another, which would practically be exceeding the grant for that service.

1037. Assuming 20,000,000 l. to be voted for the navy, and 20,000,000 l. for the army, do you mean the Committee to understand that under the existing system, if the Treasury were to send a warrant for the issue of 25,000,000 l. for the service of the army, and 15,000,000 l. for the service of the navy, making

40 millions of money together, that there would be no control in the Exchequer to prevent that issue?—Pardon me, the Treasury could not issue 25,000,000 l. upon a vote for the army, if it was only 20,000,000 l.; it would be at once stopped. But supposing 15,000,000 l. to be required for the navy, and the Treasury issued 20,000,000 l. and applied 5,000,000 l. of that sum to the army, that would be practically the issue of 25,000,000 l. for the purposes of the army.

1038. Why?—I mean in the application of it.

1039. I confine myself now to the issue of the money?—It is impossible, where they have authority for monies under a particular vote, and they are limited by the total of it, to send an order to the Exchequer for a larger sum than the vote embraces.

1040. To that extent the existing control is sufficient?—If you can call it control; I do not see much control in it.

1041. If 20 millions of money are voted by Parliament, and if such a thing were to happen as that the Treasury were to demand 25,000,000 l. to be issued, the refusal of that issue would surely be a control, would it not?—It is a control upon the first issue; but the real question is, what is the object of the issue; the issue is for the purpose of making payments when the money is placed to account.

1042. You are confounding the questions of issue and appropriation?—I cannot disconnect them.

1043. With regard to appropriation, your statement is this, that 20,000,000 l. being issued to the army under a vote of Parliament, and 20,000,000 l. being issued to the navy under a vote of Parliament, the control of the Exchequer being sufficient to keep them within the Parliamentary limits when these 40,000,000 l. have come into somebody else's hands under this issue he may mal-appropriate the money?—That is a different question, because suppose money is issued for the army, and suppose money is issued for the navy, the Paymaster who pays this money has no discretion himself; he is merely a trustee for the funds placed in his hands for the public service, and for every transfer of funds he must receive the orders of the different departments to which those monies belong; he cannot apply them himself, nor can the Treasury. The Treasury is a department of check on those departments, to take care that they do not get more than Parliament has granted. Then as to money being issued for the army, the Treasury take care that the issues are kept within the limits of the votes of The House. The army departments, under the authority of the Queen, apply that money to army services; the Paymaster could not pay on the order of the Minister for War monies which had been drawn for or belonged to the navy, any more than the navy could order a payment out of the funds which belonged to the army.

1044. One of your former answers to me was that 20,000,000 l. having been voted for the navy, and 20,000,000 l. for the army, though there was a control over the Exchequer, as to issuing each of those sums rightfully under the authority of Parliament, there was no control beyond, nor certainty that those to whom the money went might not apply the money intended for the navy services to the army services?—I referred there more to any control which the Exchequer possessed.

1045. Now I understand you to say, that those several sums of 20,000,000 l. having got into the hands of the Paymaster, that is to say, 20,000,000 l. for the navy and 20,000,000 l. for the army, he cannot apply money that was paid to him for the navy to the army services, or apply the money that was paid to him for the army to naval purposes?—That is so as regards the Paymaster.

1046. Now, will you point out to the Committee in what way it is that the check is deficient?—The check, as regards the different votes of Parliament; the monies being issued in gross, there is no check at the Exchequer to prevent monies within one department being applied to other votes in the same department.

1047. If I understand you rightly, the control is sufficient in the first issue from the Exchequer, as the Paymaster cannot apply the army services to the navy, nor the navy services to the army, but he may authorise in your judgment the respective heads of either the army or the navy, to make the surplus of one supply make up the deficiency in the other?—The Paymaster cannot, but the departments can. It is a very complicated question altogether. The issues from the Exchequer for the year do not represent the monies that are applied to the service of the year. One grant is exhausted before another year is drawn upon, but it may be months before the service of that year is completed. There is a very large portion of expenditure which comes in from abroad, and that may be defrayed when the issues for the preceding year have been all made, and they may come in and be paid out of the votes of the subsequent year, while a portion of the expenditure of the subsequent year may be paid out of the issues made at the termination of the preceding year, and you cannot balance the final account of the appropriations against the cash account of the year.

1048. We have not arrived at that point yet. What I wanted to know was, in what way you considered the check upon the application of the various items in each head of the service deficient?—The check upon the separate votes or the check upon the aggregate?

1049. We have arrived at this: if 20,000,000 l. were voted by Parliament for the navy, the control upon the issue of that money from the Exchequer is sufficient, and it being in the Paymaster's hands, can only be applied to navy purposes. But beyond that, in your opinion, there is nothing to prevent the money so voted being applied to other purposes; what check do you think ought to be applied to prevent that state of things?—The check is applied through the Audit Department after the payment. When once the monies have left the Paymaster, a great portion of them are issued upon what are called imprests, that is, without appropriation, and it rests entirely with the departments to apply those monies fairly; and the control over them which Parliament exercises is, when they present their account of actual expenditure, but there is no check which can be established to prevent their applying money for one service to another, when it is in their hands.

1050. The check now is, when it comes before the Board of Audit, the Treasury warrants are then obtained, sanctioning the departure?—Under the Appropriation Act the Treasury has that power, provided it does not exceed the total of the grants; if the total is exceeded the Treasury requires them to come to Parliament for a vote.

1051. If it is within the gross amount, the Treasury warrant permits the audit to take place?—It permits transfers to take place; but even with that authority, which is given to the Treasury, it is very difficult with regard to foreign expenditure to prevent the application taking place frequently before it comes before the Treasury.

1052. In the case in which the expenditure intended for buildings has been applied to stores, or the money intended for stores has been applied to men, that would be sanctioned, I presume, afterwards by the Treasury when it comes before the Audit Board?—Before the accounts are presented to Parliament.

1053. Taking that course of things first, do you see that it is possible to put any check upon it more than exists at present?—I think it is impossible.

1054. So far as that goes, you are satisfied with the present state of things?—As to the whole of the naval and military departments, I do not think that you can make your check more perfect than it is.

1056. I understood you to say that the Exchequer is no restraint?—I think it is no restraint; excepting upon the point that I stated, that the Exchequer prevents an issue beyond the total amount of the supplies granted, and of the ways and means applicable to them.

1057. There is no doubt that the Commissioners, in paragraph 64, did recommend that there should be a positive restraint on the Crown and on the Ministers as to the legal appropriation of the public money?—They did.

1058. Can you devise such a check?—I have already stated that I think that the best check is a check upon the actual application of the money; you cannot institute a satisfactory check before payment, but you may establish a very satisfactory check at the time of and after payment.

1059. You have stated that the best check is a concurrent audit?—Yes.

1060. Does not the audit find out mistakes after they have happened?—Yes.

1061. Can it prevent mistakes?—An audit of that kind, if it is a question of misapplication, gives a certainty of detection, and I think it acts in the way of prevention.

prevention. I think that that audit which was established in 1832, first for the navy accounts, and which was afterwards extended to the Army departments in 1846, does accomplish it, for the departments will not enter upon a course of misappropriation, and set at defiance the authority of Parliament, when they are certain that it must be brought at the earliest moment under the consideration of Parliament.

1063. A sum of money was legally paid for pensions, 217,000 l. Suppose the Treasury or any other financial authority had authorised the payment, and they had paid half a million, what would have been the check upon that amount being paid?—There was a legal charge upon the revenue to be redeemed; and it would have been positive malversation to pay half a million; that is not a question of misappropriation; I think it goes far beyond that.

1064. I understood you to say that the Royal order was no check; do you say that if a Royal order was obtained for the expenditure of all the public money in one year, that that would be as good a system as taking a Royal order for the various sums as they are wanted?—The Royal order is only a form, and whether it covers 100 votes or one, it is equally valid.

1065. Do you mean to say that the sign manual of the Sovereign is no check upon the minister?—It is the same check, whether it is given in one warrant, or in the form of 100; the signature has the same validity and authority.

1066. But in the case of the 100 warrants, you must have recourse to the Sovereign 100 times?—Yes; but when I said that one Royal order covered a number of services, I did not mean that it authorised the application of the money for those services indiscriminately. On the contrary, the Royal order recites the different votes, and it directs that they shall be separately appropriated; it does not give a sanction to take one for another, to mix up the 100 services together, and consider them as one fund; it is merely a form; it is a covering authority for a number of services included in one document.

1067. Then you think that a Royal order is a form?—So far as regards the Exchequer; it is a necessary and proper legal form, but it is no check in itself, because it merely transfers its authority over the vote of Parliament to the Treasury.

1068. Mr. MacGregor.] Does not the Paymaster now receive each transfer of money made to his credit by the Comptroller of the Exchequer clothed with a trust as to its application?—All the monies are drawn from the Exchequer for the purposes to which they are expected to be applied; but the course is this: we apply to-day for the money that is required to-morrow. The Paymaster forms the best estimate he can of the services expected to come in course of payment to-morrow; but you will see at once that he cannot say what bills will come in from abroad, or what claims will be presented. He knows no more than a private banker would know of the cheques likely to be presented; therefore he forms the best judgment that he can of the claims likely to be presented, and he applies for money accordingly. But when you come to the application of that money, those separate credits are written off into his drawing account, and he draws indiscriminately for any services that come in; he places the issues that are made for special services to the credit of those services in his books, and he can finally expend the credits for those services only. The mere cash that goes into the general till is applicable to all authorised services, always taking care that when he takes cash out of his drawing account he pays for no service that has not a sufficient credit either in his books or in the Exchequer; you must consider the Exchequer and Pay Office balances as one in the application of the money; you must consider that there are two funds, and that a portion of the fund is in the hands of the Paymaster, and another portion of the fund is in the hands of the Exchequer, and it would not do to say that the Paymaster should sacrifice public credit, and should not meet a payment because in his estimate he had made a wrong calculation, and had not drawn out enough money upon every particular account; but if there is money in the Exchequer to meet the payment which is demanded, it is his duty to pay it.

1069. Mr. Cardwell.] You mean that you pay money to the department which has a credit with the Exchequer, although the Comptroller of the Exchequer has not given his sanction to any money passing into your hands?—Precisely; there is no other course that can be adopted. It is a visionary scheme scheme to suppose that the system of Exchequer credits could be carried out as laid down in that Act.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

9 June 1856.

1070. Practically you think that the Comptroller of the Exchequer has no other power than to see that the Government do not expend a larger sum of money than Parliament has voted in supply, furnished by ways and means?—That you do not issue, I will not say expend, but you do not issue from the Exchequer a larger sum for any service than is voted for that service.

1071. Setting aside the question of expending for one year money voted in another, which we have agreed to refer to a subsequent part of the inquiry, you cannot expend on the whole more money than is issued on the whole?—No; the Paymaster is bound by the credits that he has for those different services, and he cannot issue beyond them.

1072. But he does not get the money unless it is issued to him?—His estimates are framed according to the expected wants of each day; there is always money enough on the account to meet any services that come forward, and if there should be a deficiency the account must be supplied anew.

1073. I think you admitted that the Comptroller of the Exchequer does perform the function of confining the expenditure of the Government within the total amount sanctioned by Parliament?—No larger sums can be issued for supply services than the aggregate amount voted; but on the 31st of March last we had upwards of six millions of unissued grants in the Exchequer.

1075. Chairman.] What do you really do at the Pay-office as to those votes; as I understand, you draw to the full amount of the votes sanctioned by Parliament as you like; is that so?—Not as we like; all the demands on the Exchequer are made for services that are authorised.

1076. You have an issue from the Exchequer for the army and navy, and for certain miscellaneous services; what do you do when you have got those Exchequer credits?—At the commencement, when you have those Exchequer credits of each day, the amount which is expected to be paid during the day is written off and transferred from those Exchequer credit accounts into the drawing account of the Paymaster, and as the claims come in, cheques are given for them, payable out of this drawing account, and at the end of the day, those various vouchers are sorted under their respective votes, and carried to the account of those votes, so that at the close of each day you know what you have issued on each.

1077. Do you issue from your drawing account monies for any service for which you have not Exchequer credits?—Certainly.

1078. And beyond the Exchequer credit of that service?—Certainly, you issue for any service that comes in; you must do so.

1079. Supposing there are miscellaneous votes, would you, having a credit only for army, navy, and ordnance, issue from those services if called upon for miscellaneous services?—There is no distinction in the cash at the Bank.

1080. Then you would issue for anything that came in, upon which you knew there was a vote of Parliament?—Precisely; the examiner, before he passed a claim, would satisfy himself that there were funds out of which the payment could be made; whether the money is in the Exchequer or whether the money is in the Pay-office, is of little consequence; provided the vote of Parliament is not exceeded the issue should be made; you cannot refuse to pay bills at sight, and claims admitted.

1081. Did it ever accidentally happen to you to issue in cases where there was no vote of Parliament?—The anticipation of votes of Parliament is a great question, the difficulties of which have not yet been overcome.

1082. I ask you the fact?—It no doubt has happened, and does happen every year when Parliament fails to make provision in due time for the public services.

1083. Is that an advance from civil contingencies merely, or do you issue from your general balance?—Generally speaking, there are always some votes obtained for the army and the navy before the 1st of April, therefore they provide funds to carry on the general service of those departments; but if half-pay and other charges are not voted, you should not stop payment on the 1st of April on those charges.

1804. With regard to the Commission, you have been asked what the opinions of the Commissioners were in recommending the control of the Exchequer; you have no doubt paid attention to the report of that Commission; would you not suppose that their intention was that there should be a strict control, not only upon the issues, but upon the appropriation of the votes?—Yes; I think that is the intention of the report, but hitherto the mode in which they have attempted to carry it out I think has been a failure.

1085. Therefore the present state of the question is not according to the intentions of that Commission?—I think not; there have been other arrangements made since as to the appropriation audit, which may be considered as in some measure coming in aid of the recommendations of that report.

1086. When this Commission made its report, was not it the case that there were a considerable number of separate pay-offices; and did there not exist a Paymaster for the Forces, a Pay-office for the Navy, a Pay-office for the Ordnance, and a civil paymaster, besides several other pay departments?—Yes; payments were made in a variety of offices.

1087. Therefore, at the time when that report was made, the issue to the separate paymasters secured to a great extent the appropriation of the funds to the particular services?—Not more than it does at the present moment.

1088. I did not say to the particular votes of each service, but I said to particular services; for instance, take the navy; the issue to the Treasurer of the Navy was a security that the money was not applied to any other service than that of the navy services?—Yes; but I think that you have the same security under the present system that you had then under separate paymasters. I do not consider that because the Paymaster-general is appointed the banker for all the public departments, any facility has been afforded for misappropriation which did not previously exist. If two persons employ the same banker they have no greater facility of making a transfer from the one to the other than if they employed two bankers; it could be still done; the money might be still issued under the authority of the department to which it belongs, and though it is in one office, the authority for the application still remains separate as before.

1089. Could the Treasurer of the Navy, at the time when he existed, do what you do now?—For all naval votes he could. Where, of course, it is a question of balances the Paymaster-general, if you choose to give him money enough, can keep credits on as many accounts as you please; the real question is the economy of the public money.

1090. You stated that you thought that the Audit Office was the best check upon the expenditure of the public money, and that the control of the Exchequer was comparatively useless?—Yes.

1091. You were speaking, were you not, of the system of audit which exists under Sir James Graham's Bill?—Precisely.

1092. Do you think that that system works by the exposure of anything wrongly done, or by actual power in the Audit Board?—There is no power in the Audit Board, under that system of audit, to prevent excess beyond the votes, if the departments choose to exceed their grants; they have no discretion.

1093. Then the whole effect is produced by the existence of the audit officer there, who ascertains all those transactions or misappropriations if they exist; is not that so?—Yes, they are reported to Parliament in the report of the auditor on the balance sheet.

1094. You have stated that you thought it was impossible at all to make the Comptroller's check effective in the Pay-office?—Yes.

1095. Supposing the same system were introduced in the Pay-office that has been introduced under Sir James Graham's Bill in the navy, army, and ordnance, and supposing the Comptroller of the Exchequer had an officer there who was cognisant of those transactions, would not that at any rate, if anything incorrectly was done, and he was called upon to report to Parliament, be a perfect check by the exposure to which the pay-officer would be subjected?—If every payment made by the Paymaster was a final payment chargeable at once against the grant of Parliament, I could understand that nothing could be easier than such a check, but there are very large sums advanced which cannot be appropriated at the time of issue; take, for example, the Commissariat Chest Fund, and the payments in the last year upon Treasury bills.

9 June 1856.

1096. Mr. Hankey.] Anticipating the demand on the army services, a write off having been obtained from the Exchequer, an intermediate payment being required for the navy services, would you not consider yourselves justified in making such payment out of money which had been written off from the Exchequer for army services?—Certainly.

1097. Would the Exchequer have any control to prevent your doing so?—None.

1098. Mr. Henley.] You have stated in the former part of your evidence that now the gross revenue is payable into the Exchequer?—With certain exceptions, which I named.

1099. With the exception of the hereditary revenue?—Yes, and pensions, and a certain portion of the judicial establishment in Scotland.

1100. Are you aware of the mode in which the Exchequer authorities keep an account of the payments of the officers of Customs, for instance, at the outports?—Yes, the payments for the charges of collection, that is, to the various Customs establishments all over the country, are made out of the revenue collected on the spot, and the vouchers upon which those payments are made are remitted to the head department in London as so much revenue. The form of the remittance is the same as if they bought a banker's bill; those payments are recovered out of the vote of Parliament to which the payments relate, and the amount goes back into the Exchequer as revenue.

1101. That is rather a circuitous mode of effecting the object, is it not?—It appears to me the most direct mode by which it could be effected, because a circuitous mode would be to send the money up and down again. Here is the public money on the spot, and you cannot adopt a more businesslike or safer course than to apply that money at once to the public service; it is not only safety, but it is economy. If you do not apply this money at once on the spot, you must buy a banker's bill at 15 or 20 days, and send it up. But there is another object also: if you kept special balances in the hands of all the receivers of the revenue to meet those local charges, you would very much increase the amount of money kept out of the Exchequer. The payment of those charges out of those monies that come in from day to day renders it unnecessary for those parties to keep any balance at all.

1102. Then, in point of fact, under that system the gross amount of the revenue never does come into the Exchequer?—Yes, it comes into the Exchequer just in the same way as it would come in if you sent the money down for the payment of those charges, because the Receiver-general of each branch of the revenue will draw from the Exchequer the money that he requires for all his charges, and he will pay it back again with the other revenue, and that makes up the gross amount with the deductions.

1103. Assuming that at Liverpool the gross receipt of revenue was 50,000 l. and the collection 5,000 l., that 5,000 l. are deducted and paid at Liverpool, and the 45,000 l. are remitted to the Exchequer?—Precisely so; the vouchers upon which those payments have been made appertain to the vote of Parliament, and the Receiver-general would draw this 5,000 l. from the Exchequer out of the vote of Parliament, and pay it back to make up the 50,000 l. of gross revenue.

1104. It is a repayment subsequently?—It is a repayment that exists to a very great extent for other services independently of the charges of collection; the half-pay of the army and navy, and the pensioners that reside in the country are paid in this way; they have permanent authorities to draw their allowances from the receivers of the revenue, and those receivers pay them out of the revenue, take their receipts, and remit those receipts to London as they would remit bills from bankers. The Receiver-general in London presents those vouchers to the proper department charged with the payment of them, receives the money from them and pays it into the Exchequer. It is an economical mode, not only of effecting the public payments, but of remitting the public revenue, because the earlier you can make the public revenue available for the public service the less interest you lose.

1105. What I want clearly to understand is this: is the actual amount of money paid into the Bank of England to the credit of the Exchequer, or is it never never paid into the credit of the Exchequer, but merely appears as if it were paid in as a matter of account?—It is actually paid in, and the Comptroller-general grants a credit to the Receiver-general of the revenue out of the vote of Parliament for the charges of collection, and the Receiver-general of the revenue transfers to his Revenue account at the Bank the amount advanced out of the revenue all over the country, to replace the revenue stopped in its progress to the Receiver-general.

1106. Mr. Hankey.] Is not this the practical mode in which those accounts are settled; for instance, in the account particularly alluded to by the Honourable Member, if a remittance is to be made of 50,000 l. from the Customs at Liverpool, and 3,000 l., or 4,000 l., or 5,000 l., are to be deducted, are not those receipts or discharges which are taken for the payment of that money remitted up in the same way as if they were cash, so that, practically, the whole sum of 50,000 l. is made up; are they not equivalent to Post-office orders or any other orders?—Precisely.

1107. Chairman.] With regard to the gross revenue, you would never propose, would you, that the whole revenue paid should be paid in, but you would always take out in its way to the Exchequer the drawbacks and repayments?—Yes.

1108. Will you state upon what grounds you put that?—A great part of that is not revenue, it is receipt but not revenue; for instance, they are duties which have been paid, but which have to be repaid to exporters, and there is a large amount of inland revenue, for instance, the income tax, over assessments, or assessments upon charities, which are not receivable. The revenue is received, but it is repaid, and you cannot bring it in as part of the income of the country, for it has been improperly collected; over-entries also in the customs; it is a repayment of revenue which does not belong to the public.

1109. But the drawbacks of the inland revenue are paid after the lapse of a very long time, and I do not quite understand why they should not be brought in?—I think it would be swelling the revenue beyond its proper amount, and also unquestionably increasing the public expenditure, and it might be difficult to estimate charges of that kind.

1110. Have you looked into the question with regard to the Estimates; do they vary much?—They would vary very much. Take the case of malt; this year there will be a very large drawback on the stock on hand.

1111. That would come under the Act of Parliament, would it not?—You would have to put the estimated charge which would have to be defrayed.

1112. I meant this, that the drawback could not be allowed without an Act of Parliament granting the drawback?—That is, under the Act of Parliament under which the duty was imposed.

1113. Mr. Peacocke.] If I understand your evidence, it is this, that although the Exchequer at present does not act at all as a check upon the expenditure of the Government, no larger aggregate sum finds its way into the hands of the Paymaster?—No larger sum can.

1114. As I understand it, you wish to substitute for the control of the Comptroller of the Exchequer a concurrent audit; but clearly, under the plan of a concurrent audit a check would not exist?—The Treasury check would remain. We never come within millions of the point of issuing beyond the gross votes.

1115. Under the system of a concurrent audit you would only expose the thing after it had taken place, and under the plan of a concurrent audit a check would not exist?—A concurrent audit would impose no check on Exchequer issues.

1116. Then you think that it might safely be dispensed with?—Yes, I think so, with the security which the Treasury check provides.

1117. Mr. Williams.] You are aware that the vote of last year for the service of the militia was a much larger amount than the expenditure; what has become of that balance?—That balance I apprehend will, when the account is closed, be surrendered to Parliament; the final state of the balance of that expenditure cannot be known till 12 months after, and I have no reason to suppose that the grants will be exceeded.

1118. Suppose the expenditure of the army required a larger amount than that voted, would this balance be applied for the payment of any portion of the army services?—If there should be excesses under other votes it will be submitted to the Treasury, and the sanction of the Treasury asked to apply the surplus of that grant to make good the deficiency on the others, and that will be done under the provisions of the Appropriation Act.

9 June 1856.

1119. I am now inferring that the Appropriation Act granted this specific fund for the service of the militia, and what I want to know is this; supposing that for any portion of the army service, say the pay of the soldier, the vote was short; would the Treasury, by its warrant, be authorised to appropriate any portion of that unexpended grant to that army service?—Certainly; there is a power contained in the Appropriation Act giving the Treasury authority to apply the surplus of one vote to make good the deficiency upon another within the same department.

1120. Chairman.] You have mentioned amongst the receipts into the Exchequer what you call incidental receipts; will you explain how those receipts are paid into the Exchequer; are they direct, or are they paid into the Pay-office, and through that into the Exchequer?—There are very few of those receipts which are paid in to the Paymaster as cash. I will take the case of the receipts for old stores. Suppose a sale of old stores takes place at Woolwich, and produces 5,000 l.; the storekeeper of that yard is the money-accountant under the Board of Admiralty, and he takes charge of that money, and uses it in the payment of wages, or any other services in his charge. At the end of the quarter he renders his account to the Admiralty, the Admiralty dissect that account, and charge him with the value of old stores that he has received; and they open an account with the Exchequer, crediting the 5,000 l. received for old stores to the account of the Exchequer, in the Admiralty books. They do the same with all the accountants at home and abroad, whose accounts are examined by them; and when the quarterly accounts are completed, the Admiralty give the Paymaster-general an order to pay over to the Exchequer the full amount of those receipts, which had been received by their imprest accountants and applied to naval services. Then the Paymaster-general is obliged to draw that money from the Exchequer in the morning, in order to pay it in again in the afternoon; it is drawn under the Votes for Naval Services, to which the money is applied. That is very much like the case that I explained before.

1121. The revenue is not paid into the Paymaster's hands?—No, he does not touch the money; it is a mere question of account. The imprest accountants of these great departments are the real collectors of the money, and it is used on the spot where it is collected, and it is remitted in the form of vouchers.

1122. It is not paid in cash, but it goes into the pay-account, does it not?—Yes, into the account of the Paymaster; say, for instance, that 50,000 l. has been received in the quarter for the sale of naval stores, and that has been expended for wages and victuals, and other services, the Admiralty will give an order to transfer from those votes to the credit of the Exchequer so much money.

1123. To the credit of the Exchequer, but it goes to the Pay-office?—The Pay-office is the paying department; the Admiralty do not touch the money themselves; the Paymaster-general being their banker, he manages all their pecuniary transactions; they have payments to make to the Exchequer for monies received by their imprest accountants, and they give him an order to make the payment.

1124. They direct their accountant to pay to the Paymaster, do they not?—No; no payment takes place, it is a mere transfer of account.

1125. Why is that?—Because the Admiralty monies are held by the Paymaster, and nobody can draw money from the Exchequer for naval purposes but the Paymaster.

1126. You stated, did you not, that the storekeeper in the dockyard actually handles the money?—Yes, and spends it.

1127. Then it is the Accountant-general of the navy who gives direction that the navy accounts should be paid over?—Yes, that the amounts should be paid over to the Exchequer. The operation is this: the storekeeper at Woolwich having received 5,000 l. of old store monies, to enable him to make his payments on account of voted services, draws 5,000 l. less from the Paymaster-general.

1128. The Accountant-general has no bank account?—None whatever; the only only banker for the naval departments is the Paymaster-general: all their monies are kept there for all services.

1129. He directs you to pay out of all the credits to the Exchequer?—Yes, the money must be drawn from the Exchequer to make the payment.

1130. With regard to the repayment of surplus monies, how are those repaid into the Exchequer, or are they repaid into the Exchequer?—In the last two years, since I have been at the Treasury, we have surrendered to the Exchequer 860,000 l., the surplus of votes not required for the public service; that has been done by transfer in the Exchequer itself.

1131. As to those payments you speak of which are paid by transfer to the Exchequer, are those the great services, the Army, Navy, and Ordnance?—The principal part of those surplus votes happened to be for civil services; Parliament votes the civil services so late that unless we had balances to carry us on for a few months in the next year we should be constantly anticipating the grants of Parliament for those services.

1132. Has either Parliament or the Comptroller of the Exchequer any means of knowing whether you have spent or not the whole sum which has been voted by Parliament upon any civil service vote?—The Comptroller would know what has been drawn out, but he would not know what portion of it remained in the hands of the Paymaster.

1133. Are there any means now of giving to Parliament an opportunity of knowing whether the whole has been expended or not?—No; no Appropriation audit has ever been applied to the miscellaneous votes; it has been a running cash account; at any rate since the passing of the Exchequer Act; from the first establishment of the office of Paymaster of Civil Services, those votes have been a running cash account. No special appropriation for the service of any particular year has ever been taken; that is one of our defects.

1134. You think that that is a defect?—Certainly I do; but it is a very difficult subject, and it requires a great deal of consideration, and I think that Parliament itself must alter its practice before we can alter ours.

1135. You state that you have repaid into the Exchequer 800,000 l. within your recollection; if you had not chosen to repay that, would there have been any check upon you either through the Comptroller or the Audit-office?—None whatever; it rests entirely upon the fidelity of the Treasury.

1136. You must have relied upon the Treasury for those repayments?—Yes.

1137. Questions have been asked with regard to one particular vote, the vote for the Duke of Wellington's funeral; have you got the papers with regard to the Duke of Wellington's funeral with you?—I have not.

1138. What is the practice with regard to the civil contingencies?—The civil contingencies are applied to certain services which are annually submitted to Parliament in the account upon which the annual vote is taken. They are also used, though not finally applied, for services upon which an advance may be required, such as the purchase of a picture, afterwards to be submitted to Parliament, and a vote taken.

1139. With regard to any surplus vote after the expenditure is paid, what becomes of any surplus in the civil contingencies; last year the vote was 100,000 l. and the expenditure was 80,000 l.?—The difference remains in the Exchequer.

1140. Are you quite sure of that?—Yes, quite sure; I see in this return 100,000 l. in the Exchequer unissued on the 31st of March.

1141. Were there of the civil contingencies on the 31st of March 100,000 l. actually unissued from the Exchequer?—Yes.

1142. That you might draw upon for the expenses of the current year?—We might draw upon it to meet any expenses until a new vote was taken; you would exhaust that before you touched the new vote.

1143. But it is ready to be applied if necessary?—Yes; the Treasury have of late years been very economical in the employment of that fund, and they have accumulated 100,000 l.

1144. Can you tell the Committee how much you have lent besides what would come in the course of repayment in this year?—I cannot from memory state. There is an account of that kept at the Treasury; the items are not passed under my review.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

9 June 1856.

1145. They pass before you, do they not?—No, they do not; the control of them is specially with the financial secretary.

1146. Orders for payment are made by the financial secretary?—The orders for the payment of advances extend over a long period.

1147. Are the advances repaid always in the course of the next year, or when?—I believe they are repaid as soon as the vote of Parliament is obtained.

1148. Are there no long outstanding advances?—I should think not. I have not looked into that.

1149. What have you got at the Pay-office besides the 100,000*l.*?—There is nothing at the Pay-office; the Pay-office had rather, if anything, overdrawn that account on the 31st March; there was a small sum I believe of 1,500*l.* at the Bank of Ireland for the Paymaster of Civil Services there.

1150. Mr. Wilson.] You have been obliged to make an issue to the Paymaster to cover certain charges?—Yes; he never likes to draw upon the civil contingencies vote if he can help it; those repayments come in and give him sometimes a larger balance than he likes to keep; he would rather leave it in the Exchequer.

1151. Mr. Hankey.] What do you mean by the account being overdrawn?—Out of his general fund he draws upon an estimate for what he requires, and a payment may come in on the last day of the quarter, which turns the balance.

1152. You do not mean that the account of the Paymaster has been overdrawn at the Bank of England?—No.

1153. Sir H. Willoughby. In the last six years the amount that has been voted for civil contingencies has been at the rate of 100,000*l.* a year?—Yes, I believe so; that has been the annual amount.

1154. Can you state what has been the surplus on each year which has not been applied to the services of the civil contingencies?—I cannot do that from memory; we can make out a statement of that kind.

1155. Are you aware that it amounts to 146,000*l.*?—No. I have not seen any account of it.

1156. Assuming that it amounts to 146,000*l.*, or any other sum, how would it be accounted for?—It would remain in the Exchequer; there was 100,000*l.* remaining in the Exchequer on the 31st of March last.

1157. When you say "remaining in the Exchequer," is there no power of issue over that money?—Yes, the Treasury has full power to order the issue of the whole of it.

1158. When you say it is in the Exchequer, it is not under the control of the Comptroller of the Exchequer?—Yes. No credit upon that vote has been granted to the extent of 100,000*l.*; it all remains at the disposal of the Treasury by warrants upon the Comptroller.

1159. And those warrants the Comptroller would be bound to obey?—Certainly.

1160. There is no discretion in the Comptroller?—None whatever.

1161. For what service could that surplus be applied?—It could be applied, when once issued, to any service; if the Treasury were disposed to abuse their trust it could be applied to any service.

1162. Mr. Wilson.] The same control remains with regard to that which remains as to every other vote of Parliament?—It is precisely in the same position as any vote taken in supply.

1163. And it could be applied and would be applied to any unforeseen contingency that might arise in the year for which Parliament had not provided the monies?—Yes; if it were legitimately employed those would be the objects.

1164. Sir H. Willoughby.] Is there any account rendered to Parliament?—Yes, every year, of all the final charges upon that fund; but there is no account rendered, I believe, of the advances that are made, because they are repayable services.

1165. Therefore Parliament knows nothing about them?—Parliament does not know that an advance has been made for another service out of that fund: for example, if it were for the purchase of a picture, a vote would be required to replace the advance out of civil contingencies.

1166. Mr. Wilson.] Parliament is made acquainted with every payment upon that vote which remains a charge upon it?—Yes; directly through the civil contingencies contingencies account, of every payment made out of the vote, and, indirectly, of all advances out of it, by the votes taken for the services for which those advances are granted.

1167. No final charge whatever could be made upon that account, excepting those which are intimated to Parliament in the account presented along with the Estimates?—If the account were correctly made it could not omit such a charge.

1168. Chairman.] That account omits the advances, does it not?—It omits a temporary advance, but not the final charge upon that account. If that temporary advance should be afterwards converted into a final charge it ought to appear in that account.

1169. Unless the Treasury should remit the repayment?—If the Treasury remit the repayment, it is a final charge.

1170. Mr. Wilson.] There must be a balance either in the Exchequer, or in the Paymaster's account, for every shilling of the civil contingencies, excepting the amounts intimated to Parliament in each year; there must be a balance to be accounted for by one or the other, either as imprest for the time being, or in hand?—Yes, the balance would be the monies remaining in the Exchequer, the portion issued, and not applied, in the hands of the Paymaster, and any debts that might be owing to the account for advances unsettled.

1171. I think the substance of your evidence is, that the functions of the Exchequer are, that the Comptroller of the Exchequer has no power whatever over the receipt of monies before they are brought to the Exchequer; that he has only power over the account in the Bank of England, which stands in his name, for the purpose of preventing any issue to the Paymaster's credit upon account of supply services, for which ways and means have not been provided, and seeing that the whole aggregate amount of the votes is not exceeded in the issues in the course of the year?—Those are the functions of the Comptroller, and that is the full extent to which they can be exercised.

1172. He neither knows anything of the monies before they come into the Exchequer, nor does he know anything of the monies after they pass to the credit of the Paymaster out of the Exchequer?—No; he has no control over the receipt. His duty there resolves itself into a simple matter of bookkeeping, and as regards the issue, he has a control over the aggregate issue; but he has no control over the application of the different parts of the issue.

1173. Then with regard to the Treasury, the functions of the Treasury are these, a central and general check, and not those of expenditure?—The Treasury is to a limited extent, but only to a limited extent, a department authorising expenditure upon some of the miscellaneous votes. It has no control over the application of any portion of the monies voted for Army services; it has no control over the application of any portion of the monies voted for the Navy services, or the Commissariat, or any other military services; but it is the department whose duty, according to its constitution, should be to control those departments through which the expenditure is conducted.

1174. But the whole of the functions of the Treasury are rather those of control than of expenditure?—Clearly; the Treasury has greater power of exercising control than the Exchequer, because it can call upon any department for explanation if it finds that the department is spending a larger proportion of their grants than the Treasury think they ought to have spent in a certain period, and it can call upon them to revise their accounts and their estimates, that they may satisfy the Treasury that they have made a sufficient provision for carrying on the public service for the year. This actually occurred last year, and the whole of those departments were brought before Parliament to demand supplemental estimates. The control of the Exchequer would have come too late; because the Exchequer, when you came to the last issue upon the votes, would say, "We can issue no more for army services or for the navy;" and unless the Treasury had exercised its control in time they must have been in the predicament of not having sufficient monies to carry on those great services.

1175. It is the duty of every department carefully to anticipate, as far as they can, the wants of their own departments for the coming year, and to submit their proposed estimates to the Treasury for sanction, and, upon the sanction of the Treasury being given, to submit them to Parliament, and obtain a Parliamentary grant?—That is the theory.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

9 June 1856.

1176. Parliament having granted certain sums of money to various departments of the State, whether for the army, navy, or even for civil service purposes, imposes upon these departments the responsibility of spending that money, subject to the general control of the Treasury, as laid down by the Appropriation Act and other Acts of Parliament?—Yes; the detailed application of the monies granted for those great services rests entirely with those departments. The control of the Treasury does not interfere with the making of contracts or the incurring of expenditure in any shape; all that belongs to the executive departments; but if the Treasury thought that the departments were spending (and they could only know it through the issues), more than they thought ought to be spent in a given period, the Treasury might call for explanation.

1177. The control of the Treasury is limited to those objects which are stated in the Appropriation Act, with regard to the transferring from one particular service to another, the excesses of one vote to the necessities of another, and other minute services which are referred to in the Act of Parliament?—Precisely.

1178. The whole of the responsibility of the expenditure of the vote in detail rests with the department itself?—Yes, entirely with those departments.

1179. Mr. Hankey.] Is every estimate necessarily submitted to the Treasury before it is brought to Parliament?—It is done; I cannot say that they are minutely investigated, but those large estimates are principally settled in the Cabinet. The force is agreed upon, and that regulates in a great measure all the rest of those great services. An estimate cannot be submitted to the House until it has received the sanction of the Treasury.

1180. Mr. Wilson.] It is absolutely necessary that the whole of those estimates should be before the Treasury in order that the Chancellor of the Exchequer may make his financial arrangements for the year, is it not?—It is necessary that he should know what is to be voted before he can calculate his ways and means.

1181. Then it rests upon the responsibility of the Treasury to furnish ways and means from time to time, and to see that they have the means of meeting the demands which Parliament has granted for all those services?—The Treasury calculate their ways and means upon the amount of those estimates, and if those departments exceed them of course they disturb the whole of the financial arrangements of the Treasury; it is exceedingly inconvenient to the Government, and it is therefore necessary that the Treasury should exercise a control over those departments, because their own proceedings are very much dependent upon the due observance of the regulations laid down at the commencement of the Session.

1182. But the Treasury is charged with the responsibility of seeing that there are funds at the Bank of England throughout the year for the purpose of meeting the expenditure of the various departments?—Undoubtedly; they are bound to look to the public credit.

1183. The great financial duty of the Treasury is to see that the finances of the country are so managed, that from time to time through the year there are funds to meet the demands of the public service?—That is one of the first duties of the Treasury.

1184. Then it becomes necessarily, does it not, the duty and the direct interest of the Treasury to keep the sharpest look out upon all the departments, to see that there is no excess which could disturb those calculations?—Precisely.

1185. If any department were drawing upon the votes of Parliament more rapidly than the Treasury thought was consistent with prudence, would not it be the duty of the Treasury to require them to make some arrangements, which would either obtain an extended Parliamentary authority, which would then impose upon the Treasury the duty of providing extended ways and means or restricting them within the votes already taken?—It is absolutely necessary that the Treasury should perform that duty, because if the department has exhausted all the monies placed at its disposal by Parliament, the Treasury is called upon to sanction the misappropriation, and the department only shifts that difficulty from its own shoulders to those of the Treasury; therefore the Treasury is most interested in all the departments keeping strictly within the limits of their grants.

1186. Does

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

9 June 1856.

1186. Does not the same description of control extend over the departments for the receipt of revenue. The Treasury can make their calculations at the commencement of the year upon certain sums being received under various heads of revenue, and it is for them to keep a close daily or weekly watch as to whether those sums are realised, and if not realised, to require some explanation, and to make provision otherwise, if necessary?—It is necessary that the Treasury should look to that matter also, because any deficiency that arises in those receipts becomes a deficiency for meeting the public charges of the year. A case actually occurred this last year, when the Treasury were obliged to go to Parliament for additional ways and means to meet those charges which Parliament had sanctioned.

1187. Then the general nature of the duties of the Treasury extending over the whole of the financial area of income and expenditure, places the Treasury in a much better situation than any other department can be of control over the whole?—I think that the Treasury is a department of control; the responsibility for every variation ultimately rests with them.

1188. The Treasury have nothing to do with the receipts of money, but they control the receipts?—Just so.

1189. They have no power whatever over the application of those monies before they go into the Exchequer?—None.

1190. The general receivers are accountable, and their duty is to pay the money direct to the Exchequer account, is it not?—They pay under fixed regulations the amount of their receipts daily.

1191. And they have nothing to do except to a very limited extent with the great public expenditure; with that they have nothing to do, except generally controlling it in the way you have described?—They have no power of incurring expenditure in any of those great departments.

1192. Therefore the interest of the Treasury would be on the one hand to see that all those who collect the revenue do their duty and have no means of misdirecting it, and on the other hand the interest of the Treasury is to see that those who have the expenditure of the money keep within the votes of Parliament, and the anticipated extent of that expenditure?—Precisely. Any variation either from the amount of the revenue submitted to Parliament in the Budget, or any excess upon the expenditure, ultimately embarrasses the Treasury, and therefore they are most interested in exercising an efficient control over the departments that are charged with the detail duties in both the branches.

1193. The Treasury receive weekly, do they not, a return from the various heads of receipt, and also they have furnished to them weekly from the Paymaster the whole of the expenditure, so that they are enabled, from week to week, to check and control the one and the other?—They have it daily on both sides. First, the daily return of the revenue paid in, and the issues are made daily; but the account is made up weekly for the Chancellor of the Exchequer and other members of the Government, both of income and expenditure.

1194. Therefore, generally it may be said that the Treasury is a department entirely of control, and not a department either of receipt of revenue or expenditure of revenue?—That is the view that I take of the position of the Treasury.

1195. Mr. Hankey.] Parliament having voted sums of money, is there any other means of obtaining such money than through a Committee of Ways and Means?—Parliament having voted certain sums in Committee of Supply, and the ways and means having been also granted by Parliament, the issue takes place as a matter of course upon those authorities.

1196. I meant that this money having been voted, there is no means of getting it except through a Committee of Ways and Means?—Precisely; the vote would not be sufficient to apply this money without a grant of ways and means.

1197. The Committee of Ways and Means can only act through the instrumentality of the Treasury, and at the instigation of the Treasury?—The Treasury move all votes of ways and means.

1198. There is no other public department which knows anything about the Committee of Ways and Means but the Treasury?—No, it is the special duty of the finance department of the Government.

THE RIGHT HON. SIR FRANCIS T. BARING, IN THE CHAIR.

William George Anderson, Esq., called in; and further Examined.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

12 June 1856.

1199. Mr. Wilson.] WILL you state to the Committee what the condition of the paymasters was at the time of the Report of 1831, and previously to that Report?—The public payments were then conducted in a great number of offices. There was the Paymaster of the Forces for the army and for the extraordinaries of the army, the Treasurer of Chelsea Hospital, the Agent for the out-pensioners, the Treasurer of the Navy, the Treasurer of the Ordnance, a Vice-Treasurer in Ireland, a Deputy Treasurer of the Ordnance in Ireland, and two Paymasters of Exchequer Bills. In 1834 a Paymaster of Civil Services was established, who took over a number of payments which had been previously made at the Exchequer. Besides this there were money accountants in all the departments; the chief clerk in each department was made an accountant, and drew the amount of the salaries and contingent expenses of his department in gross, and applied it.

1200. What do you conceive were the effects of those multiplied pay offices upon the balances of the public money?—The balances were so scattered that there was then little control, compared with what we have now over the amount of those balances; there was a large accumulation in the aggregate; the more you subdivide your accounts, the larger is the amount of unemployed monies.

1201. There was necessarily a large sum out of the Exchequer which might otherwise, under a better system, have been in the Exchequer?—Precisely; which might have been available for reducing deficiency bills. There was also increased risk, not only arising from the amount of the balances, but from the scattered state of them; and there was also a great division of responsibility. Those pay departments were not directly under the control of the Finance Department. The office of the Treasurer of the Navy was under the control of the Admiralty, and the Treasurer of the Ordnance was under the control of the Board of Ordnance; each of those scattered paymasters was under a separate control, and therefore there was increased risk. And if we look back to the accounts, we find increased frauds arising from that circumstance; therefore the control of the Treasury was necessarily weak over the application of the public money. There was a great want of uniformity in the mode of conducting the public payments. The same service was very differently dealt with in different departments, so that the public, who came in contact with those different departments, had a routine to learn for every office, besides the inconvenience of having to go to the extremities of London to collect their claims; all those were inconveniences which affected bankers, agents, and others, who had claims to settle with the public.

1202. From the Report of the Commissioners of 1831, are you led to believe that there was an intention on the part of that Commission to issue a second report, recommending the consolidation of those paymasters?—The concluding paragraph of the Report of the Commissioners in 1831 distinctly refers to that; and I believe, from conversations which I had with Sir Henry Parnell, when he

he was Paymaster-general, that such was to be the object of the second report.

1203. Was that report ever made?—Never; so far as I am aware.

1204. Did Sir Henry Parnell carry out that, when he came into office?—He was the prime mover in the consolidation which took place in 1836. He had previously been appointed to control the three offices of Paymaster of the Forces, Treasurer of the Navy, and Treasurer of the Ordnance; when he assumed those duties he proposed to the Treasury to consolidate the three departments into one.

1205. Did not a very large consolidation take place in 1836?—Yes; the principal consolidation took place then.

1206. The principle has been acted upon still further since that time, has it not?—It has been going on from that time to this continually; if the Treasury find a separate Paymaster whose duties can be consolidated with those of the Paymaster-general, they abolish that office.

1207. All with the view of consolidating the duties and responsibility into one office?—With the view of concentrating in one office the control over the public money, and to improve the mode of doing the business; a large office can throw off a good deal of additional business without requiring an addition to its establishment.

1208. The consolidation has been carried out with the view of making the control more general and certain, and giving security to the public money, as well as economising the public balances?—Yes.

1209. Can you state what reduction of public balances took place by those consolidations?—The monies were so scattered then, that it is very difficult to say what the saving in the balances has been, but it has been very large; I should say that any one of those large offices kept a much larger balance than the aggregate balance which is kept at the present time by the Paymaster for the whole of the public service.

1210. From your experience as set against those great advantages which you have described, have there been any disadvantages in that consolidation, so far as you have discovered?—No disadvantages that I am aware of. I consider that all that the separate offices accomplished is now more satisfactorily done by the consolidated office; but there are other advantages. In the first place, there has been very great economy, and I should say that since the establishment of the Pay Office in 1836, the public has saved nearly half a million in salaries alone, in the aggregate; and it is probably going on still at the rate of 40,000 l. a year. In addition to that, there has been a great saving in the expenses of maintaining so many separate pay offices; they had contingent accounts which one consolidated office very much reduces. There is also, I consider, great additional security to the public money; great additional facilities are afforded to the public for conducting their business, and improved modes of transacting it have been established.

1211. On the subject of the facilities afforded to the public in former times, when there were so many paymasters, bankers sent to receive public monies had to go to a number of different places, had they not, in different parts of London?—Yes; they had to leave their bills for acceptance, and call again, perhaps once, twice, or three times for them; but by having them all left at one office, they are delivered out under one set of regulations, and the business is more regularly conducted altogether.

1212. Can you give the Committee any instance; you referred to one, I think, in which there was a great saving of labour by bringing a single office into the Pay Office?—I referred probably to the Exchequer Bill Pay Office. When that office was a distinct office, it employed two paymasters, and altogether, I believe, nine persons; that was probably for about a fortnight's heavy work during the year; by annexing that business to a large office, that could for a fortnight spare a few hands, and postpone other business, we were able to reduce the whole of that establishment; and when the business was transferred to the Pay Office in 1848, I could not find fair average employment for one clerk.

1213. What you could barely find business for one clerk to do, employed nine persons, some of them at high salaries, in a separate department?—Yes; the same thing occurred as to the civil services; there were, I believe, 13 persons there, several highly paid, and when that business was transferred to the Pay Office, a third of that number enabled me to carry it on satisfactorily.

1214. With regard to consolidating the Paymaster, I will call your attention to a passage in Lord Monteagle's memorandum, at page 91; he says, "These motives press on me more strongly at the present moment, when it appears by the proceedings in the House of Commons, that the functions of the Exchequer are proposed to be augmented. It would indeed be inconsistent that Parliament should be induced to entrust the Exchequer with additional functions, and as a check and security against undue issue and appropriation, whilst at the very same time a system is practised, and is daily extending, which goes far to render such Exchequer control nugatory and unavailing. Should the country be plunged into war, the risks and difficulties which I anticipate will be greatly increased. The difficulties of administering the expenditure during an European war will have to be encountered, for the first time in our modern history, through the instrumentality of one single Pay department in place of five. In the late war there were separate offices for paying the Army, the Navy, Army Ordnance, Chelsea, and the Civil Service, besides votes placed in the hands of the Treasury, for Army Extraordinaries and Civil Contingencies. At present all is carried on at one single Pay Office, and unless the issues for each department are accurately made and kept distinct from each other, as required by law, unless care be taken to prevent any possible misappropriation of the funds provided by Parliament from the special services for which they were granted, and unless the public accounts of the Treasury, the Pay Office, and the Bank of England are so kept as to check each other, and correspond with the legal authorities given, and with the Exchequer records, I anticipate with indescribable alarm the consequences to the public service which must ensue." Since that time we have had a European war; has any difficulty arisen from the consolidation of those pay offices into one during that war?—There is no doubt that the war has put to a very severe test all our regulations, not only for conducting the public business, but for keeping the accounts during the last two years; but it would be difficult to over-estimate the assistance which the Treasury has derived, and the benefit which the public has also derived, from the consolidation of the pay offices during this war. During former wars, when all those offices were scattered, the Treasury not only had very little control over the balances, but they could get very little information from the scattered offices as to the prospective wants of the public service. In this war, we have had to deal with a difficulty which did not exist in former wars. During the war which ended in 1815, it was the practice, even down to the latest date, to pay for all supplies, for transports and other services, by bills at 90 or 60 days, and you got then some notice of what you had to pay. During the last war we have not had the advantage of this, and claims have poured in upon us at sight; therefore we have had a difficulty to deal with in regulating our balances, which in former times they had not. But this only shows that the consolidation of the pay offices has been productive of greater benefit than would at first appear. We have had very small balances compared with the large demands that have been made upon us, and the facility of supplying an account at a short notice, arising from the intimate connexion which exists between the General Pay Office and the Treasury, is much greater than it would have been if separate offices, scattered in different places and under a divided control, had continued to exist.

1215. With regard to the great expenditure of the late war, have you been enabled to conduct the finances without any material departure from the system which was pursued during a time of profound peace?—There has not been the slightest variation in the regulations. The system was originally established to meet a great pressure without disturbing the existing regulations; I am not aware of any single regulation that has been altered in consequence of the greatly increased pressure of business arising from the war.

1216. Would it have been possible to have conducted the late war, supposing the same amount of funds had been placed at the disposal of the Government, under the old system?—It would have been totally impossible.

1217. We must have had recourse either to greatly increased taxation or greatly increased loans, to provide larger means at the time if the old system had been in operation?—At first you must have provided a larger sum, in order to provide a greater reserve of balances.

1218. The whole war has been conducted upon the principle of paying for everything everything at the time?—Yes, the principle of prompt payment has been in operation.

1219. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] You do not mean that the expenditure would have been greater, but that it would have been necessary to keep greater balances to meet the current expenditure?—Yes, at first it would have been necessary to provide larger sums, so as to keep larger balances. When once the balances had been brought up to the amount required to carry on the war, the subsequent issues would not continue greater than under other circumstances.

1220. Mr. Bowyer.] You mean that the aggregate of the balances with the different paymasters would have made a larger sum?—Yes.

1221. Mr. Wilson.] One of the great advantages you see from the consolidation of the paymasters is, that one single set of responsible officers having their eyes directed to, and their control extended over, the whole of the public service, are enabled to perform all their functions, not only much more accurately, but with a much smaller command of money for the purposes of the public service?—Yes, precisely. There is another circumstance which I should also mention, namely, that when the offices were separate, every transfer between those offices was necessarily made in money, and that shows how much larger the balances in each department must have been; during the last year, I believe the transfers between the services have amounted to something like 15,000,000 l. Now, if this had all to be made through the public accounts at the Bank from the cash of each department, a very much larger sum would have been necessary than is required under the present system. At present the Pay Office is a clearing house for all the departments whose monies are deposited there; it has all the same effects in saving the transfer of cash.

1222. Under the present system the Pay Office is the common banker to the whole of the public departments?—There are only a few minor departments whose payments are not made there.

1223. And one public department requiring to make a payment to another has only to desire the common banker of the whole to transfer from the account of that office to the account of the other?—Precisely.

1224. Whereas the old system was like each department keeping its own banker, and if a transfer was made from one department to another, the money must have been taken out of one bank and placed in the other?—Yes.

1225. Can you give any very striking example of the effect of this general control; for instance, the recovery of that large sum of money now known as the Commissariat Chest Fund; do you think that it would have been recovered under the old system?—I think if the offices had remained separate we should never have had the Commissariat Chest Account at all; it was by bringing the offices together that this account was ultimately prepared. When the army extraordinaries were under the control of the Paymaster of the Forces they were mixed up with the army balances, and no distinction was kept; therefore it was difficult to ascertain when a large amount of arrears occurred in the collection of the claims upon the other departments. When the Pay Office was established, and it became necessary to keep accurate and separate balances belonging to each of the departments, the army extraordinaries, or what we now call the Commissariat Chest Fund, was raised as a distinct service; and when it was found that the balance against that service was growing to an undue amount, steps were taken immediately by the Paymaster, either by communicating with the Audit Board, or with the different departments, to hasten the settlement of the accounts to enable the Paymaster to reduce that balance. When I was appointed to the Pay Office in 1838, or shortly afterwards, I think the balance against that account, from 1836, had already risen to about 2,000,000*l.* I was very much alarmed lest there might be a considerable misappropriation concealed under it. I recollect the Right honourable Chairman was then at the Treasury, that he took active measures to remove from that fund to the votes a number of final charges which were upon it; the removal of these expenses from the fund became necessary in consequence of the cessation of the vote which had been formerly taken to meet those charges. It was that circumstance and the large debt which appeared against that account which led to the necessity of establishing a separate account and balance-sheet for that fund.

1226. Did that lead you to investigate the state of the accounts, and if so, what what was the final result of that investigation?—The balance was then about 2,000,000 l. against the account in the Pay Office books; but a few years afterwards, when the Commissariat Chest account was prepared, instead of being in debt, it was found to have a surplus of assets that amounted to nearly 1,300,000 l., and the difference between the two was of course the amount of loans which, for the service abroad, other departments had obtained out of the army funds, and which had not been repaid.

12 June 1856.

1227. Instead of a balance standing against the Account of 2,000,000 l., there was a balance in its favour of 1,300,000 l.; that sum constitutes now the Commissariat Chest Fund, instead of a banking fund, by which commissariat transactions all over the world are carried on?—Yes; and in times of peace it generally furnishes a sufficient balance in the Pay Office, independently of the large balances which must be kept at each station to meet the claims upon that fund.

1228. You are of opinion that that never could have been done had there been the same number of paymasters continued that there were before that consolidation took place?—I think not.

1229. Will you describe to the Committee the four accounts which are kept in the Bank of England on behalf of the Government, and the nature of each of them?—There are four accounts kept upon which the Pay Office operates for carrying on its pecuniary transactions. The first is called the Exchequer Credit Account; it is a credit given upon the account of the Comptroller-general of the Exchequer; it is one of the supply accounts from which the working accounts are fed. There is also a Cash Account to which all other sums which do not pass through the Exchequer are paid on account of the Paymaster-general. Those two accounts can only be operated upon by writes-off; whatever amount may be upon them, the balances are considered to be in security, and the Assistant Paymaster-general is the person who has the power of writing-off from them, in order to feed the two working accounts, upon which other parties have a power, by deputation from the Paymaster-general, of drawing. Those two working accounts are the drawing account from which all the cheques are paid; these are drawn by an officer in the department, who acts as paymaster. The Bill Account is a drawing account out of which all bills of exchange are paid; these bills are accepted payable upon that account, some by the Paymaster-general, and some by the Admiralty and other departments. The Drawing Account is fed from day to day, even from hour to hour, with the sums which are actually required to meet the drafts of the Paymaster; but the Paymaster has nothing to do with the supply of that account; he never knows the balance that is upon it; he has nothing to do but to go on paying, not knowing whether there are funds on that account or not. That is the duty of the controlling officer of the department, the Assistant Paymaster-general; and the way in which he acts is this:—the Paymaster is required to send to him every hour-and-a-half the vouchers which he has paid during that time, with a statement of the amount; and if the amount of those vouchers is found to be running close upon the balance, he gives a further write-off from the Exchequer Credit Account, or Cash Account, and so on throughout the day. The Bill Account is fed from the same accounts, but as the amount of bills due each day is known beforehand, the Assistant Paymaster-general only places in that account the exact sum required to meet them.

1230. Under what written authorities are the writes-off made?—The Paymaster-general, on coming into the office, grants a deputation to two persons to write-off from these supply accounts to the drawing and bill accounts, and he gives separate deputations to other officers to operate upon these two working accounts.

1231. It is not the same persons who write-off to feed the drawing accounts who operate on the drawing account?—They are distinct persons, and they act as a perfect check upon each other; the Paymaster does not know what funds there are on the account; if he drew a large sum improperly, he would run a risk of overdrawing the account.

1232. The officer who draws the check upon the drawing account does not know whether there is cash or not?—No.

1233. The officer who supplies the drawing account has nothing to do with drawing upon it?—No; there are also other checks; the vouchers upon which payments payments are made are passed by a distinct set of officers called "examiners," who have nothing to do either with the supply or with the payment; their duty is to examine the vouchers, to certify that the claims are to be paid, and to send them on to the Paymaster. Those vouchers, after they have been paid, are sent up to the Assistant Paymaster-general; they are sorted into their different divisions, and under the various votes; they are then recorded by the book-keepers, a distinct set of officers again; after the whole of the accounts of the day have been balanced, those vouchers are recorded, and the cash books in which they are entered are taken the next morning to the examiners, by whom the claims were passed, and they are compared with their books to see that no voucher has been altered in its progress, or that no omission has taken place either in recording the authority for the payment when it was issued or in the record of it after payment.

1234. So that, in point of fact, if an erroneous payment were made either in amount, or an unauthorised payment at all, it must be discovered at the latest the following morning?—If an unauthorised payment were made, it would certainly be detected on the following morning.

1235. You have stated that there are four accounts in the Bank of England belonging to the Pay Office; that is, the Exchequer Credit Account, the Cash Account, the Drawing Account, and the Bill Account; that is two accounts of credits, and two accounts for being operated upon?—Yes.

1236. The Exchequer Credit Account is a credit upon the Exchequer Account itself?—Precisely.

1237. Will you inform the Committee how that account is fed, or in what form the issues are made; in what sums, and whether from day to day?—The accounts are fed by daily issues, or rather by daily credits given by the Exchequer. The form in which this is done is this: the Paymaster, the day before, prepares an estimate of the sums that he is likely to require on the following day; he sends this estimate to the Treasury, and the Treasury upon that gives authority to the Exchequer to grant credit to the full amount of this estimate under various heads of service. Supposing, by way of illustration, that the following credits have been given, viz., 50,000 l. for the army, 50,000 for the navy, and 50,000 l. upon various civil votes; the writes-off are made from those Exchequer Credits to the Drawing Account from which the payments are made, and at the close of the day those payments are sorted under their respective votes, and the amount charged against those votes. It will happen, of course, that an estimate, with whatever care it may be framed, could not contemplate every payment that was likely to be presented, and the payments at the close of the day will vary with the Exchequer credits drawn; so that instead of 50,000*l.* for the army, 50,000*l.* for the navy, and 50,000 l. for civil service, we may have 40,000 l. for the army, 60,000 l. for the navy, and 40,000 l. for civil service; so that there would remain 10,000 l. in credit for the army; the navy will have overdrawn its account 10,000 l., and there will remain 10,000 l. under the Civil Service Votes. On the following day when the next credit is asked for, a sufficient sum will be asked for for the Navy, not only to meet the estimated payments of that day, but to cover the amount overdrawn upon the credit of the previous day, and this goes on from day to day. Suppose on one of those days the large sum of 150,000*l.* has been paid to the cash account by the East India Company for some service performed by the War Department on account of the Company, this gives 150,000*l.* to the army, and we should not think, with that money in the cash account, of asking for Exchequer credits; and therefore the Paymaster would use that 150,000 l., and write it off into his drawing account, and make use of it for all the payments that might come in on that day. It would follow on the next day that there would be various services overdrawn, having drawn no credits, and having made those payments out of the cash account, there would be a difference against those services, and on the subsequent days you would adjust that by drawing credits upon the services which had been overdrawn.

1238. An estimate is made one day, and any variation from the estimate in the payments of the following day are as early as possible adjusted consistently with keeping the smallest amount of credits to the Paymaster's account?—Precisely; always taking care that you do not pay for any service beyond the amount that is in the Exchequer at the credit of that service and available to repay the advance.

1239. What the Paymaster has to do is, to see that he does not ask for a credit for any service beyond the remainder of the vote unissued in the Exchequer?—Precisely.

1240. You have stated with regard to those issues made from day to day, that if they are overpaid you make it up in the issue of the following day?—Yes.

1241. With regard to those issues which are not all exhausted as anticipated, they remain to the credit of the Exchequer account for the next service upon any vote that is required?—Yes; there are two sets of accounts opened in the Paymaster's books; one is opened with each vote, representing the credits which Parliament has assigned to the service, the other is an account opened for that vote representing the Exchequer credit which has been granted; and the payments of each day must necessarily be charged against both, for it is necessary to know not only what the remainder of the vote is, but also the remainder of the Exchequer credits.

1242. The one account shows the amount in the hands of the Paymaster available for the service upon the Exchequer credit, and the other account shows the amount available under the Parliamentary vote unissued?—Yes; the two representing the aggregate sum upon which he has power to draw.

1243. And with a view to the strictest economy, those issues remain from day to day at the smallest amount consistent with the payments which the Paymaster expects to have to make?—Yes, that he expects to pay during the day, always taking a margin for unforeseen payments.

1244. Then his Exchequer credit account is merely a power to a limited extent to draw upon the Exchequer account in the Bank of England, and if funds are taken out of that account and placed at his disposal to a separate account, it remains in one fund?—They are merely credits upon the Comptroller's account; but as those credits are only asked for daily to the amount which is actually required, a transfer takes place as a matter of course each day, and it becomes an actual transfer.

1245. And by that means the Exchequer account in the Bank of England is left as large as possible?—It leaves a very large amount of money in the Exchequer, which under any other system it would be necessary to draw out and place at the disposal of the Paymaster.

1246. Therefore that effects great economy in the general balance?—Yes, and also, I consider, gives security for the public balances.

1247. The other account is a cash account; will you explain to the Committee how the cash account is constituted?—The sums which passed into the cash account last year were unusually large, amounting to 5,750,000 l. From that I might deduct a transfer from Ireland, 1,100,000 l.; 1,830,000 l. remittance of Turkish Loan, and Exchequer Bills which had been paid in money and were re-issued for supply services, 500,000 l.; that would leave about 2,300,000 l. for ordinary receipts; belonging to the army, 207,000 l.; belonging to the Navy, about 300,000 l.; 60,000 l. to Naval Prize; 236,000 l. to the Ordnance; about 250,000 l. to the Commissariat Chest; and various civil services, miscellaneous deposit accounts, and so forth, amounting to about 1,300,000 l. Of this sum at least 2,000,000 l. belong to the votes and other expenditure accounts in the Paymaster's books, that is, they are credits which come in aid of the votes as repayments, not sums in addition to the sums voted; they have been advanced from the votes, and are repaid. The remaining 300,000 l. is made up of sums which pass ultimately into the Exchequer, for which the Paymaster acts as a collector. In addition to those sums through the cash account, the transfers between the services, which are also cash transactions, but on both sides of the account, amounted to 15,500,000 l., of which, 8,500,000 l. was to the Commissariat Chest in repayment of advances made for services abroad; there were also Exchequer Bills and Bonds amounting to about 7,000,000 l. passed to the Paymaster for sale, and placed to his account at the Bank, and transferred to the Exchequer. In addition to that, there is the Patriotic Fund. The services to which those monies belong are, first, as regards the army, remittances through the East India Company for regiments in India; soldiers remit large sums through the East India Company, and they are paid into the hands of the Paymaster for distribution. There are various regimental funds, stamps on officers' commissions, Indian prize-money, balances repaid by regimental agents, paymasters, and other accountants who have had more money advanced to them than the service required, and which balances are repaid; various repayments from the navy, the army, the East India Company, the Mercantile Marine Fund, and the Patriotic Fund, for pensions paid by the War Office on their account. Staff officers who are stationed all over the country, afford a very convenient machinery for paying pensioners of every description, and they are employed by the navy and other departments, and by the East India Company, to make those payments; they are first made out of army funds, and reimbursement is made at a subsequent date; when those monies come back, they cannot go into the Exchequer, they must therefore pass through the cash account. The Navy make large supplies to other departments of the Government, to the various colonies, to the East India Company, to foreign ships and to merchant ships; in the last year they have also purchased steam-vessels and coals, and have made other supplies on account of the Turkish Government, the repayment of which also comes into the cash account of the Navy; they also pay all the claims on account of the works at Holyhead Harbour, and harbours of refuge, provided for in the Miscellaneous Votes. They also fit up all convict ships at the dock yards, the expense of which is met by issues out of the naval stores and naval labour, but being provided for by another department in the Miscellaneous Estimates, the monies must be repaid by transfers or through the cash account. The navy also supply provisions to the garrisons abroad out of their stores, and they are repaid out of the army votes the amount of those supplies, which come into the cash transfers when that repayment takes place. In the last year, I believe they sent in that way supplies of the value of upwards of a million of money to the seat of war, all of which came back through the cash transfers. When troops are embarked, they are fed out of navy provisions, and the value of the rations is recovered from the War Department from the pay of the troops; that also passes through the cash transfers; there are also various supplies between the Navy and the Ordnance. The Ordnance Department supply clothing, barrack bedding, saddlery, harness and ammunition to the constabulary force, the value of which is repaid out of the constabulary vote. They supply all the clothing for the revenue police; and they make various supplies to the Navy, to the Convict Department, and to other departments of the Government, to the colonies, to the East India Company, and even to Foreign Governments; they make various supplies to other departments, which are repaid, and are passed into the cash account at the Bank. The cash account also includes the interest on various stocks, the County Courts Fund, and a variety of others.

1248. Is not this a proper description of all the monies that pass into the cash account, that none of them are original issues for services voted by Parliament, but that they are the repayments of monies from one department to another, which had been advanced to that department from the issue which had been made on account of the votes from the Exchequer?—Those are the principal items of the cash account, including transfers.

1249. There is an arrangement, is there not, whereby the Army Department at home recruit for a portion of the Queen's service serving in India. That recruiting is done by the military authorities at home, and the expense is paid out of the army vote. It then becomes necessary that the East India Company should repay to the home Government the cost of that recruiting, and that repayment goes into the cash account as a credit for the army expenditure, does it not?—It goes to replace to the army the funds which they have taken out of their votes for services chargeable to the East India Company.

1250. Supposing the army has an issue of 150,000*l.* from their vote from the Exchequer, and that that 150,000*l.* is spent by the army authorities at home on behalf of the East India Company, and the East India Company repay that 150,000*l.*, it, of course, belongs to the Army Department to expend for their own purposes as part of the vote that they have already received out of the Exchequer?—Precisely.

1251. And that 150,000*l.* received into the cash account would be put into the Paymaster's books to the credit of the Army Department?—Yes.

1252. And the Army Department would then have that 150,000*l.* available for their own legitimate expenditure, as contemplated in their vote which they took from Parliament?—Precisely. Those advances for recruiting are made under an Act of Parliament, which directs that those expenses shall be paid first out out of the army grants, and recovered afterwards; the Act is the 33d of George the Third, chapter 52.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

1253. You have alluded to large payments advanced to the naval department in the shape of stores to the army in the Crimea; am I correct in understanding you to mean that the Navy Department having purchased stores with the monies which had been issued from the Exchequer upon their annual vote, those stores were supplied for the use of the army in the Crimea out of their own stores?—The stores are sent from the storehouses of the navy; the provisions have been first purchased for the navy, they are required for the army, an issue is made from the stores, and the navy have then to purchase others to replace them.

1254. Then the Army Department having received their stores from the Navy Department, instead of making an original purchase with their own money, owe that money to the Navy Department?—Precisely. The navy make out a claim, just as a contractor would do, and send it to the War Department, and it is paid, and comes as a transfer in the books through the cash account.

1255. The navy make out the claim upon the Army Department, and the Army Department make the payment to the cash account out of their vote, which has been issued from the Exchequer to the Naval Department in repayment for those stores?—Yes, the payment is made by a transfer between the cash accounts of the two services.

1256. It is precisely the same as if the navy in the first instance had not purchased those stores, but had kept their money, and as if the army had purchased those stores with money which had been issued from the Exchequer for army purposes?—Precisely; but there is an object in this, that the navy having a contract for provisions, it is more economical to manage the service through them than if the army made a distinct contract. The same thing is done to a very great extent in the Ordnance Department. They contract for a variety of supplies; it is a sort of manufacturing department that supplies many other branches of the public service.

1257. In the course of last year the home Government were requested by the Turkish Government to purchase ships and coals for their use, and the department of the navy were desired by Government to purchase those ships and coals for the Turkish Government, and they did so, in the first instance out of the naval votes issued from the Exchequer for the use of the navy?—No; with regard to a foreign government, that is a different case; as to the Turkish Government, before the navy would undertake to make those purchases they required that the Turkish Government should deposit in the cash account of the Paymaster the estimated amount of those purchases, so that in this case they had the money first.

1258. The difference being only in this case with regard to the time of payment; the payment was made beforehand and not afterwards, but the funds which the Admiralty use may be the funds which belong to themselves, derived from the navy vote?—Yes.

1259. And which is placed in the Paymaster's hands as belonging to the naval services, and the payment of cash into the cash account which the Turkish Government has to restore to the Naval Department is, the payment of the sum of money which they had drawn for their own use from their own vote from the Exchequer?—The money paid in would go at once to the credit of naval services, and the Admiralty would open in their books a credit with the Turkish Government to the extent of the monies so paid in, and as payments were made on account of that Government, they would charge that account with such payments, and the payments would pass through the naval account as if they were naval monies; the Pay Office is not required to keep an account with the Turkish Government; it is entirely a question between the Admiralty and that Government.

1260. In what form are the accounts kept at the Pay Office?—The accounts at the Pay Office are kept according to the most approved form of double entry; and I believe them to be as perfect as any accounts under the Government. Having been in that office many years before I went to the Treasury, I can say that I never could have ventured to undertake the responsibility of conducting those immense cash operations, unless I had had the assistance of that system. Now it is merely A, B, C; the accounts reduce everything to the most perfect order. During the whole time that I was there, and I believe since, since, no cash error has ever been discovered by the Audit Board in any of those accounts. The account last year I think amounted to about 120,000,000 l., including Exchequer bills.

1261. You cannot have a credit to one department without a debit to another, and you cannot have a debit to one department without a credit to another?—No; every transaction has its counteracting entry.

1262. In every single transaction, there is an adjustment of that transaction at the time it takes place?—Yes; the system reduces everything to order in its first stage. Those transactions may appear complicated to those who have not worked them, but I can assure the Committee that the system of account in operation renders the management of the cash in that large department very simple.

1263. Every issue that you receive out of the Exchequer on account of any one department necessarily goes to the credit of it?—To the credit of the service to which it belongs. I may say that I have never known a single item go to its wrong account, or the slightest difficulty in managing the accounts.

1264. Every issue that is received from the Exchequer on behalf of the navy is immediately credited to the navy account?—Precisely.

1265. Every payment made on account of the navy is debited to the navy account?—Precisely, and a weekly account of them is rendered to the Naval Department, so that there is a check upon them there.

1266. If a payment be made by the navy on account of the army service, whether for the delivery of stores or for any other purposes, and the army repay that sum of money, it must necessarily in your books go to the credit of the navy and the debit of the army?—Yes, precisely.

1267. And that repayment is the money that goes into the cash account, not being the original receipt of revenue, but a repayment from one department of an advance made by another?—Practically it goes into the cash account; but where the transfer is between two departments that employ the Paymaster as their banker, it does not pass through the cash account, except as a transfer at the end of the month.

1268. If you receive a repayment from anybody with whom you have not an account, such as the East India Company repaying an advance to the army, the East India Company having no account in the Pay Office, it must necessarily go into the cash account?—Yes, into the cash account at the Bank.

1269. But the operation of that in your books would be, that the army would be credited and the cash account be debited?—Yes.

1270. Will you explain, with regard to those sums which go to the cash account, in what respect they differ from the receipts of revenue which go into the Exchequer?—All those sums are mere repayments of monies which have been previously advanced by the departments on whose account those sums are refunded, and if those repayments did not come back to those departments, they would find themselves short of funds on their votes; and when they presented their balance-sheet to Parliament, they would have to demand a vote to make good the deficiency in the funds caused by expending them for services which Parliament did not contemplate; therefore it is absolutely necessary either that the departments should recover those monies from those on whose account they have been advanced, or get them from Parliament.

1271. Supposing the army votes to be 6,000,000 l., and that the army advance on behalf of the East India Company half a million, if the repayment from the East India Company, instead of being made to the army, were to go back into the Exchequer, the army would still only be able to draw the 6,000,000 l. from the Exchequer, but they would have only five millions and a half at their disposal, because half a million had gone back into the Exchequer?—Yes, because they have advanced it for another department.

1272. For every issue from the Exchequer, the department on whose account it is made is responsible in their annual account to the Audit Board?—Each department debits itself with the full amount of the grants, and it can only take credit for the payments made out of those grants for services which Parliament has sanctioned; and if they employ any money drawn from the Exchequer for other services, it can only be as an advance to be repaid.

1273. If they were not to repay it, or were to pay it back into the Exchequer, it would be a reduction of the vote which Parliament had given them for their own uses?—Precisely.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

1275. The 20,000 l. would have to be accounted for by the Admiralty in the legitimate services in one way or the other, and when they get the repayment, they apply it to their own proper purposes, and account for it?—Yes; the application of the audit does not extend solely to the services which appear in the account laid before Parliament; it takes the whole range of receipts and payments which pass through the department; they examine every entry made in the ledger and the balance-sheet; all those receipts and payments would appear in the accounts of the department, but not in the account laid before Parliament, because they have no reference to it.

1276. But the Audit Office would demand from the Admiralty the authority under which the payments were made?—All the authorities and the vouchers are placed before them.

1277. With regard to this cash account, consisting of monies such as you have described, is it not a rule which is always observed, and which has been laid down by all Treasury Minutes from 1831, that that cash account should be exhausted before you operate on the Exchequer account?—Precisely. If you want to reduce the balances to the lowest amount, you must prevent accumulation upon an account of that kind. If a sum is paid in to the credit of the army in the cash account, you must use that money for services generally before you allow any Exchequer credits to be drawn, otherwise you place at the disposal of the Paymaster a larger sum than he requires for the public service.

1278. But it is a rule laid down throughout the whole of the Treasury and Pay Office Departments that that cash account, in order that the greatest economy of balances may be attained, shall be exhausted from day to day, before the Exchequer credits are acted upon?—That is the rule laid down in the Exchequer Minute of 1834, and it has been continued ever since, and it is an indispensable regulation if you are to economise your balances.

1279. The two drawing accounts are fed from day to day, first from the cash account if there should be cash in hand, and, secondly, from the Exchequer credit account, to the extent necessary for the day's payments?—That is the rule acted upon in feeding those accounts.

1280. So that you have nothing upon that drawing account that is not necessary for the day's payments; you exhaust the cash account before you go to the Exchequer account, and you receive credits upon that Exchequer account from day to day, as required?—Yes.

1281. Thereby there is not a shilling in any of those three accounts except what is necessary for the transactions from day to day, and the whole of the remainder remains in the Exchequer account?—Yes, all the difference which it would be necessary to draw out to put every account in credit, remains under the custody of the Comptroller of the Exchequer.

1282. By this practice you may say that the whole amount of the public monies which are not required for the payments of the day are in the Exchequer account, under the control of the Exchequer?—Precisely.

1283. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] What proportion of the cash account consists of the repayments of sums originally issued from the Exchequer?—I reduced the cash account of last year from 5,750,000 l., by taking out special items, which will not occur again, to about 2,300,000 l.; I take the 300,000 l. as representing revenue paid into the Exchequer, and 2,000,000 l. as being the sum which represents reimbursements to votes and other accounts; it was larger last year, during a year of war; during peace, it will be smaller.

1284. In an ordinary year of peace, what proportion would the monies standing upon the cash account, in the course of the year, which had never found their way into the Exchequer, bear to that portion of the account, which consists consists of repayments of sums originally issued from the Exchequer?—Though this account is large, I do not think the proportions would vary much from an ordinary year of peace; the proportions in this account are 20 to 3, the 3 representing the revenue, and the 20 representing the repayments to votes.

1285. Mr. Wilson.] Then the principle which is now adopted, is that of making one single central fund applicable to the whole of the expenditure of the public service?—Yes, we consider the monies when in the hands of the Paymaster as forming one fund from which all claims having a credit on the votes are to be met.

1286. Although it is possible to prevent an issue from the Paymaster's Office, and the rule is attended to as much as is consistent with the transfers from day to day, to prevent an issue beyond the Parliamentary vote, would it be possible, do you think, to separate those Parliamentary votes in such a way as to have an issue from the Exchequer for each vote, and make that issue applicable only to that vote?—I think it would be impracticable. I will mention one or two items to illustrate that. The sum paid by the Paymaster-general in the last year for Treasury bills, which are bills drawn by the Commissariat officers abroad for the supply of their chests, amounted to 6,327,000*l.*, and the amount of specie sent out from this country for the same purpose was 3,662,000*l.*, making, in round numbers, 10,000,000*l.* Now you cannot appropriate that money to the particular votes to which it is applicable at the time of issue; that money goes to supply a sub-exchequer in each of those places; it is not appropriated money applicable to specific services. In addition to that the navy draw what are called imprest bills, which are also advances to sub-accountants, and not appropriated to particular services, about 3,600,000*l.*; and there was a similar service in the Ordnance, amounting to about 3,000,000*l.* more; those large sums make it impossible to keep a separate account of the Exchequer credits. You could not divide your cash into votes. As regards the Army, Navy, and Ordnance Departments, no attempt has ever been made since the introduction of the Exchequer Act in 1834 to keep an account at the Exchequer, of the separate votes for those services, although I think if there were any value in the system of Exchequer credits, those are the very services to which it would have been most important to have applied the principle; yet from the first day of that Act being brought into operation down to the present time, no attempt has been made to do more than issue those services in gross. All that has been done has been to apply the principle of Exchequer credits to the miscellaneous votes, where there is very little opportunity for misappropriation on a large scale.

1287. Even with regard to those small votes, would it be possible without very materially and unnecessarily increasing the balances in the hands of the Paymaster, to separate each issue from the Exchequer, and to apply it strictly for the purpose for which it is issued?—Not without keeping a considerable aggregate balance under those accounts; advances are also made abroad out of the Commissariat Chest for several of those miscellaneous services.

1288. For the convict service for instance?—Yes; very large advances are made for that service, and for all the salaries of the colonial establishments.

1289. The other day the Comptroller of the Exchequer expressed his great astonishment that there should be the sum of 350,000*l.* drawn upon an old vote on one day, and intimated that he supposed it was for another service; will you explain under what circumstances that issue was made?—It was an issue made to reimburse the Commissariat Chest, the amount of a claim which, on the previous day, had been sent to the Treasury by the Audit Board.

1290. It was to reimburse payments which had been made through the Commissariat Chest for convict services, and which could not have been appropriated at the time that the money was issued from the Exchequer originally?—No; it was the exact amount of the claim sent in; it was to repay out of the vote of Parliament the sum advanced by the Commissariat Chest.

1291. Sir Henry Willoughby.] Do you think the Comptroller of the Exchequer was aware of that circumstance?—No; he had no means of knowing it.

1292. Mr. Wilson.] Therefore, although in point of theory the monies are issued from the Exchequer for the special votes for which Parliament grants them; it is, in your opinion, absolutely impossible that that appropriation shall continue in the application of those monies when in the Pay Office?—You can keep no separate cash accounts for the distinct votes, unless you could make every payment a final one, and charge it against the vote when it is made; I have already shown the Committee, that those millions of money issued without appropriation, prevent your making that separation according to separate votes which is absolutely necessary before you can fully carry out that system. When the Exchequer Act was passed the Pay Offices were so scattered, and the mode of conducting the pecuniary business of the public so little known, that it was not till you brought them together, and reconciled their conflicting regulations, that the full difficulties of the system were seen.

1293. Then the principle which is now pursued, is to keep as much as possible, the whole of the public monies in one single fund?—Yes; to keep the cash in the banking accounts as one common fund.

1294. Do you consider that that principle is consistent with the annual Appropriation Act?—It is perfectly consistent with the annual Appropriation Act; because no issue is made without being sanctioned by Parliament, and is, so far as the Pay Office can do so, within the limits of the vote.

1295. Do you consider that to be strictly consistent with the Exchequer Act of 1834?—Not according to Lord Monteagle's interpretation of that Act; I should say that it was inconsistent with the opinion he has given.

1296. Do you think it is possible, keeping one general cash account fund which is operated upon as you have described, to apply the Exchequer Act of 1834, according to the construction that has been put upon it by Lord Monteagle?—I think not.

1297. Has this principle ever been inquired into or recognised by Parliament? This principle was fully inquired into about three-quarters of a century ago. In 1780, Parliament was justly displeased with the large accumulation of balances which had accrued in the hands of various public accountants, both of receipts and of expenditure, and they appointed a Commission consisting of independent persons, selected solely on account of their knowledge of the subject, to inquire into it. I will trouble the Committee by reading three extracts from the Report of those Commissioners; they are short, but to the point. I will merely premise, that it appears to me that this system of subdividing the funds and creating separate balances had its origin in a very defective state of the public accounts. In the absence of those securities which a perfect system of public accounts would have afforded, Parliament was driven to the necessity of creating those separate funds to prevent misappropriation and confusion in the accounts. Thus we find in the old accounts of that date that the revenue departments had a variety of funds; I believe the Customs were broken up into about 30 or 40 distinct funds. For instance, a particular tax was directed to be set aside in order to accumulate a fund upon which the interest of a particular loan was charged, and if the fund was deficient some other fund was charged with that deficiency, and if there was a surplus upon the fund there was a distinct appropriation for that surplus. Those who refer to the accounts of that period can alone appreciate the intricacy of that system. In the departments of expenditure monies were drawn out under a variety of heads of service, and balances accumulated upon each; I am quite aware that at that period the interests of individuals had a great deal to do with the system, and practices which in the present day would be considered high crimes, were then admitted, and profits on balances were recognised as part of the legitimate emoluments of public servants; but I believe the chief cause of the multiplication of funds and balances was the defective state of the public accounts. I will just read what the Commissioners of 1780, who inquired fully into this subject, and who released a large amount of public money for the use of the public, say on the subject of balances; their Reports are some of the most valuable that have ever been written, either before or since, on these subjects.

1298. Sir James Graham.] Who were the Commissioners?—They were Commissioners appointed by an Act passed in 1780, the 20th Geo. 3, c. 54. The Commissioners state in their Fifteenth Report, "If the principles on which we have endeavoured to establish this consolidation of the Custom duties be well founded, they lead to a still more important and extensive regulation. We cannot presume to pronounce without a previous examination that they can be applied to such other offices of the revenue as are perplexed with a multiplicity of distinct accounts; but it is highly probable that distinction in every office is, for the most part, rendered necessary upon the same ground of appropriation, and if so, it may upon the same principle be abolished. This will open the way to a great measure of financial regulation; to the introduction of the most simple of all modes of account account into the depository of the public treasure, the formation of one fund, into which shall flow every stream of the public revenue, and from whence shall issue the supply for every public service. This plan is consistent with every distinction of account in the Exchequer that may be necessary to preserve the knowledge of the produce of each of the several leading branches of revenue, and the quantum and circumstances of the issue for any particular service." "There is no danger of confounding the receipts, nor of the issues exceeding the sum voted or appropriated for it." That principle, which applies to the whole of the receipts, though nibbled at at different times during the interval, was not finally carried out till 50 years after it had been recommended, and it was carried out by the very Commissioners who are now supposed to have split up the public balances into those minute divisions called Exchequer credits. The Commissioners state, at page 11 of the Exchequer Report, paragraph 105, "We can see no sufficient reason for continuing the practice of making particular taxes and portions of taxes subject to particular charges or payments. A change in this respect will still further relieve the Exchequer from part of the unnecessary complication which at present embarrasses its operations. Whatever grounds may have formerly existed for this usage, they must have long ceased, and all distinctions of this description should cease with them. We feel no hesitation in proposing that the whole proceeds of the taxes, and of the other sources of the public revenue, when in the custody of the Exchequer, should form one fund, liable to the whole charge of the public expenditure. No person can seriously entertain the opinion that the public creditor derives the least additional security from the declaration that part of the revenue is peculiarily applicable to the payment of his dividends; and on the other hand, of all classes in the community he is most interested in the introduction of any improvement that can effect simplicity, accuracy, and security in the administration and application of the public revenue." That is the principle embodied in the Exchequer Act, and the consolidation of those balances has been carried out, and exists at the present day with very great advantage to the public service. It promotes economy, in placing a larger fund at the disposal of the Government, and produces great simplicity in the public accounts.

1299. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Was not the Consolidated Fund established by Act of Parliament in consequence of this Report?—I believe it was established about seven years after the First Report; but the receipts were not finally consolidated into one fund till 1834. But the Commissioners did not stop there; they went into the departments of expenditure and they made the same objections to the system which existed in the Pay Offices. In the office of the Paymaster of the Forces, they found the same evils existing. The Commissioners state in their Fifth Report, "During the course of our inquiry, certain circumstances in this office (the Pay Office) attracted our attention, as subjects demanding present correction and prevention for the future. The usual course of the receipts and issues in this office for several years, has constantly put into the hands of the Paymaster-general a large sum of public money not employed in the public service, expressly contrary to that sound maxim of prudence and economy, that more should not be issued from the Exchequer for any service than that service wants. He asks sums of the Treasury under specific heads of service, and in the form of a computation; the Treasury direct the issue in the terms he asks it, without knowing whether the service is adequate to the requisition, whether the computation be just, and whether he has not already in his hands full as much as he wants. There is no control upon him in the Exchequer, the only attention of that office is to see that the issue does not exceed his credit, and that his credit does not exceed the supply for the Army Services voted by Parliament that year." The evil was rather more pressing in this department in consequence of the large accumulation of balances, in the hands of the Paymasters, both in and out of the office, therefore an Act was passed in the 23d year of George the Third, c. 50, consolidating all the separate balances into one account at the Bank. I believe that the Act is known as "Burke's Act." The Commissioners also reported upon the office of the Treasurer of the Navy, and they are there even more specific. You might almost take the words of this Report as the regulation of the Pay Office at the present day. The Commissioners in their Third Report, dated 7th March 1781, report, "That they obtained from the Treasurer of the Navy an account of his balances at the

the end of each month, from the 1st of January 1779 to the 31st of August 1780, in which period the balances varied from 121,000 l. to 370,000 l." In reference to this account they state, "As the public money should pass without delay from the pocket of the subject into the Exchequer, so it ought not to issue out of the Exchequer, either before it is wanted, or in larger sums than the service for which it is issued requires. By this last account, a very large sum has been constantly in his hands during the period therein mentioned, exclusive of the amount of bills assigned upon him, but not presented to him for payment. The principal cause of the magnitude of this balance is the practice in this office of not applying money issued under one head towards satisfying a demand upon any other head of the service; the consequence of which is, when the money upon the account of any head of service is nearly exhausted, a supply must be procured for that service, how abundant soever the sums upon other heads of account, or the sum total of his cash may be. Were all the sums he receives to constitute and be considered as one common general cash, and be applied indiscriminately to every service, a much less sum than the lowest of the balances in the account last mentioned would, in our opinion, suffice to carry on the current services of the navy, even various and extensive as they now are. It would create no confusion in the accounts, for the receipts and payments under each head of service might still be kept distinct; and though the payments might frequently exceed the receipts on some heads of accounts, yet the treasurer would not be without sufficient cash, and the next issue from the Exchequer would restore the balances." This also was adopted, but not till 1832, when an Act for the consolidation of the civil departments of the Navy, was passed, which finally carried out the recommendation of those Commissioners.

1300. Mr. Wilson.] The whole of the measures taken by the Treasury of late years, have been with the view of bringing this system to a state of perfection?—Yes, and to carry it out with economy; all men of business would regard this as the proper mode of conducting a cash business.

1301. Is it your opinion that this consolidation fund, and the consolidation of the payments in one office, is a material check against frauds and illegalities of every description?—It is a very important check against fraud. In the first place it places the smallest possible sum at the disposal of the Paymaster; it gets rid of all those complications of account which had generally been a cover for misappropriation as well as perhaps for frauds. I will mention one circumstance that occurred in the navy about two years before that principle was carried out in the consolidation of the naval balances. In the year 1828 or 1829, one of the paymasters in the office of the Treasurer of the Navy had to deal with two accounts of this kind. There was a balance left upon general services, and another left upon wages, and by the confusion that was produced in the accounts for a series of years, he carried on a fraud amounting exactly to the sum of 20,000 l., which was never detected till he went away for his holidays for a month and never came back; when they came to look into his accounts they had great difficulty in finding it out, but the fraud never could have existed with a common balance.

1302. And it cannot possibly exist now?—No; the checks upon issues are also very much better now than they were in former times.

1303. If any irregularity were to occur now, it must be discovered instantly; must it not?—The accounts, however heavy the payments may be, are invariably balanced before the business of each day is closed.

1304. Notwithstanding all the transactions that have taken place in consequence of the war, in what condition are the public accounts now as compared with a time of peace?—The accounts which have been principally revised of late years have been the great accounts of the Naval and Military Departments and the Pay Office accounts; and the latter are in just as efficient a state as they were at the commencement of the war; there has never been a departure from any one of their checks during the whole period of the war. With regard to the naval accounts, a statement was laid upon the Table of the House of Commons early in the Sesssion, showing that they had been balanced, and that the whole of the imprest accounts had been audited within the period allowed for the preparation of an account of ordinary peace expenditure; although the pressure was very great, extraordinary exertions were made, and it was absolutely necessary, owing to the Act which requires an annual account to be laid on the Tale of the House of Commons, by a given date, that the whole of the accounts should not only be properly made up, but finally audited before that account was presented, and it was laid on the Table of the House of Commons with the same regularity as in a time of peace; the account of the Ordnance expenditure and the account of the Commissiariat expenditure have also been completed within the same period. The War Department, owing to the enormous difficulties that they have had to encounter, the casualties that have occurred in the regiments, the death of paymasters, the creation of new corps, and the vast number of new allowances, have had far greater difficulties to contend with than any other department; and notwithstanding that, they have asked the Treasury, I believe, for only about a fortnight or three weeks' grace, when they will have the whole of their accounts prepared for the House of Commons and laid on the Table complete for the first year of the war. I do not know any circumstance that appears to me more creditable to these departments than the manner in which they have prepared those accounts.

House

1305. Mr. Henley.] You have read considerable extracts from former Reports which, in your opinion, justify and support the principle of paying the whole revenue into one department?—The first extract which I read applied to that.

1306. So far as I am aware, is it not a disputed point as to its being a right and proper practice?—No, it has been carried out as regards the revenue since 1834, with very great benefit to the public service.

1307. I think that the second extract that you read went to prove also that it was desirable that there should be one department of pay instead of several?—The series of extracts which I read was to show that the department charged with the payments should conduct them from one general cash account, instead of splitting up the cash into various appropriated balances, which was the practice in those days.

1308. You stated, did you not, before you read those extracts, that you did not see what advantage it was that the Exchequer should issue money, though under the respective heads of account?—The Exchequer must issue under the existing Act under the respective votes, but it would be a great simplification of the public accounts if the Exchequer or the Treasury issued from a common fund, and only charged the votes with the sums actually applied.

1309. If I understand you rightly, your view is, that it would be a certain simplification and a better system if, in point of fact, either the paymaster should be merged into the Exchequer, or the Exchequer become the paymaster?—Undoubtedly; they are two offices charged with a similar duty; one having merely to supply the other with the funds, and the other having to appropriate them in detail.

1310. Is it your opinion that it would be better that those two offices, acting in the way that we have heard, should be consolidated into one office?—Yes, I think there should be but one office. As regards consolidation, I consider the Pay Office complete in itself; if you added the Exchequer to it, you would add the Exchequer without duties.

1311. I understood you to say that you think that there is no security or advantage to the public in the mode in which the Exchequer now supplies the Pay Office with money?—I think not.

1312. If you think that there is no advantage, without dwelling upon the word "consolidation," do you think that the Exchequer should be swept away, and the money go in gross into the hands of the Paymaster?—I think that the Exchequer might very safely be swept away, and the money issued as it is now, not under distinct heads, but issued by the Treasury directly, instead of passing through the Exchequer.

1313. If it is issued by the Exchequer direct, into whose hands would it go from the several receipts of revenue, and into whose account would it go previously to the issue by the Treasury to the Paymaster?—It would go to the account at the Bank as it now does; it is called the account of the Exchequer.

1314. You think that the account might as well stand in the name of the Treasury, and be issued by their warrants, instead of the Comptroller's warrants?—That is the effect; it does not stand in the name of the Comptroller; the title of the account is the "Exchequer account."

1315. Upon the authority of the Comptroller's warrants, issues are made to the Paymaster?—Precisely.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

12 June 1856.

1316. If I understand your late answer, you think that the Exchequer might be altogether safely dispensed with, and that it is no security to the public?—I think not; I think that the Treasury might operate directly upon that account at the Bank instead of going through the Exchequer.

1317. You have stated that the sum of 10,000,000*l.* was dealt with, partly composed of bills, and partly of the sum of upwards of three millions and a half in cash, that was sent out and was dealt with from the office in consequence of the demands of the war. How was the money obtained for that purpose?—When I speak of 10,000,000*l.*, that is the amount of bills in the year; of course the monies that come back again, go to the credit of that account; the difference, according to the Exchequer Minute, is directed to be taken out of the Army Grants.

1318. It was an issue from the Exchequer to the Paymaster upon the account of the Army Grants, was it?—It was principally drawn under the Army Grants. Formerly, before the consolidation of the pay offices, the account of the Army Extraordinaries was one of the army accounts, and there was a vote for the service that went into the common fund; and in the Minute upon which the Exchequer was founded, there is a paragraph which says, that the payment of those bills is to be met, in the first instance, out of the issues of the Army Grants; of course all repayments that come in are carried to the credit of that account, and furnish to that extent the monies required for the same purpose. It is not a sum of 10,000,000*l.* permanently out of the Army Grants, but to the extent to which the account of the Commissariat Chest is overdrawn.

1319. At first the issue from the Exchequer was merely on the army account; then it would be a matter of account how far the whole of it, or part of it, was expended on account of the army, or lessened by repayments on account of the army?—The army account was selected, no doubt, because the bills drawn from abroad are principally on account of that service.

1320. Questions have been put to you of three kinds to illustrate the mode of dealing with what is called the Cash Account. One related to transactions with the East India Company, another to the issue of stores from one department to another, and the third related to a matter connected with foreign Governments, Turkey being the one named. With regard to the East India Company, this case was, I think, put: a sum had been voted in the Army Estimates by Parliament for the recruiting service in India, and that sum was afterwards repaid by the East India Company, but it does not appear upon the estimates for the army services?—No: the Army Estimates and Votes are taken solely for that portion of the expense which ultimately falls upon the public; any money that is expended out of those grants in recruiting for the East India Company, forms a separate account in the books of the department; the charge is made, and it is ultimately repaid by the East India Company. This is the clause which authorises it. The Act of 33 Geo. 3, c. 52, s. 128, enacts, that "all sums issued by the said Paymaster-general of His Majesty's forces, for and on account of His Majesty's forces serving in India, or for raising or supplying recruits for the same, shall be repaid by the said Company; and that the actual expenses only, which, since the said 24th day of December 1792, have been, or which hereafter shall be incurred for the support and maintenance of the said troops, shall be borne and defrayed by the said Company." The meaning of this clause is, that the first class of expenditure should be defrayed, in the first instance, by the Government, and be afterwards repaid by the East India Company; and the second class of expenditure should be paid direct by the Company.

1321. In your former answer to a question that was put to you, did you imply that the sum expended upon the account of the East India Company did or did not appear in the Estimates of Parliament?—The sum expended never appears in the Estimates submitted to Parliament. In one of the sub-papers under the Land Force vote, you will see the estimated charge of the troops borne on the East India establishment, but it is no part of the vote; it is one of the explanatory papers inserted.

1323. As to the stores, you have said that the credits to the various departments who have supplied stores to the other departments in the Queen's service, come come into the cash account?—If they are between two departments, both banking with the Paymaster-general, it would not pass through the cash account at the bank, but be settled as a cash transfer in the books of the Pay Office.

1324. Do the Army and Navy both bank with the Paymaster?—Yes, the Army, Navy, and Ordnance. The Paymaster is the banker for almost all the public departments now.

1325. Then stores supplied by the navy to the army would not form a part of the cash account?—Not part of a cash account at the Bank, but part of the cash transactions between the two departments. The transfers amounted last year, as I stated, to 15,000,000 l., independently of the cash account at the Bank.

1327. I think in the course of your evidence the instance put was, stores supplied from the army to the navy?—In reading the explanation of all the different items that constituted the cash transactions between the departments, no doubt I read the two together, as applying both to cash and to cash transfers; although a transfer does not pass through the Bank, still it is a settlement of a cash transaction between the two departments.

1328. Has your office any knowledge of anything beyond the money charged for the stores?—Nothing.

1329. You know nothing as to what it is for, or the amount?—Nothing; that is entirely settled by the department conducting the business, or making the supply.

1330. In what way are you informed of the amount due?—When one department makes a claim upon another, they send what is called in official language a receivable order to the Paymaster, requesting him to receive from the other department the amount of such a claim; the Paymaster keeps that till he receives the proper order from the department which has to make the payment; the two documents agreeing, the transfer is made, and it is passed to their respective accounts.

1331. You debit the one, and credit the other?—Yes.

1332. Does the document, giving you that information in the first instance, specify what it is for, or does it merely specify a certain amount of cash?—The amount of cash, with a short description. They would say in these words from the Navy: "You are requested to receive from the Ordnance the sum of so-and-so, for a supply of stores made to the Ordnance Department at Montreal, or some other place, at such a period."

1333. In the early part of your evidence, you stated that the Paymaster authorises parties in various departments to draw fixed amounts on account of the supplies voted to any department; that the Paymaster's authority was given to the parties who drew the money from the Bank to draw a fixed amount on the account of the supplies for that particular department?—I do not exactly recollect that; I think the Honourable Member refers to the working accounts. I stated that the Paymaster-general, when he comes into office, appoints certain persons to act for him. He gives a deputation to one set of officers to write off from the supply accounts to the working accounts, and he grants a deputation to another set of officers to draw upon those working accounts; but the person who draws upon the Drawing Account, that is, the account from which all checks are payable, is nominated by the Paymaster-general, and is a clerk in the office.

1334. Are those parties the same for every department, or is there a distinct person for each department?—The same person draws for all the services; there is but one pay department, and one man draws for everybody.

1335. The counter check is kept in the same office, is it?—Every cheque is countersigned and examined with the voucher upon which it is drawn before it is given to the parties applying for it.

1336. And the Paymaster, in the first instance, authorises the person who draws to draw a fixed sum for each department?—He does not let him know what balance he is to draw upon, he merely gives him power to draw; his authority for drawing the cheque is the presentation of the claim, examined and certified by the examiner in the office whose duty it is to pass it.

12 June 1856.

1337. Are the Committee to understand you to say that the Paymaster gives to those parties an unlimited power to draw, or does he draw to a fixed amount stated day by day?—It is an unlimited authority to draw. A deputation is addressed to the Bank of England: "You are authorised to pay on the countersignature of Mr. So-and-so, any cheques for public services drawn upon my drawing account by the person hereby appointed to that duty."

1338. That is the authority to the Bank to pay?—Yes; but it is the authority also for the Paymaster to draw, and that is the deputation under which he draws.

1339. Is it in duplicate?—No; the Paymaster himself holds no document beyond the minute of the Paymaster-general, appointing him to be the officer to do that duty.

1340. Then we arrive at this, that there is a separate officer appointed by a minute, and that a deputation is given to the bankers, authorising them to pay the cheques of A. or B.?—Exactly.

1341. And that is without reference to any fixed amount at any particular time, but the authority is general?—Yes, general and unlimited.

1342. The next point was, that the Paymaster supplies those drawing from day to day with funds to meet that amount?—No; another officer, the Assistant Paymaster-general, who holds a deputation to write off from the supply accounts, furnishes funds upon which those drafts are payable.

1343. That is a separate officer?—Yes; the Paymaster knows nothing of the balance upon which he is to draw; he only knows that he has power to draw to the amount of any vouchers presented to him during the day.

1344. That is Paymaster A.?—Yes.

1345. Then Paymaster B. keeps a drawing account for the money to meet those unlimited demands which the Paymaster A. may make upon him?—Precisely; the Assistant Paymaster-general feeds the account upon which Paymaster A. draws.

1346. Then is it Paymaster A., or who is it that demands from the Exchequer the amounts requisite to enable him to keep the drawing accounts supplied from time to time?—The Assistant Paymaster-general, who has the control over the supply accounts.

1347. The Paymaster-general is the party who applies to the Comptroller of the Exchequer for funds out of the Exchequer, and then he delegates to A. power to draw upon the respective departments, and to B. to watch the account and keep it supplied with money?—Precisely so.

1348. Do you see any mode in which that portion of the business could be either made more simple or more secure to the public?—No, I can see no better security than the system affords; it is simple; no operation is done twice over. It is a matter which I watched many years when I was in that office, and I cannot conceive it possible to institute a better check than exists upon the issue of money in that office. I never knew anything go wrong in the whole period that I was connected with it.

1349. In point of fact, according to the view which you have laid before the Committee, if the Exchequer was done away with the Paymaster would be fed by the Treasury instead of being fed by the Comptroller of the Exchequer?—Yes; the machinery of the Pay Office would not be altered in the slightest degree.

1350. Excepting in the particular of getting money under different authority?—Excepting that the Treasury, instead of giving authority to the Exchequer to give a credit, would give it to the Bank direct; the Paymaster's duties would remain precisely the same.

1351. The same as to paying the money, but he would apply to a different source for it?—No, he would apply to the same authority; he does not apply to the Exchequer; the Treasury does that.

1352. The Paymaster applies to the Treasury?—Yes; the department lets the Paymaster know what is wanted, the Paymaster tells the Treasury, the Treasury tells the Exchequer, the Exchequer tells the Bank, and the Bank finally gives the credit.

1353. Then that fourfold operation might be got rid of; and you think that it is of no advantage to the public that the Exchequer should hold a check over the Treasury?—I have never been able to discover any advantage in it.

1354. Would there be any difficulty in having an account prepared, showing the daily credits upon the four various accounts that we have heard of?—There is no difficulty in preparing any account whatever in the Pay Office; their system will enable them to do it.

1355. Sir James Graham.] You stated, did you not, at the time of the passing of the Exchequer Act in 1832, that, in your opinion, the duty of controlling the appropriation of the votes was assigned to the Exchequer; but that the practical working of this part of the financial business of the Government was very imperfectly understood. That opinion stands recorded in your memorandum, and I think you have repeated that opinion in your evidence again to-day?—Yes.

1357. And though a better system of account, such as you still recommend as the best, namely, that of double entry, was introduced, and though there was a control in the Exchequer, such as it stands now under the Act of 1832, before expenditure, did not experience prove that the want of a concurrent audit rendered the two first improvements insufficient?—Notwithstanding the Exchequer, it was shown that misappropriations did take place, and that they occurred even without the knowledge of the Exchequer, and therefore the Exchequer could have no control over the application of the money, if large amounts could be set aside and appropriated differently from the intentions of Parliament. It is very difficult for the Exchequer to institute a check upon the appropriation of money; they merely issue the money to be appropriated; they know nothing of it after it has left them.

1358. As the system has been described of a Royal Warrant and a Treasury Warrant, which are the authorities for drawing money from the Exchequer, those two warrants deal with very large sums, and in gross almost, do they not?—They deal, in the majority of cases, with the gross vote.

1359. Those warrants are binding upon the Comptroller of the Exchequer, and he must obey them, must he not?—Yes, he must obey those warrants to the full extent of the Royal Order.

1360. When he has obeyed them all his power of control over the appropriation and the application of the various votes included in those warrants is gone?—Yes. When the vote is passed a Royal Order is obtained for the gross amount, and the Treasury Warrant is sent to the Exchequer with the Royal Order; all the legal forms are then complete. If the Treasury choose to order him to issue on the following day the whole amount of that vote he has no discretion, he must obey.

1362. If you rendered that, which is ineffectual now, henceforth effectual, you must extend the power of control beyond expenditure to the application of the money when issued, thereby instituting a new audit office?—Precisely; if I could see any way in which any extension of the power of the Comptroller would enable him to perform his functions with advantage, I would suggest it. I have attentively considered the subject, and I can discover no means by which that can be done.

1363. While his power is limited to operations before expenditure you think the power nugatory unless it be extended to inquiry after expenditure?—I think it is entirely illusory.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

12 June 1856.

1364. If you extend his authority to inquiry after expenditure, that will constitute him an auditor in the last resort, will it not?—It would be giving him the same functions as the Audit Board now has; it would be creating two concurrent authorities doing the same thing, and you would be carrying out your system without any reference to uniformity.

1365. Whereas now you have two cash accounts, the Exchequer cash account, and the Paymaster's cash account, you would have two audits?—Yes, two instead of one; and probably carried out on different principles.

1366. With reference to the effect of the audit when it was introduced in aid of the Comptroller's check, and when the improved system of accounts was introduced into the Admiralty, was it found effectual for its purpose with reference to appropriation?—It was found very useful and very effectual in bringing before Parliament every variation between the expenditure and the vote of Parliament. Prior to the introduction of that system such a thing as correct appropriation was hardly known; you could not have produced an account prior to the introduction of the system in 1832, showing the appropriation of the monies voted. I doubt, if you went back 100 years, whether you would ever find a strict account of the expenditure for the navy with reference to the votes; no such account had ever been prepared; the Estimates were framed in such a manner that it was impossible to separate the expenditure according to the classification adopted in those Estimates; and that would have been an insuperable obstacle to the preparation of a comparative account of the expenditure with the votes. The first step towards control is to establish a sound system of accounts.

1367. If the control, such as it is, before expenditure, of the Comptroller of the Exchequer, were abrogated, he having now the power of preventing any issue from the Paymaster's credit, on account of supply services for which ways and means had not been provided, what check would remain upon the Executive Government, for instance, in dissolving Parliament, when, before payment, the sums voted by Parliament had been exceeded?—The check by the Treasury upon the department, as to exceeding the amount of credit, would be complete, but there would be none upon the Executive Government to prevent a dissolution. As to the appropriation of the revenue, they would be bound by the law; but this is a constitutional question which requires to be provided for.

1368. As the matter now stands, it is both in theory and in practice, an effectual check upon the power of the Executive, is it not?—As to the total amount of the grants it is; the total of the votes cannot be exceeded; and that is a matter that would have to be provided for; and I dare say there are simple means by which that might be accomplished without doing the whole business of issue twice.

1369. You admit that, for that constitutional purpose, it is a check?—Yes. I admitted that before; it is a check upon the issue of the gross amount of the votes, and upon the issue within the limits of the ways and means grants.

1370. Does it fall within your knowledge how the matter stood on the occasion of the dissolution in 1831, when there was a difficulty in dissolving, on account of no funds standing at the Exchequer for the Ordnance service?—I believe some difficulty of that kind occurred, but I have no distinct recollection of the matter.

1371. You still admit that, for that purpose, it is an effectual check?—For that purpose it is a check.

1372. And that if you abolish the Exchequer some substitute for that check on the Executive must be provided?—If it is thought that there is a danger of the Executive exercising its power of appropriating money without the authority of Parliament, that check should be provided.

1373. You have stated that in the Paymaster's Office the best mode of keeping accounts by double entry is in operation, and you have stated that the accounts are balanced, notwithstanding the large sums passing through the office, at the end of each day, and that there have been no large errors, or indeed hardly any errors discovered; has the system of audit been introduced into the Paymaster's department?—The Paymaster sends his accounts monthly with all his vouchers to the Audit Office.

1374. But there has not been introduced into that branch of the public service a daily concurrent audit as it exists now in the Admiralty, the Army, and the the Ordnance consolidated with the Army?—The Pay Office is not an office in which the appropriation audit could be advantageously introduced, because they have no appropriation account to prepare. Theirs is simply a cash account. I will explain to the Committee the difference between the cash account and the appropriation account, and that will make it more clear. Two accounts are annually presented to Parliament in which the expenditure for naval and military services is shown: one is prepared by the Treasury, the other is prepared by the departments charged with the detailed application of the grants. It is necessary to point out the distinction which exists between these two accounts. The Treasury account is simply a cash account, commencing and terminating with the year. The expenditure side of the account is founded on the credits granted by the Exchequer within the year of the account. These credits do not represent the sum finally appropriated to the service of the year, but merely the amount drawn out to meet the current payments; as it is impossible to appropriate money, at the time of issue, to the year to which it may ultimately become chargeable, this cash account must necessarily differ from the final service account in which the actual appropriation of the sums expended in the year at home and abroad is shown; the account prepared by the departments charged with the detailed application of the sums voted is founded upon vouchers showing the actual detailed payments made in the year in every part of the world where the service is carried on; this is the appropriation account upon which the surplus grants are surrendered and placed at the disposal of Parliament, or upon which the House of Commons makes good the deficiency of the grants if the votes have been exceeded; the first, or Treasury account, being founded on the issues of one public officer, and being confined to cash transactions, can be prepared within a few days after the termination of the year; the second, or departmental account, cannot be prepared till the accounts of the numerous subaccountants employed in carrying on the public payments at home and abroad have been received in office and examined. This latter account is submitted to the investigation of the Audit Board before it is presented to Parliament; it is the sole account upon which the final appropriation of the grants rests. Now it appears to me, that in the preparation of the Exchequer Regulation Act the distinction between those two accounts was lost sight of, and that an attempt was made to apply to the Treasury cash account the rules of appropriation, which can only be carried out after the final expenditure of the money at home and abroad in the departments charged with the detailed application of the votes; therefore there are two accounts, one of which may be submitted to the check of the Audit Board as to the appropriation; the other is simply a check upon cash receipt and issue.

1375. I understood you to say, that you thought that the moral effect of a concurrent daily audit upon the department to which it was applied, had in reference to appropriation all the desired effect of a check instituted before expenditure?—I was referring then to the department where the appropriation is carried on. In the Pay Office, large sums are paid which are appropriated not to the votes, but to the general account. For instance, in the Naval Department, as I mentioned, they drew upon the Paymaster-general last year to the amount of three millions and a half for imprests, and which the Paymaster-general charged under the general naval imprest account, and not to the votes. It forms part of the aggregate sum for the navy, but cannot be distributed over the different parts of the estimate.

1376. You have mentioned a particular transaction between the Naval Department and the Turkish Government, and you stated that that transaction would appear in the navy accounts, and be subject to audit, and that being subject to audit, it would appear in the annual report, I conclude of the auditors, with reference to the naval account; has that taken place already, or not?—In the Admiralty accounts, that transaction would of course be passed in the ledger to the account of the Turkish Government, and the auditors would see that it was so carried, and they would see that that amount was exhausted by payments, or that it was kept on the books, or otherwise disposed of. That transaction would not appear as a separate appropriation in the Pay Office, the money paid by the Turkish Government would fall into the general fund for the naval service.

1377. In the annual report made by the Audit Office to Parliament as to the

12 June 1856.

the naval accounts, will that transaction with the Turkish Government be recorded and the attention of Parliament be called to it?—No; it would not appear because it is not a transaction that Parliament requires to know anything about. It is not an appropriation of public money. The Admiralty have merely acted as the agents of the Turkish Government at the request of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to receive money on the one hand and to pay it away on the other. It does not affect the appropriation of any public monies.

1378. Then a transaction of this magnitude, as the matter stands, would escape the knowledge of Parliament altogether?—Entirely. The Audit Board would not call the attention of Parliament to that matter; it would not come within the line of their duties.

1379. What was the magnitude of the transaction?—£. 150,000.

1380. Supposing that money had not been repaid, what would have been the result?—It was lodged beforehand as a deposit at the credit of the Admiralty, and they were entrusted with it.

1381. Supposing it had not taken that turn, and that the Government had thought fit to make the advance, trusting to the honour of the Turkish Government to repay it, what form would it then have taken?—I think that the auditors would, in such a case, have referred to it in their report.

1382. If the advance had been made and not been repaid, the cash account at the Admiralty would have shown the advance, and the deficiency of the balance would mark the absence of repayment; in that case what would be the duty of the auditors to Parliament?—I think that the auditors would have called the attention of Parliament to the state of the account presented, embracing all the monies received and paid on account of the navy, and would have thought it right to point out that a portion of the monies had been advanced by the navy for a foreign government and was still due by that government.

1383. But does it appear to you to be competent to a great department, either of the army or the navy, to have large money transactions either with foreign governments or with parties at home, even supposing the cash to be deposited in the first instance, and there is no loss upon the transaction, without the cognisance of Parliament?—This was quite a special transaction, which arose out of the war. I have no recollection of any transaction of the kind in the whole of my experience before, and I mentioned this, because it was a special case, only to illustrate one of the items in the cash account of the past year.

1384. If, either by repayment or by advance, there be no loss sustained upon the cash balance, those transactions, to any amount, may take place without the cognisance of Parliament?—They must be limited by the means of the department to carry them on. If the monies were deposited first, no doubt they could do so, and Parliament would have no account laid before them to show the transaction. The only account rendered is an account of the receipt and appropriation of the monies granted by Parliament.

1385. I observe that you state in your memorandum that the best control is an effectual audit after payment?—I think that it is the only effectual control.

1386. You then go on to say, let your system be based on confidence in the Government, and let the controlling responsible department of the State have full freedom of action; does not Parliamentary control rather proceed on an opposite principle than great confidence in the Government?—No doubt, Parliamentary jealousy rather, we might say. I think that Parliament would act wisely to strengthen and place a little more confidence in the controlling department of the Government, because control through a Parliamentary officer before payment can only be carried out by placing restrictions and impediments in the way of the transaction of business. Take, for example, the Exchequer control, which forces us to do the business of issue twice over, and forces us to keep the public accounts three times over. All that is not only expensive, but it is very embarrassing in the conduct of a large business like that of the public, where there should be the utmost simplicity, and no operations beyond those which cannot possibly be avoided.

1387. The Treasury is not a department of control only, but a department of expenditure?—All the large expenditure of the Government is conducted by the great departments, the Army and Navy, and they are to a great extent independent independent of the Treasury in their expenditure. Their estimates are approved by the Treasury, but when once they are voted the detailed employment of those monies is left to them. The Treasury is only, in a very limited degree, a department of expenditure.

1388. Where is the Paymaster of Civil Services located?—His duties are done by the Paymaster-general; that office was abolished in 1848.

1389. Where are the miscellaneous services paid?—They are paid at the Pay Office.

1390. Where are the civil contingencies paid?—The civil contingencies also are paid at the Pay Office.

1391. Is there a daily audit enforced there with regard to the payments of the miscellaneous services and the civil contingencies?—No; we have no appropriation account, and have never had one for the civil services; grants have been voted from year to year, and the balances carried on; it has been a running cash account.

1392. Do you think that a satisfactory state of affairs?—No, I think it is a defect which calls for a remedy.

1393. Can the control, with reference to appropriation, be said to be complete in the absence of such checks, with regard to such large branches as the miscellaneous estimates and civil contingencies?—The control is deficient in regard to the whole of the miscellaneous services.

1394. What is the control as to the Commissariat Chest?—That is a fund upon which neither final receipt nor expenditure takes place. There are monies paid in and paid out; but the balance of that account at the commencement and end of the year, that is, the surplus assets over the liabilities, does not vary.

1395. Is it subject to the Board of Audit?—Yes, the Board of Audit themselves prepare that account; they alone have the means of preparing it.

1396. With regard to the miscellaneous estimates and civil contingencies, the check of an independent Board, such as the Audit Board, has not yet been brought to bear upon them?—We have not got to the first stage; there is no appropriation account of these services.

1398. Is there any insuperable difficulty in the way of extending an effectual audit, consequent upon that annual report to Parliament, with regard to appropriation, as applied to the miscellaneous estimates?—There are some difficulties which exist in the application of the same principle as that which is applied to the accounts of the naval and military departments; before the Government can prepare a general account of the miscellaneous services, it is necessary, I think, that the practice of Parliament itself should be altered as regards the mode of voting. The Committee are aware that the principle laid down for all the naval and military services is, that the vote shall be applied to the payments to be made within the year at home and abroad. If we applied that principle to the civil services, I do not know how we should carry on the public service, because votes are taken sometimes as late as the month of July, and we should be under the necessity, I am afraid, as to many of them, of revoting the services several times. Monies are voted in one year which are not paid away till several years afterwards. You vote a specific sum for a specific object, and you obtain the vote before it is wanted. Then it is kept as long as the object is not accomplished, and is issued from time to time.

1399. Was not that very practice of holding over the monies of antecedent votes even for years condemned as most vicious in the Navy and in the Army?—Yes.

1400. And in the Ordnance?—Yes. The Treasury had some difficulty with those departments in altering that practice. The departments were anxious to retain as much money as they could, but the Treasury succeeded at last, and induced Parliament to adopt the principle of payments within the year; the Treasury required that all the balances which remained unapplied on the 31st of March should be restored to Parliament. As to the miscellaneous votes, we have not come to that point yet.

1401. But with regard to that which is under their own more immediate control control and superintendence, instead of setting a good example in the Treasury, only remains a relic of the vicious system; is that about the truth?—I believe that is very near it.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

12 June 1856.

1402. I see that you have mentioned in terms of strong praise, though not more than it deserves, the French system of public accounts, which was the example which the Commissioners of Public Accounts in 1831 had more or less in view, and you say "our attempt to imitate those forms has been very unsuccessful." What is the precise point to which that observation refers?—It referred to the system of Exchequer credits. In the French system, the Finance Department manages the whole business of payment just as I say the Treasury might manage it here. They have no Exchequer, therefore they deal directly with the Paymaster, and they have no separate Exchequer credits such as we have, interfering with and embarrassing our cash accounts. Every payment made is carried at once to its proper vote; but there is in the Exchequer Act a worse evil than these Exchequer credits. I beg to refer the Committee to the 24th clause in the Act, which lays down the principle upon which the public accounts shall be prepared; the substance of it is this,—that the public account of expenditure shall be founded upon Exchequer credits, and not upon actual payments. That is a very vicious principle; the Treasury account is to be founded upon assumptions and not upon facts, and the consequence of that is, as was pointed out in Lord Monteagle's evidence, that there was the sum of 1,464,000*l.* issued to the Paymaster on the last day of the quarter to carry him on for the following week in April, the whole of which sum was charged in the public account as a sum finally expended. It is nothing more than shifting the money from the right-hand pocket to the left, and putting it down as so much spent; that money was not an actual payment, it was nothing more than an advance of money made on account of the service of the following year. Therefore I say that to found your account upon Exchequer credits, which is the consequence of your having an Exchequer office, really falsifies the public account, and renders the cash account a very imperfect one. At the beginning of the year 1855-6, it was not necessary to fund the Paymaster-general to the same extent, because Ways and Means bills were issued in the early part of April from which his account was fed, and the consequence was that this year, when we did not adopt the same plan, we gave a large issue to the Paymaster-general prior to the 31st March, and the result of that was, that we had upwards of a million in the account of expenditure last year which did not belong to it; but the law requires that the account shall be made up on that principle, however faulty it may be.

1403. In England we have two authorities created by Act of Parliament, independently of the Executive, for the purpose of checking the public accounts; the Comptroller of the Exchequer and the Board of Audit?—Yes.

1404. In France there is only one check?—Only one.

1405. And that is the Court of Accounts?—The Finance Department has the whole control of the monies before payment, and even makes the payments; but all the public accounts are submitted to the Court of Accounts after payment. They deal with nothing till the payment has actually been made, and until the vouchers can be produced in support of it.

1406. Then your view, if I understand it, would be not to adhere to the partial adoption of the French example, which was imperfect when the Exchequer Act passed, and two independent Boards were created, but you would follow out the French example entirely, and abolish one, namely, the Exchequer, and rely only on the Audit Board after expenditure?—Yes; I consider that control the most perfect which you can have, and it would be better that the system should be uniform throughout, and that you should not have two conflicting authorities.

1407. Mr. Bowyer.] Is there not a finance committee in France?—Yes; the Committee of Verification.

1408. Sir James Graham.] Simultaneously with such a simplification and consolidation of authority over expenditure, after the expense has been incurred, you think that some additional check should be provided, as against the Executive, with regard to the Miscellaneous Estimates?—Yes; I should extend the system of appropriation audit to all the miscellaneous services; and also, considering the importance of the cash account of the Treasury, I think that the quarterly account prepared by the Treasury should be verified by the Commissioners of Audit, who should not only check the receipts and payments and the the issues to the different departments, but who should certify that the whole of the financial operations of the Treasury had been conducted according to law. If the Treasury had issued Exchequer Bills of any description, the auditors should certify that the issues were authorised by law. I think that it would be satisfactory to the Treasury that there should be some authority which could give confidence to the public that the Treasury had been faithful to its trust.

1409. The view which you take could not be fully and satisfactorily carried into effect without the intervention of Parliament?—The authority of Parliament for any change must be obtained, because the present system is established under the authority of the Exchequer Act.

1410. But you would suggest to Parliament the abolition of the Exchequer check, such as it is, and the substitution of a better and more perfect check by the extension of the powers of the Board of Audit; providing always, that with respect to auditing the whole account they shall make an annual report early in each Session of Parliament?—Yes, I think that the auditors should perform that duty, and that it should extend to the whole of the public accounts, even to all the services charged upon the Consolidated Fund, as well as to the Miscellaneous Votes, and that it should embrace every account prepared by the Treasury, as well as those prepared by the different subordinate departments.

1411. Subject to that right of an active check after expenditure, you would give the largest power of operating upon the public money in one cash account at the Bank to the Executive Government?—I would; it would be no very great extension of the present power, but it would abolish a number of forms, which, though nominal checks, are rather obstructions than checks.

1412. It would be doing henceforth, with the knowledge and under the control of Parliament, what is now done without the knowledge and control of Parliament?—Yes, it would be so.

1413. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Some years ago the financial year and the civil year coincided, did they not?—Yes, up to 1831 inclusive, the financial year terminated on the 31st of December.

1414. At that time it was the practice that payments for the army and navy were always made one quarter in advance of the Votes of Parliament?—Yes, always, and frequently much longer than that.

1415. By the necessity of the case, there was always an irregular advance made beyond the votes in supply?—Yes, the votes were always anticipated; the practice had existed for a century up to that year as a matter of necessity.

1416. The financial year was made to begin on the 1st of April, in order that Parliament might have the opportunity of voting the supplies for the navy and army before Easter?—Yes, that was the object.

1417. Since the change was made, has it not been the practice that votes for the army and navy have been taken before the expense for the first quarter of the financial year was incurred?—The object of the change in the financial year was, that no money might be spent in anticipation of the authority of Parliament for the Army, Navy, and Ordnance services, but it has never been thoroughly carried out; I have a statement of all the variations from that period, and I do not think that there is any year from the beginning up to the present time, with the exception of the present year, in which those services have been voted before the 1st of April; in the last two or three years they have been more regular in that respect than in the preceding ones. I will read to the Committee what Lord Althorp stated, in going into a Committee of Supply on the 13th February 1832: "By the course hitherto taken of preparing the Estimates for the year commencing 1st January, a certain amount of the money had been actually expended before the vote was taken; with a view of avoiding this anomaly, he thought it more consistent with the privileges of the House, and with the theory of the Constitution, that the supplies should be voted before the Government had spent any of the money. He admitted that a difficulty would be experienced in doing it at so early a period as April, but he thought the plan would be found practicable. Sir Robert Peel stated that the existence of this anomaly must have frequently occurred to all persons, but he thought the time between the meeting of Parliament and the 1st April would hardly enable the House to give the Estimates that examination which it was always desirable to afford them; that there might be subjects of great interest, subjects, perhaps, of greater immediate importance than the Estimates, that would occupy the attention of Parliament, and that if Parliament should not have voted every Estimate before the 1st April, there would be nothing in the arrangement; he had, however, no objection that the experiment should be tried. Sir James Graham agreed with Sir Robert Peel that the success of the experiment depended wholly on the Estimates being voted before the 31st March. He thought there was some force in a suggestion which had been made, that Parliament should revert to the ancient practice of meeting before Christmas, but he did not think that it would be absolutely necessary to resume it in order to effect the object under consideration. Mr. Herries saw no sufficient reason for departing from the practice which had prevailed for 100 years, but as it was an experiment, he would not oppose it." Though the practice has been very much amended, and the Estimates, as a rule, have been voted before the 31st of March, yet there are many exceptions, more particularly when there have been pressing political questions before the House.

1418. At all events, the object with which that change was made was that the Army and Navy Estimates should be presented early in the Session, and be voted early in the Session, and that the Executive Government should have it in their power to make a legal application, from funds voted by Parliament, to those two services at the commencement of the financial year?—That was the whole object of the change, and it was stated to be a general arrangement.

1419. With regard to the Miscellaneous Estimates, has it not been the practice to present them at Easter, and to take the votes late in the Session?—Yes, that has been the practice, and I fancy that Honourable Members would hardly like to abandon that practice.

1420. If that practice be continued, would it be possible to apply to the Miscellaneous Estimates the rule which is now applied to the Navy and Army Estimates?—You might apply the system of account and audit, but not upon the same principles; you would have two systems at work; you would have to charge the expenditure against the votes upon different principles.

1421. If the rule with regard to the appropriation within the year was applied to the Miscellaneous Estimates, would it not also be necessary to vote them before Easter?—Undoubtedly it would be necessary to vote them before the 1st of April.

1422. Unless votes were taken on account, would it not be necessary that the Miscellaneous Estimates should be voted before Easter?—They should all be voted before Easter.

1423. Supposing that the Miscellaneous Estimates could be voted before Easter, would there be any difficulty in applying to that class of estimates the rule which is now applied to the Navy and Army Estimates?—No difficulty whatever.

1424. You think that there is nothing in the nature of the separate votes for the small services in the Miscellaneous Estimates which constitutes any difference between that class of votes and the Army and Navy Estimates?—No, it would be necessary to be very careful not to ask for more money than would be absolutely required for the payments of the year; at present a grant is made by Parliament for some particular service; you vote the whole sum at once, without reference to the period when the payment is to take place. With regard to public works, frequently a large sum is voted for a harbour which is not called for in the year, and you carry it on and issue it the following year; it would be necessary to be very careful, in taking those votes, to confine the vote to the exact sum to be called for before the 31st of March.

1425. In that case you must make a saving of the excess and take a new vote in the following year?—Yes.

1426. If those precautions were observed which Parliament has taken with respect to the Army and Navy Estimates, that the votes should be passed before Easter, could there be any objection to extend the rule to that class of services?—No, I think it would be very desirable.

1427. Then, the possibility of extending the rule would depend upon the possibility of obtaining the votes before Easter?—Precisely; the whole of the detailed votes are so numerous now that they extend far beyond what they ought to do; I think that they ought to be revised; they are split now into about 200 distinct votes; so minute are they that in some cases the salary of one particular officer constitutes a separate vote, and then there is a separate Royal Order and a separate Treasury Warrant for that one vote; I think that the first step step should be to classify the Estimates better, and reduce the number of votes.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

12 June 1856.

1428. Sir James Graham.] If the Exchequer, which has an ineffectual control, were abolished, and an effectual control, a fresh Parliamentary sanction by enactment were to be provided, all those details must be very carefully considered and adjusted, must they not?—No doubt they would require very careful consideration; there is a great deal of labour involved in the first introduction of new plans of account of this description.

1429. With your knowledge, you would not despair of such an adjustment being feasible?—No; I proposed to Sir Charles Trevelyan to undertake it eight years ago, and certain clauses were introduced into the Draft Pay Office Minute of December 1848 for that purpose; but when it came to be considered by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he thought that if the plan was extended, it was desirable that it should be extended on one uniform principle, and I think he was right. He said, "We must get Parliament to alter its principle of voting before we commence this change." Eight years have elapsed since then, and I think it is time, perhaps, that the subject was taken up again.

1430. You are satisfied in your own mind that the check which now exists is imperfect, and requires to be amended. Have you a clear opinion as to the mode in which that might be effected?—Yes, and I placed that on record eight years ago. My suggestions were inserted in this paper to show some of the difficulties which had to be surmounted, and also to show what remained to be done to complete a system of control over the whole of the grants of Parliament.

1431. Supposing the Exchequer Office were abolished, how would you provide for the preparation and issue of Exchequer Bills?—I should adopt the recommendation of the Commissioners of Public Accounts in 1831; they distinctly recommended that that duty should be done by the Treasury.

1432. That forms a part of the original recommendation, does it not?—Yes; but it was not carried out in the form in which it was recommended.

1433. It was the view of Sir Henry Parnell that the whole matter of the preparation and issue of Exchequer Bills should not be apart from the Treasury, but be worked directly at the Treasury?—Yes, it was considered by him to be a Treasury duty.

1434. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Is it not the fact, that the number of miscellaneous votes has been considerably augmented by the Act of 1854; transferring certain charges from the Consolidated Fund to annual votes?—Yes; there was a considerable addition made to the votes in that year. There was a proposal to consolidate many of those votes, but several Members of the House of Commons thought that it went too far, and it was abandoned.

1435. There has been no systematic reconsideration of the Miscellaneous Estimates since the passing of the Act of 1854, has there?—None; and even for many years before, there had been additions from time to time; the votes have grown to 200 now; every year they increase in number.

1436. Mr. Williams.] Do not you think that the House of Commons is entitled to the fullest information as to those votes?—Yes; the House of Commons is entitled to have the fullest detail laid before it. I do not mean, by recommending the consolidation of the votes, that you should deprive the House of Commons of any information that is laid before it, but that the number of votes should be less; the principle is not consistent; for instance, with regard to the Naval Department, one vote is taken for the establishments at home, but in the Miscellaneous Services, a separate vote is taken for each establishment; I think that a revision by a Committee of the House of Commons would be the best thing that could take place, so that Government might prepare estimates to meet the wishes of the House.

1437. Is it found when those votes are under discussion that the explanation is more than sufficient; for nearly all the debates that take place arise from the votes not being sufficiently explanatory?—The Miscellaneous Estimates are given in very great detail; and I do not see, unless you gave the name of every officer, that you could really give more than you now do.

1438. Still do you not think, if the explanation were curtailed, it would render the passing of them much more difficult than at present?—I do not suggest that the explanation should be curtailed in the least; on the contrary, I would extend it if necessary; and it has been the practice of the Treasury to go on every year adding to the information placed before Parliament. There is no desire to conceal the smallest expense from Parliament.

12 June 1856.

1439. You have stated that considerable sums of money voted by Parliament for particular objects, have not been expended within the year?—Precisely; within the financial year in which the vote takes place.

1440. Do you see any objection or difficulty in compelling all the departments to whom money is voted beyond their ability to expend, or the orders given to the Paymaster on behalf of those departments, immediately after the completion of the financial year, to render an account to Parliament of the total amount unexpended, with the detailed items, and that that money shall be replaced in the Exchequer, and a new vote taken?—That is the principle applied to the whole of those large naval and military accounts to which the audit of appropriation extends; every 6*d.* that remains unexpended on the 31st of March reverts to the Exchequer, and that has been a very beneficial arrangement, for very large sums which would have otherwise been retained have been restored, and the balances given up; all that is wanting is to extend that principle to the numerous miscellaneous votes.

1441. You see no objection to the adoption of that principle as regards all the votes?—No; on the contrary, I strongly recommend it.

1442. You have expressed an opinion with regard to the inexpediency of continuing the Exchequer; is it your opinion that if all the public money of every description were required to be paid into the Exchequer, it would not afford an important check upon the expenditure of the public money?—I think that the whole of the public treasure should be deposited in the Exchequer, and that it should be paid in in gross, and it is nearly so now. You have only to provide by a vote for the superannuations of the revenue departments, and to transfer either to the consolidated fund or to the votes the few remaining charges for the judicial establishment in Scotland, which are charged upon the excise revenue, and to provide for the redemption of the hereditary pensions, and you have nothing left chargeable on revenue. The gross revenue would go into the Exchequer then as a matter of course, and the payments would be voted out.

1443. Do you conceive that under such a system, all the public money being paid into the Exchequer, the Exchequer would not afford a considerable check upon the expenditure of the public money?—No; and I have given you reasons rather fuller, perhaps, than the Committee may have considered necessary, to show that that supposed check is not a check. The check should be upon the application of the money, and not upon the issue of it.

1444. You have mentioned the sum of three millions and a half, under the term of Imprest Accounts; will you state what the nature of those amounts are?—The Paymaster-general is only one of about 2,000 persons who pay away the naval and military votes; all storekeepers, agents of regiments, paymasters, and all functionaries carrying on the public service either at home or abroad, in the dockyards, and elsewhere, are imprest accountants for the departments under which they act. They receive advances, say, a sum sufficient for a month's expenditure, and that advance is paid by the Paymaster-general, and is deposited in the chest of those different officers; at the time it is issued its appropriation is not known; it is issued in anticipation, and it is charged in the accounts under the general term of "Imprests." And, subsequently, the accounts of the expenditure of those imprests are furnished to the department, and upon those accounts the appropriation of that money is charged against the different votes in the department under which those officers are acting.

1445. Mr. Cardwell.] If the miscellaneous votes only received the sanction of Parliament in the month of August, and it be intended for a service which would occupy some time to carry into effect, you would not be able probably to close the transaction by the 31st of March?—No; in that case you should only take the money required, from August to March.

1446. You would then have to vote in the succeeding year another sum, so that there would be two votes of supply, for which, from the nature of the case, it would have been more natural to take one?—Yes; under Class 7 there are numerous services of that description, and that is one of the difficulties which I have pointed out in the paper to which I referred.

1447. So that if, in order to carry your principle into effect, we increase the number of votes, that would strengthen your argument for consolidating the system of votes, and thereby diminishing the number?—It would, certainly.

1448. So as to prevent an inconvenient increase of the whole number of votes to be taken in Supply?—Yes; I think that the votes are unnecessarily subdivided. W. G. Anderson, Esq. 12 June 1856.

1449. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] In the answer which you gave to the Honourable Member for Lambeth, was it not your meaning that the sums voted should be consolidated; for instance, instead of taking three votes for 20,000*l.* each, you should take one vote for 60,000*l.*, but that the same information, or even fuller information, as to the different items, should be afforded to Parliament?—Precisely.

1450. Chairman.] With regard to the re-votes, is not that a matter of constant occurrence in the Navy Service?—Constantly; where the principle of payments within the year obtains.

1451. Whatever inconvenience might exist as to the Ordnance, and the Navy, it exists to a great extent now?—Yes; more especially under the votes for works. Votes are taken for certain works; which it is found afterwards, perhaps, owing to a bad season or other circumstances, or to delays in the purchase of property, cannot be carried on as rapidly as was expected, and it is necessary to cancel a portion of the Votes, and to re-vote them in the following year.

1452. Sir James Graham.] What is the greatest number of years in which there has been an accumulating balance of account in the Miscellaneous Estimates; is it six or seven?—I think we have unexpended votes from the year 1841. Within the last two years we have tried to reduce the unissued votes to three years.

1453. Could you furnish an account of the number of votes, with the respective sums unissued upon each?—Yes, very readily.

1454. Could the Treasury furnish, under the respective heads of Miscellaneous Votes, those upon which there are sums voted and unissued, the number of years of each, and the amount of each?—Yes.

1455. Chairman.] When you recommend the diminution of the number of votes in Supply, I suppose you say that without reference to the convenience or inconvenience of discussion in the House of Commons?—The House of Commons would have precisely the same information placed before them, and they could discuss the items with just the same facility as they now do.

THE RIGHT HON. SIR FRANCIS BARING, BART., IN THE CHAIR.

William George Anderson, Esq., called in; and further Examined.

1456. Chairman.] CERTAIN parts of the expenditure by the Revenue Departments are now voted by Parliament, are they not?—Yes; all the charges for collection and management are voted. W. G. Anderson, Esq. 16 June 1856.

1457. You have stated, have you not, that it would be advisable that the whole, with the exception of the drawbacks, should be voted by Parliament?—I think so.

1458. At the present moment there is no Report of the Audit Board, similar to that which is made on the Navy and Army Expenditure, as to the appropriation of those Votes?—No, there is not.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

16 June 1856.

1459. Is it not the case that those accounts are audited now by the Audit Board?—Yes.

1460. There would be no more difficulty in their making the same return to Parliament as in the case of the army and other great services?—Not the slightest. I do not see why the Audit Board should not at once undertake the same investigation of that account, as to appropriation, as they do for the Army and Navy; it could be done at once, without an Act of Parliament.

1461. They could make the same return without any difficulty whatever, could they not?—Without the smallest difficulty.

1462. Do not you think that that would be an improvement in checking the public expenditure, as to the appropriation of the Votes?—It would be an additional security to Parliament for the due application of those Votes. The Treasury, in their Minute, which was founded on Mr. Gladstone's Act, directed the department to prepare an annual account, in order that it might be laid before Parliament; but there was no Legislative authority for submitting the appropriation of those Votes to the investigation of the Audit Board, and it was not carried out; but I see no reason whatever against it.

1463. There is no account of that kind, is there, prepared for the Treasury?—Yes, it appears in the Finance Accounts; it is a new account, and was introduced into the Finance Accounts last year, for the first time.

1464. Has that appeared before Parliament?—Yes; but it is not an account certified by the auditors.

1465. You see no objection, but an advantage, in having the same return with regard to those Votes as is given for the Votes of the great services?—Certainly I think it should be done, in order to bring these accounts under the same system of control.

1466. And with regard to the balances in those revenue departments, there is a certain balance, is there not, kept back by the different revenue departments for the current expenditure?—Yes.

1467. How is that balance fixed?—Their instructions are to keep the balances as low as they can, and the Treasury has periodical returns of the balances. The amount must be fixed with reference to the demands for drawbacks, which nobody can foresee but themselves.

1468. Are they allowed to keep a certain balance, or do they apply from time to time for what they require?—They reserve what, in their own judgment, they consider right, because the amount must fluctuate very much. There may be a very large demand for drawbacks that the Treasury cannot know of, and it would be unsafe to fix a limit which might at times be under the proper sum required.

1469. The Committee have had before them the case of 250,000*l.* of public money, which was deducted from the gross revenue, and paid for a special service; could that be done without the orders of the Treasury, or must there have been special orders to keep back certain amounts?—Special orders were given by the Treasury. The departments were directed to make the payments, they were consequently compelled to cease paying in revenue to the Exchequer until they had accumulated a sufficient sum for that payment.

1470. Is there any return to the Exchequer of the gross revenue received, and the balances in the different revenue private chests?—There is no return of that kind made to the Exchequer.

1471. There being no return, of course that payment was entirely unknown to the Comptroller of the Exchequer?—Precisely.

1472. He might be considered the proper officer for that purpose by Parliament, but Parliament was unaware of that expenditure?—The Comptroller-general of the Exchequer could know nothing of that expenditure, any more than he does of payments for drawbacks, or any other charge upon the gross revenue.

1473. If there had been a return of the balances kept back by that particular revenue department, though he would not have known the purpose of the payment, he would, at any rate, have known of the large balance kept back, and the payments made?—He would have been aware of the balance retained.

1474. So far it would of necessity have brought it before Parliament, in case any return of that kind had been called for?—Yes.

1475. Suppose his returns by law had been laid before Parliament, that would would have shown it at once?—The Treasury return of income and expenditure is the first in which it would appear before Parliament; it was in this quarterly return that the item first appeared. The return from the Comptroller is only an annual return.

1476. That was the case with regard to the last payment, was it not?—I am speaking of the last payment.

1477. There were other payments, were there not?—Yes. In 1853 there was one out of the Excise and another out of the capital of the Land Revenue.

1478. With regard to that payment out of the Excise, did it appear in the quarterly return of that year?—No; it appeared in the Finance Accounts; that was the first return in which it appeared.

1479. When did it come into the hands of Members?—Probably about May, or the early part of June, 1854.

1480. Would it have been printed at that time?—Yes; I am referring to the period before the alteration of the financial year. The financial year was not altered till after the 1st April 1854.

1481. It would not have appeared except in the Finance Accounts?—No; but the Treasury thought, on the last occasion, that it was more correct to give Parliament the earliest information of this payment, and it was introduced into the account showing the income and the expenditure of the year ending on the preceding quarter day.

1482. Those balances are in the hands of separate treasurers, are they not?—They stand to the credit of the different receivers-general at the Bank of England.

1483. Can you state the great inconvenience that arises, and the great expense from the separation, and from having different accounts, and does not that objection exist as much with regard to those revenue accounts as to the other accounts?—I believe the revenue balances are consolidated. You cannot go beyond the limits of the department in the consolidation of balances. It is desirable to consolidate the balances of departments as far as possible, but you cannot consolidate balances which are operated upon by different departments. You cannot consolidate the cash balances of the Customs and Inland Revenue Departments, for instance, but you may consolidate all the Customs balances in one, and the Inland Revenue in one.

1484. What is the practice with regard to the application of the money issued for those votes; is it issued to the Paymaster-general?—No; it is issued direct to the Receiver-general of the different branches of the revenue.

1485. The money being issued direct to the Customs, when it is once in the hands of the Receiver-general of the Customs it cannot be applied to any other department, can it?—No; it is paid back into the Exchequer the same day under its proper head of revenue.

1486. There is no power of applying any of that money either to the Inland Revenue or the Post-office?—No, there is no such power; it is under the control of the Board of Customs.

1487. It is appropriated to a particular service?—Yes, it is appropriated to reimburse to the revenue the advances made for charges of collection.

1488. There is a power now in the Customs, is there not, of applying it from one vote to another, but no power for applying it to any other service?—They have no power of applying it to any service but the service of the Customs.

1489. You are aware of the French system, are you not, with respect to the pay and receipt; and they carry it to a certain extent of division between the pay and the receipt?—I believe the Finance Department in France takes charge both of receipt and of payment.

1490. But they carry to a great extent, do they not, even in the provinces, the distinction between the receiver and the payer, who pays everything?—No, I think those duties are consolidated, but the distinction which they draw is this, that the ordonnateur, the person who authorises the payment, cannot be the person who makes it, and they carry that throughout the whole of their system; the pecuniary charge is never vested in the person who has the power to authorise the disbursements; the French carry that throughout their system.

1491. Are you not aware of this, that Dr. Bowring and Sir Henry Parnell objected very much to the same persons in the ports receiving and paying the public money?—I am not aware of that; the practice pervades the whole of our system.

16 June 1856.

1492. Yes; but was not it considered at the time and very much objected to?—The point, I think, which they dwelt upon was the one that I have mentioned; they objected strongly to any person having authority to order the payment of money, who was also a paymaster and held the moneys in his charge.

1493. But is there not such an officer as a receiver in the different financial districts in France, and a payer quite distinct?—No doubt there are numerous officers, because the duties are so heavy that they furnish employment for different classes of persons; I rather think that in the departments the Treasury functionaries are charged both with the receipt and the payment of money, but the distinction between the ordonnateur and the payeur is carried through their system.

1494. With regard to the Navy payments for their stores, you have explained how that payment is made; how often are those payments from the revenue of the Navy for old stores made to the Exchequer?—Every three months the proceeds of the sales of old stores appear in the accounts of the naval storekeepers, which are only rendered to the Admiralty quarterly; the Admiralty collect the whole of the receipts in their books, and give a quarterly authority for the transfer of the amount to the Exchequer.

1495. It is as often as the accounts are settled at the Admiralty?—It is regulated by the period of the returns.

1496. Is there any information given to the Exchequer of the sum which is paid in; I understand that the Paymaster-general is their banker to pay in to the Exchequer, or to the Bank, on account of the Exchequer, the proceed of the old stores quarterly?—Precisely.

1497. Is there any notice sent to the comptroller of the amount directed to be paid in?—A notice is sent to the Comptroller from the Pay Office.

1499. The Comptroller is not at all aware of the sums that he is to receive?—No, except from the advices which he receives from the Bank and the revenue departments.

1500. He is informed of what sum is paid in, but he does not know that that is the right sum?—No.

1501. Would it not be more regular that there should be some announcement on the part of the department paying in of the sum to be received?—There is no deficiency in that respect, but the advice is after payment.

1502. Is there not a perfect power in the Pay-office to detain the sum in their hands?—They could not do that, because they are under the control of the department that directs the payment. For instance: the Admiralty directs the Paymaster-general to pay a certain sum to the Exchequer. The Paymaster-general has to furnish to the Admiralty a weekly list of all his payments, and if the order is not executed, the Admiralty immediately want to know why that payment has not been made; therefore, there is that check upon him, and the audit check comes afterwards. The Paymaster would have no object in delaying to act upon the order of the Admiralty.

1503. But the Paymaster might apply it to any other services, if he had it in his hands?—He can only apply the money under authorities given to him by other departments.

1504. Still it would have the effect of a loan pro tempore, if he kept it for another three months, would it not?—He has to draw money from the Exchequer, to enable him to make the payment, and he might not pay it back again.

1505. Then pro tempore he might apply it to another service, might he not?—He would be under the check of the department in that matter, and I do not see how he could do it without its being discovered. I do not see what object he would have in doing so; his only duty is, to see that the departments keep within the limits of their credits.

1506. But with regard to the re-payment of old stores, are there any distinct rules as to what are to be repaid, and what are not to be repaid?—That rests with the departments.

1507. Are

1507. Are there not difficulties upon the subject; does the Treasury lay down any rule as to what is to be considered liable to repayment and what is not liable to repayment?—The repayment would be for any sale of old stores whatever; it would embrace also unserviceable stores; there might be a difference of opinion as to supplies made from one department to another.

1508. If I sell two old ships and get the money, that is a repayment, is it not?—There is no question about it, and it would go into the Exchequer.

1509. If the First Lord of the Admiralty exchanged two ships for another, how does that come into the account?—Unless it assumed the form of a cash transaction, it would not appear in the account at all.

1510. If I were to supply a foreign government with a certain number of muskets, and they were to pay me the money, that would be a sale, and it would appear?—The Ordnance Department, I believe, carry all those to the credit of their votes, because they replace the articles furnished; if it was a supply of unserviceable articles, or articles not required to be replaced, the receipts would be paid at once to the Exchequer as surplus monies.

1511. If you were to supply a foreign government with a certain number of muskets, and were paid for them, would not that appear as a payment?—It would appear in the account as a supply to a foreign government, and that repayment would go to the credit of the vote out of which the monies must be taken to replace that supply, and not to the Exchequer, otherwise the department would lose so much of its vote.

1512. The money that arose from that would be applied to the purchase of fresh muskets?—Yes.

1513. As to the sale of old materials; of course that is carried to the Exchequer, is it not?—Yes.

1514. If I had work to perform, and the bargain included the use of old materials, how would that appear?—I believe in all those cases the value of the old materials, if purchased and paid for by the contractor, would go to the Exchequer; every item of that kind passes through the accounts, and the documents are submitted to the Audit Board, and they watch these receipts pretty closely to see that no monies are retained by the department which ought to go to the Exchequer; that is a part of their duty in carrying on the Appropriation Audit.

1515. I do not doubt that the Audit Office does its duty properly, but I wish to ascertain whether there are any rules as to those repayments. If I were required to rebuild a shed, and I agreed with a party to rebuild that shed for a certain sum, he taking the old materials, how would that be done?— In a case of that kind a vote would only be taken for the nett expense; if you worked up the old materials, Parliament would only be asked on the estimate of the department for the nett cost which would be incurred; in that case the old materials would be absorbed.

1516. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] It would be in the nature of a repair rather than of a new construction?—Yes, and that goes on to a great extent in repairing ships. The old material is brought into use, and the charge in the accounts is so much less.

1517. Chairman.] Suppose you were to rebuild a public store, and there were old materials, how would that appear?—That would depend upon the conditions of the contract. If the contract were made for a nett sum, the nett sum only would appear as the expense of the building.

1518. I see with regard to the Commissariat account which was under discussion the other night, it is stated, that in the Commissariat Chest Account there is a "Loss arising from the settlement in this country of the East India Company's claims in respect of bills drawn upon India and specie remitted from India, for the service of the chest at Hong Kong; and also upon consignments of dollars sent to that station from this country, 4,008 l. 18 s. 9 d.; deduct nett premium on negotiation of bills, &c., in 1854-55, 1,375 l. 7 s. 2¾*d.*;" how is that consistent with your general practice?—This is a profit and loss account; there is a gain upon one bill and a loss upon another. You only ask Parliament to grant the nett loss. The premium on bills may vary throughout the year; to-day there may be a small discount paid, and to-morrow a premium; it is on the settlement of the two sides of the account at the end of the year, that you strike a balance and ask Parliament to make good the deficiency.

16 June 1856.

1519. Supposing the balance in your favour, that would go into the Exchequer, would it not?—Yes; there is generally a balance on that account, and sometimes a very large one, and it is invariably paid into the Exchequer.

1520. In olden times it was not so, was it?—It then remained in the Commissariat Chest fund.

1521. Have you any other payments which are made from independent parties, who do not use you as their bankers, into the Exchequer?—Very few, I think. There was a payment of that kind very lately; the interest of the Sardinian loan was paid to the Paymaster-general, and by him subsequently into the Exchequer.

1522. It would be more correctly paid at once into the Exchequer, would it not?—It would have been paid direct, but the form in which it was remitted would have made it very inconvenient; it was remitted in 37 different bills at all sorts of dates, payable in different places. The Paymaster-general is the officer of the Treasury who is employed in collecting those monies, and when they are recovered, in paying them into the Exchequer. I do not think that the Exchequer would have taken charge of the bills at all; they will take charge of the money, but the Exchequer has not usually been employed in collecting monies.

1523. Are there any other payments of that class?—Very few; all the parties for whom the Paymaster-general makes payments into the Exchequer are parties who have dealings with him.

1524. The East India Company pay direct to the Exchequer, do they not?—For one service only; most of the sums received from the East India Company belong to the departments, and they are not paid into the Exchequer at all.

1525. They go into the Cash Balance?—Yes; they go into the Cash Balance, to the credit of the Votes; they are generally for supplies.

1526. They are repayments for advances, are they not?—Yes; repayments for advances made by the different departments.

1527. Have there been payments on account of the China war from the East India Company to the Government; and if so, can you give the Committee an account of those?—There is a large unsettled claim between the Government and the East India Company at this time, on account of the China war; there has been a difference of opinion as to the principle on which the charge should be computed. The East India Company charged the Government with the whole expense, but the Government demurred to that charge on the ground that they were only chargeable with the extraordinary expenses. That is a matter which has been debated between the Treasury and the East India Company for a considerable time. I believe it is now approaching a settlement.

1528. Can you give the Committee an account of the payments which have been already made?—The payments made to the East India Company have been the amounts voted by Parliament from time to time since 1841; an account of these could be given.

1529. Have they been specifically voted by Parliament for the East India Company, or have payments been made from other funds?—The East India Company have received no monies but those voted by Parliament specially for the expense of the China war, and some incidental local receipts arising from the sale of prize property, &c.

1530. There would be no difficulty in giving an account of that?—None at all.

1532. But to whom is the loan made?—There is a loan, but there are also the other receipts to which I have referred. The interest of the loan is paid generally direct to the Exchequer; there is only one instance in which that was not done, and that was done at the request of the parties. They had two payments to make, and they received an order to pay them both into the same office; those are monies which the Chamberlain of the City of London collects. I believe they are a portion of the coal duties, which are received in payment of the loans made for metropolis improvements. Under the Act of Parliament, the Chamberlain is required to make those payments quarterly to the Board of Works, and he pays them to their account with the Paymaster-general on orders from the Board, and they are transferred periodically to the Exchequer.

1533. Is there any difficulty in paying them direct into the Exchequer?—Yes; the Act of Parliament does not permit it, but directs them to be first paid to the Board of Works.

1534. If the Board of Works direct them to be paid into the Exchequer, what then?—It could be done, but as the Office of Works has to account for these monies, they ought properly to pass through the accounts of that department.

1535. Practically used they not to be paid direct into the Exchequer, and was not the practice altered?—I believe that they have uniformly been paid to the Board of Works, or to the Paymaster-general.

1536. Did not the Board of Works pay direct into the Exchequer?—When they had their own monies at the Bank they paid direct, but now they have no cash account at the Bank; their monies are held by the Paymaster-general, and they pay through him as their banker.

1537. With regard to the Woods and Forests, how do they pay; they are a revenue department?—They have their own account at the Bank; the Paymaster-general only pays their salaries, which are voted.

1538. They pay direct?—Yes, direct from their own bank account to that of the Exchequer.

1539. The Committee have heard something about the capital account of the Woods and Forests?—There are two accounts of the Woods and Forests; the capital account, which belongs to the Crown, is made up of monies derived from the sale of lands, or any receipt affecting the corpus of the estate; and there is a Revenue account which belongs to the public, and the nett balance of which is paid into the Exchequer as revenue derived from that property.

1540. But what becomes of the interest of that capital account?—The interest of any monies invested forms part of the Revenue account, but the capital account, which consists partly of stock and partly of cash, is applied to those purposes which are defined in the Act of Parliament, the purchase of estates, redemption of land tax, and other charges on the Crown property.

1541. The Committee have heard of an advance made by the Turkish Government for certain stores bought for them by the Admiralty; 150,000 l. was the amount of the advance, was it not?—The sum deposited by the Turkish Government was, I believe, at first 130,000 l., and I believe they deposited a subsequent sum which brought it to 150,000 l., or 160,000 l.

1542. Was the advance in the Paymaster-general's hands?—The money was deposited to the credit of the Admiralty with the Paymaster.

1543. Where did it go to; was it put into your cash balance?—It went into the cash balance to the credit of the naval monies generally; the account was kept solely with the Admiralty, as the disposal of the money rested exclusively with them.

1544. Being in the cash balance, you had directions, had you not, to diminish your cash balances as much as possible?—Yes.

1545. Am I right in supposing that that sum would therefore have gone into your drawing account?—Precisely, as soon as possible.

1546. And would have been then liable to be drawn on for any other service for which it might have been required?—Yes, for any service payable from the drawing account. The practical effect would be, that until that 150,000*l.* was applied, less would be drawn for naval services.

1547. That might probably have been its effect?—Yes.

1548. Might it not have the operation at the time of being a loan of 150,000 l. to the navy?—Yes; so long as any portion of that money remained unexpended for the objects for which it was deposited, it would go to increase the balance of the naval monies in the Exchequer; or if the navy chose to get themselves into a difficulty, and spent it, they would have been short of funds to fulfil the objects for which the money was intrusted to them.

1549. It placed the 150,000 l. at the disposal of the Admiralty for a time, did it not?—Yes, for a short time.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

16 June 1856.

1550. So far as the account goes, that was without any knowledge of Parliament?—Yes; that was done at the request of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and with the knowledge and consent of the Treasury.

1551. Will you state to the Committee how the matter stands with regard to the balances at the disposal of the Paymaster; as soon as the issuing letter gives you the credit, the whole of that credit may be drawn upon by the Paymaster as he finds it necessary for the public service, may it not?—The whole of it may be drawn upon in compliance with the orders he has received from the different departments.

1552. Then is that deducted from the general balance of the Exchequer; those sums which are placed to the credit of the several Exchequer credits?—The Exchequer credits when drawn from the Exchequer are charged in the Exchequer accounts as issues for the public service, and are considered as final issues by the Exchequer, and as so much money withdrawn from the control of the Exchequer.

1553. But practically, they are not actual payments; they are only powers to you to draw to a certain amount?—They are, and that was the reason why I mentioned on the last occasion that I thought it was a defect in principle, but the Exchequer have no discretion in that matter; the Act of Parliament is imperative; they are bound by the 24th clause of the Exchequer Act to consider all such issues as payments, and charge them in the public accounts as such; the Treasury in the balance sheet which they prepare every quarter, are bound to follow the same principle, and it is a very faulty one.

1554. Are you quite sure that there was not some mistake in the wording of that clause?—I think not; it was discussed at the time.

1555. Reading that report, do not you believe that the intention of the Commissioners, and possibly of those who framed the Act, was, that the whole of the monies in the Exchequer should be retained upon the general account until the actual payments were made?—No doubt; but that question refers to the practice of drawing upon the Exchequer account separately instead of writing off into the drawing account; but the clause to which I refer relates to the first grant of the credit. When once the Exchequer grants a credit, that credit must be charged in the accounts as expenditure. I had frequent conversations with Mr. Brooksbank on this point. He said that it was well considered, and he objected to it; but the Commissioners insisted upon credits and not payments. The question that the Honourable Member is referring to is that monies should be left on the account of the Exchequer, and that the parties who have to draw should make their cheques payable on that account, so that any balance of Exchequer credit which remained would appear on the Comptroller's account, instead of appearing in the drawing account of the Paymaster; but that does not touch the provisions of the clause, which lays down the principle upon which the public accounts should be kept.

1556. You have spoken of the disadvantage of having large balances; when you speak of large balances, you allude, do you not, to the disadvantage of taking from the general account of the Exchequer any sums of money?—No; because it would be still a large balance, whether it remained on the drawing account of the Paymaster, or whether it remained at his disposal on the Exchequer credit account. If the monies are under his control, he can draw upon them, no matter what the title of the account may be; it is a balance over which he has power, and that I consider is objectionable.

1557. What is the advantage of having a large general account at the Exchequer?—With regard to the Exchequer account, the larger the balance of course the better; you save the interest on deficiency bills; but the objection to having a large balance on the account of any officer who has the power to draw upon it is, that it is unproductive, and that the public money may be exposed to risk by placing a large sum constantly at the disposal of an officer who can use it.

1558. What is the practice in private affairs; suppose a country bank has an account with a bank in town; I believe it is the practice to give interest upon that account; and supposing that to be so, and that a country banker were to give authority to certain parties to draw to a certain amount from that account, would the bankers in London make a separate account for those parties, or would they leave the general balance untouched until the actual sum were were drawn out by the parties so authorised to draw upon it?—I think that they would make a separate account for the amount for which the parties had to draw. I think that would appear to be the more regular course. I understand the question to mean this, whether, if there is a large balance, and a credit is given upon it, the amount of that credit would be transferred to a separate account, or whether it would be left on the general account, and represent the sum which the party was authorised to draw upon.

1559. If it remains in the general account until it is actually drawn out, of course, if interest is given, that interest is given upon the general account?—I do not think that the Bank in question would allow interest upon any but money that remained in deposit.

1560. I ask you whether you know what the general practice is?—No, I do not know what the general practice is as to private banks.

1561. Mr. Hankey.] The only way in which the question of interest could be affected, would be if the Government owed anything on deficiency bills?—If the Government owed anything on deficiency bills, we should write off from the Exchequer account as much as we could, to pay off those bills, and only leave a working balance.

1562. Do not you suppose that that question would depend upon the special agreement made between the banker and the party depositing the money, as to whether interest shall be allowed on general deposits, or whether only upon such as were considered applicable for immediate payments?—No doubt; I should consider the agreement to be the foundation of the payment.

1563. Chairman.] But if an arrangement were made that those Exchequer credits should not be deducted from the general account, that would at once, so far as the deficiency bills are concerned, get rid of the inconvenience of having a great number of Exchequer credits at the Bank?—At present the credits granted to the paymaster never exceed, or rarely exceed, the amount of his daily payments; therefore there would be no difference in the balance. If he drew directly upon the Exchequer credit accounts, there would be a larger general balance left on the accounts. It would be very well if he kept a large constant balance in his hands; that question does not arise when the credits are paid away on the day on which they are granted.

1564. One of the difficulties which you have stated to arise from the separation of the different votes is, that it would of necessity require a much larger issue of Exchequer credits?—Yes.

1565. The inconvenience of the issue of larger Exchequer credits, so far as regards the deficiency bills, arises from the practice of the Bank under the Act, of writing off those Exchequer credits from the General Exchequer Account, and of considering them as issues?—I apprehend that the Bank must adopt that course; the moment that a transfer of that kind is ordered, a credit is granted, and it must be kept solely for the purpose for which it was issued. You cannot consider that money as applicable to payments to be made by the Paymaster-general, and applicable also to the payment of deficiency bills; if it is applicable to one service it is not available for the other.

1566. Am I not right in supposing, whether the Bank do it of necessity or not, that that is the reason why the Exchequer General Account would be diminished?—The available balance in the Exchequer would, of course, be diminished by the amount of those unappropriated credits on the paymaster's account.

1567. If the arrangement were so that those credits should not be considered as issued until they were actually paid, that objection would be removed, would it not?—No, they must be considered as issues; for the Comptroller gives credit to the Paymaster. It is a sum taken away from the available fund at the Exchequer, and it is placed at the disposal of another officer; you cannot hold those monies as belonging to the available fund at the Exchequer, and also appropriated to the payments by the Paymaster-general.

1568. Do you think it is impossible?—I do not see how it could safely be done.

1569. Do you think that it would be quite incorrect that there should be a credit granted to a department to draw for a certain sum of money at the time that sum of money was not withdrawn from the general account?—Although not withdrawn it must be appropriated to the object for which it is granted, and that amounts to precisely the same thing. It takes it away from the available fund at the disposal of the Treasury.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

1570. Do you think again that such an arrangement is an impossible arrangement?—I do not see how it can be done; I think it would be an arrangement exposed to considerable risk; either the money must be at the disposal of the Paymaster, or remain at the disposal of the Treasury and the Exchequer; and I cannot conceive how two parties can separately draw on the same balance with safety.

1571. The Paymaster would have the power of drawing upon these several Exchequer credits?—He would have the power, but suppose that the Exchequer or the Treasury considered those credits granted as available, and made another appropriation of them, and drew to the extent of them, and the Paymaster also drew upon the same balance; that balance could not answer the two objects.

1572. How would the Treasury draw for anything else?—If the credits remained on the general fund they would remain applicable to any purposes to which the Treasury might appropriate them, otherwise I do not see what object would be gained.

1573. How would the Treasury order except through the Paymaster, who would be acquainted with the state of matters?—They might order additional credits, say to the Revenue Departments, or any other parties receiving credits besides the Paymaster.

1574. The Treasury are from day to day aware of the state of all the balances at the Bank, are they not?—They are.

1575. They would do it with their eyes open?—The Treasury having granted the credit, could no longer consider that sum as a fund upon which they could draw; it must be considered as appropriated.

1576. You have stated that is impossible to carry out the appropriation to the respective services when the money is once issued into the Paymaster's hands?—Not without an enormous balance, which you would have to appropriate to each separate service.

1577. Will you explain to the Committee what is the present system; are you in the constant habit when you have once got a sum of money into your hands for the army, or the navy, or any other service, of using that money indiscriminately for any service?—As I explained before, the applications are made from day to day, to meet the expected wants of each service, and when once they are written into the drawing account they are made applicable to any services which are called for on that day.

1578. Sir Charles Trevelyan states in his memorandum: "The Paymaster-general, and the Paymaster of Civil Services, habitually use money belonging to one head of service, in making advances for other services, in the ordinary transaction of the daily business of their respective departments." Is that a correct statement?—Quite correct; it must be so, because money is drawn out on estimate in anticipation of payments.

1579. It is not an accidental circumstance, but it is the daily practice?—It must occur every day throughout the year.

1580. With regard to the Duke of Wellington's funeral, will you explain to the Committee what has become of that sum of money; I see that there was issued from the Exchequer on the 1st of April 1853, 10,000 l., and on the 4th of April 1853, 70,000 l., making therefore in the first five days a sum of 80,000 l., which was not only drawn from the Exchequer, but issued to the Paymaster?—Yes, and placed by him into his drawing account. The money remains as a credit on the Paymaster's books, applicable to any payments on account of the service for which it was voted.

1581. I see that in March 1853 you had 14,000 l. paid; that was advanced, was it not, from Civil Contingencies and repaid?—Yes.

1582. In April 9,500 l. was paid, on May the 14th, 13,000 l., and a considerable sum was paid during the first year; what was the sum total actually paid in the first year?—I have not that information; but there is a large sum left.

1583. Between 40,000 l. and 50,000 l. was paid during the first year; will you explain to the Committee on what grounds the Paymaster drew the whole of that 80,000 l. out?—That money was issued by the Treasury to the Paymaster without his application, as it was expected that at that time the claims would absorb the whole; but difficulties arose; a portion of them had to be referred to arbitration, and I believe the whole of the claims are not settled even now; there were a number of disputed claims which considerably delayed the payment; payment; one of those cases submitted to arbitration was only paid, I believe, within the last month; it was a claim of Mr. Cubitt's; but there is no doubt that the credit was issued upon wrong information, and at an earlier period than was required.

1584. There being a sum of about 15,000 l. which you know was due, the issue was for 80,000 l.?—It was issued by the Treasury, not on the application of the Paymaster.

1585. When was it that the Paymaster drew the money into his hands?—It was issued to the Paymaster on the days on which the credits were granted by the Exchequer.

1586. It was placed at the disposal of the Paymaster as Exchequer credits on the 1st and on the 4th of April; 80,000 l. was the Exchequer credit on those days, but it required the Paymaster-general's own action upon the Exchequer credits before that money could come into his account?—The Paymaster would place the money into his drawing account; he is not permitted to keep any idle balances; he must place it in his drawing account and use it; he opens a credit for that service in his books, and takes care that it is not used for any purposes not voted by Parliament, or for any services which have not a credit in the Exchequer to represent those advances.

1587. There was no power in the Paymaster to help himself?—No; he must use that money, in order that the public may not lose the interest of it.

1588. What became of it then; it went first into the Exchequer credit accounts, did it not?—Yes.

1589. From thence it went to the drawing account?—Yes; it was applied to the general services, to any services that came in on the day on which it was written in.

1590. Until it was all advanced?—Yes; and the account of the Duke of Wellington's funeral remained in credit for the unexpended amount of that vote; I should mention that this was quite an exceptional case.

1591. What is your practice with reference to the Miscellaneous Estimates; when are you in the habit of placing them to your credit in the Exchequer?—The moment that they are received.

1592. Are they placed from the Exchequer to your Exchequer credits accounts in one lump sum, or from time to time?—From time to time throughout the month we apply for the various services, and they are written into the drawing account on the days on which they are applied for.

1593. You draw as you find that it is wanted?—Yes; and we take care, as far as possible, that every account is in credit at the close of the month.

1594. Your account does not give the balances of former years, does it?—No; this is the whole of the cash together. The other account, which Sir James Graham has called for, will show that, but there are balances on the account of former years.

1595. Are there any large sums outstanding for former years; you had got in the Pay Office, in the years 1841-42, 2,400 l.?—Yes; that was the balance of a vote for public walks; it was issued to the Paymaster by the Treasury, to enable the Treasury to close their Supply and Ways and Means accounts of back years.

1596. There was a large sum in 1851-52, but in 1852-53 there was the sum of 11,400 l. in the Paymaster's hands?—Yes; 10,000 l. of that sum relates to New Zealand, and it is expected that the colony has claims upon it, and it was issued to the Paymaster to await the settlement of those claims.

1597. It is in the Paymaster's hands waiting the settlement of the claims?—Yes; and when those are finally settled, if there is any surplus of that money it will revert to the Exchequer.

1598. Why have you drawn it out until it is wanted?—It was drawn out to close those numerous years in the finance accounts which stood open; it has been the Treasury practice for many years to place those old balances, which are generally of small amount, in the hands of the Paymaster, to await the final settlement of claims, and at the expiration of a certain period they are repaid into the Exchequer.

1599. The only effect of withdrawing it would be to withdraw it from the finance accounts, where the balance would have appeared, and Parliament would have seen it, into the Paymaster's account, where it would not appear as a balance, and Parliament would not have seen it unless it had been called called for?—There is some reason for it, as it enables the Treasury to close their Ways and Means accounts and the Supply accounts, which are very complicated when kept open for a series of years?—It is an old Treasury practice. The Paymaster does not apply for those sums, but they are placed in his hands as deposits, which he holds at the disposal of the Treasury.

16 June 1856.

1600. In 1853-54, there was 77,653 l. which was surrendered?—Those were balances which the Treasury thought there was no further claim upon, and therefore they directed them to be made savings.

1601. Those were in the Exchequer?—Yes.

1602. In 1854-55 I see 56,000 l.; is that correct?—Yes; the greater part of that sum was for the Duke of Wellington's funeral; it is money remaining on that vote.

1603. Unless it had accidentally happened to have been mentioned in the House of Commons, it would not have been known that any balance had remained from the vote for the Duke of Wellington's funeral?—No, it would not have been known; but this shows how necessary it is that the principle of making up the public accounts from credits should be altered, because if you made up your accounts from the actual payments, you would have seen that balance every year; we must have shown not only the balance in the Exchequer, but the whole balance wherever it was; that requires alteration.

1604. You have stated that it is the constant habit, and that you consider it quite right, to use the monies in the Pay-office indiscriminately; you were asked by Sir James Graham whether, if the Exchequer control were taken away, the power would not be lost which the House of Commons possesses by refusing supplies in certain cases, and preventing the dissolution of Parliament; suppose that Parliament had voted Supplies for the Army and not for the Navy, and that Parliament is dissolved under the old system, no monies could be issued for the Navy if applications were made to the Comptroller of the Exchequer, not a sixpence could be issued for the naval service?—There being no monies in the Exchequer, there could be no issue, of course.

1605. But under the present system you might have drawn the whole of the Army Vote, and issued it for the Navy services when you liked?—No, I think not.

1606. Why not?—Because, whether monies are placed in the hands of two paymasters or one, there is no greater facility granted for that, because the monies can only be applied by the departments to which they belong. For instance, if the Admiralty drew upon the Paymaster for any naval service, and there were no funds there, the Paymaster-general would at once tell the Admiralty, "I have no assets, and you cannot draw upon the Army Grants; you have no authority to do so."

1607. Supposing you received an order from the Treasury to do it, what would be done then?—Then I put the other case and say, suppose the Treasury ordered a transfer from one department to another, or if the Minister for War placed, by a transfer order, a portion of his monies at the disposal of the Admiralty; it could be done then, but the transaction is very improbable.

1608. That has been the ground of an impeachment, has it not?—So I think the other would be.

1609. But it is done every day?—It is never done for any service that has not a credit in the Exchequer; and if the Navy were to order a payment by the Paymaster in excess of his credit in the Exchequer, it would not be made.

1610. Are you not in the habit of paying monies for services, where there is no credit in the Exchequer for them?—No; I am referring to the balance in the Exchequer.

1611. When there is a balance in the Exchequer, do you mean to say that you never advance monies for services not voted by Parliament?—I am not aware of any case in which money has been advanced for services not voted by Parliament excepting those cases I mentioned the other day, in which some votes for those great services may remain to be taken, and that the payments are made out of other votes which have been taken for the same department.

1612. If a part of the Navy Votes were voted, you would have no difficulty?—If Parliament had voted any monies at all for the Navy, of course they would be applicable to all the naval services, and that is done every year when the whole of the votes are not passed before the 1st April.

1614. Would the Paymaster of the Forces refuse to obey an order from the Treasury?—It would be disallowed in his accounts if he did.

1615. Would the Paymaster of the Forces refuse to obey an order from the Treasury?—I should think that he would.

1616. Who is he; by what tenure does he hold his office?—The Paymaster-general, of course, is one of the political officers of the Government.

1617. If the Government wanted to dissolve Parliament, probably he is not the man to throw much difficulty in the way?—No.

1618. He is not a Parliamentary officer, but a Government officer?—He is a member of the Government.

1619. He is not like the Comptroller of the Exchequer, or the Auditor; he is an executive officer?—Precisely. I admitted, in answer to a question which was put to me the other day, that the Exchequer provides, in that case, a check upon a dissolution where the supplies have not been granted, but that, I said, was a constitutional question beyond me.

1620. I wanted to ascertain whether the same difficulty does not exist under your present practice, which was suggested to you, supposing you got rid of the Exchequer entirely?—If you get rid of the Exchequer entirely, that is a point that is to be provided for.

1621. If you get rid of the Exchequer entirely it would be extremely easy; as the Exchequer at present exists there is an additional check, but in practice it still might be done?—I do not admit that in practice it could be done without collusion between the different departments.

1622. That is to say, the Government, acting in a body, might do it?—Yes; but those payments would not be made by proper authority. The army grants can only be applied under a Royal warrant, and the navy grants can only be drawn upon according to Act of Parliament.

1623. When would it be brought before Parliament in the shape of audit?—I am not referring to the appropriation audit, but the ordinary audit of the Paymaster-general's account. He sends in his accounts and vouchers to the auditors monthly, and they would see that the payments had been made under proper authorities; and if they found that the Paymaster had been paying out of the Army Votes upon authorities issued by the naval department, it would be shown that he had made a payment upon a wrong authority.

1625. If they received an order from the Treasury to admit that payment, what then?—Whether the auditors would do that, I cannot say; they could not I think set aside the Act of Parliament.

1626. Sir James Graham.] It appears that on the 31st of March 1856 you had in the Pay-office 370,640 l. to the credit of the Paymaster; if there had been no naval vote to carry on the naval service during the period of a dissolution for somewhere about 40 days, and it was represented by the Accountant-general of the Navy that 370,645 l. would carry on the service for those 40 days, this being the balance of the miscellaneous services, would it be possible by an order of the Treasury to apply that 370,645 l. to naval services?—It would be possible, if the Paymaster got sufficient authority to authorise him to use those monies; but all those monies are already appropriated to other services, and other monies must be provided immediately for those services.

1627. With regard to Miscellaneous Estimates, the practice you have admitted to be imperfect as it now stands, the audit inefficient, and the period of voting inconsistent with the strict appropriation; is it not the practice now, for instance, to pay the July salaries of the civil service when the vote has not been taken?—I do not recollect a case in which the votes have not been taken before the 1st of July, but I recollect cases in which salaries have been stopped for want of a vote at an earlier period.

1628. If salaries have been paid by anticipation, what is there stronger in paying salaries by anticipation out of Miscellaneous Estimates before a vote has been taken, than applying the balance of the Miscellaneous Estimates to meet the exigencies of a dissolution to either the naval or the military service?—If the Treasury directed the transfer of all monies at their disposal to the credit of the navy, I do not know whether the Paymaster-general would be authorised to refuse; that is a question which has never arisen, and which I have never considered.

16 June 1856.

1629. Chairman.] I see that Lord Monteagle states in his memorandum, "In this manner payments may be made, first, for services not voted by Parliament, or sanctioned by statute;" he does not state that the thing is done; but is it the fact that it could be done?—It could be done if the Treasury were unfaithful to its trust, there is no doubt.

1630. He says further, "For services for which no Ways and Means have been provided, and which cannot therefore legally be defrayed;" can that be done?—If they were not voted, there would be no Ways and Means.

1631. "For services respecting which no Royal order, Treasury warrant, and issuing letter, have ever issued, or, if issued, have never been sanctioned by the Exchequer as regular and conformable to law;" can that be done?—That is the same question; all those documents hang together.

1632. "For services for which no Exchequer warrant to the Bank of England has issued, directing a credit to the Paymaster for this particular service, or head of service;" that not only can be done, but is done?—As to the Exchequer credits it is done; every payment is made when it is called for.

1633. You have stated, I think, in one of your answers, that you agree with Lord Monteagle, and there is this passage in your remarks, "The Comptroller-general very properly remarks, 'The law and the practice should assuredly be brought into exact conformity; the one should be repealed, or the other reformed;'" are the Committee to understand from you that you think that the practice and the law are in conformity?—The practice and the law are not in strict conformity, and I stated that I agreed with Lord Monteagle that these differences should not exist, but I thought that the law was wrong, and he thought that the practice was wrong.

1634. You have stated that you think the attempt to carry out the law was visionary?—I think so.

1635. Do you think that there has been an effort on the part of the Treasury to carry out the views of the Legislature so far as they could go, or have they, in the course that they have pursued, considered that the Act was impracticable, and followed their own views in the conduct of the business?—I think that the views of the Treasury have been to carry out the Act as far as possible, consistently with the great object of placing the public monies in security, and carrying on the public service with economy; looking at these points of economy and security, I think that the Treasury have adhered as closely as they could to the provisions of the Act; I think that the statement that I have given the Committee of the balances of the Paymaster proves that clearly.

1636. In the memorandum of Lord Monteagle he requests that the opinion of the law officers of the Crown should be taken, whether certain acts which the Pay-office is in the habit of doing under the sanction of the Treasury were consistent with the law; was the opinion of the law officers taken as to whether those acts which were done were consistent with the law or not?—Not that I am aware of; I never heard of any reference being made to the law officers upon the practical question raised in this paper.

1637. If it had been referred to the law officers, and they had given an opinion that the practice was legal, I presume that would have been forwarded to the Comptroller?—Certainly.

1638. You have advocated entire confidence being placed in the Treasury, and getting rid of the control of the Exchequer altogether; in this case the principal officer has asked that the opinion of the law officers should be taken whether the practices were legal, and it appears that the Treasury have never taken the opinion of the law officers; do you think that ought to inspire greater confidence that the Treasury would be extremely anxious without control to follow the strict law?—If the law, as interpreted by Lord Monteagle, is, as I think it is, impracticable in this case, though I think there was a mistake made in the Act of 1834, the only effect of getting an adverse opinion from the law officers would be to bring the question before Parliament for their decision.

1639. So far as I understood you, you yourself thought that the Act of Parliament and the practice were not in strict conformity?—I took Lord Monteagle's interpretation of the Act to mean that; I do not dispute his interpretation;

it may be the right one, or it may not be; but as the Treasury is bound by the provisions of the Appropriation Act, that is an important Act which they must keep in view.

1640. The Treasury have the Exchequer Act, which is an Act of Parliament?—Yes.

1641. Therefore they are bound by it?—Yes.

1642. Is it not your opinion that the practice is not in strict conformity with that Act?—The practice, as regards the Exchequer, as laid down by the Act, is strictly followed; there is not a word in the Act as to the payments of the Paymaster; but all the forms laid down by the Exchequer Regulation Act are observed, and they are strictly followed, or the Comptroller could not issue the money.

1643. Then why did not the Treasury get the opinion of the law officers that it was legal?—The Treasury were never asked to do it; all the forms are strictly complied with that are laid down in the Exchequer Regulation Act; but what Lord Monteagle states is, that, after the monies have left his charge, and when the Act no longer applies, the principles of the Act are not followed up in the Paymaster's account. Now the Act does not touch the Paymaster in any way; therefore I do not consider that the Treasury are violating the provisions of that Act; and so long as they observe the provisions of the Appropriation Act, they are acting strictly according to the law.

1644. But the Treasury have never asked the law officers whether it was in conformity with the law or not?—No; nor has the question ever been officially brought before them. This paper of Lord Monteagle's was a private paper, incorrect in its facts and inferences, which he circulated amongst various parties.

1645. It was delivered to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, was it not?—Yes, as a private memorandum. It was delivered in at the commencement of the war, when the pressure of the current business was very great, and when any disturbance of a system which had been in practice for several years would have been unsafe.

1646. At the request of the Chancellor of the Exchequer?—Yes; but I believe privately; and unless the Treasury felt that there was a pressing question for the law officers, I do not consider that they would think it necessary to refer to them.

1647. Is it not the constant practice of the public officers to deliver papers privately to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, without making it immediately public papers?—There is no question as to the practice of the Exchequer at all; the Act of Parliament, so far as it affects the Exchequer, is strictly complied with.

1648. But, as put by Lord Monteagle, the question is, whether the practice in the Pay-office is legal or illegal, and he puts it to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to ask that question; but that question, as I understand, has never been asked?—Not that I am aware of; the question was suspended and inquiry deferred owing to the pressure of business occasioned by the war.

1649. There is a memorandum here, delivered in by Sir Charles Trevelyan, and stated by him to be prepared for a Committee of the House of Commons, and Sir Charles Trevelyan there says, in section 23, that the saving of the public money "will be much greater than the mere salaries of the officers of the Exchequer." He states the particular documents which are now necessary, and he gives it to be understood that a considerable saving in these documents would take place if the office was abolished?—I cannot say that I have read all those papers, but I recollect that one.

1650. First it is stated, "A Royal order addressed to the Comptroller-general of the Exchequer, countersigned by the Commissioners of the Treasury;" that may be necessary or unnecessary; but the supplies being granted to Her Majesty, if there was no Comptroller of the Exchequer, there would be some document necessary to be signed by the Queen to grant supplies, would there not?—The Royal order would be necessary.

1651. That would remain?—Yes.

1652. The next is "a Treasury warrant founded on the Royal order, and also addressed to the Comptroller-general of the Exchequer;" I apprehend that the Treasury warrant would not be necessary to the Comptroller of the Exchequer?—No.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

1653. But it would be necessary to the Bank, would it not?—No; there would be no necessity; the Royal order merely names the person who is to have authority over the application of that grant.

1654. You think that the Royal order is sufficient without the Treasury warrant?—Yes; the Treasury warrant merely enables the Comptroller to act.

1655. How could the Bank act without it?—The Bank would act upon a separate issue order; this is not the order upon which any issue takes place.

1656. The warrant is signed by the Lords of the Treasury, is it not?—Yes.

1657. The issuing order is only signed by the Secretary?—Yes, at present it is so.

1658. Whether that be so or not, is it not quite clear that the Commissioners contemplated that it was necessary to have the authority of the Board of Treasury, as separate from the issuing order, which was merely a letter by the Secretary of the Treasury?—The Bank would require from the Lords of the Treasury some power of attorney or deputation, to enable those persons to act upon the accounts who might have authority to draw. There would be an authority, perhaps once for all, and not an authority, as it is here, for each separate vote.

1659. Upon what document would you allow the Bank to issue the money?—The Bank would issue the money upon a document similar to that upon which the Exchequer now issues.

1660. The Exchequer issues upon the Treasury warrant?—That is the general authority; the daily issues are made upon letters signed by the Secretary.

1661. Then you would allow the Bank to issue for all those votes merely upon a direction from the Secretary of the Treasury?—Having previously received authority from the Board to accept that signature.

1662. A general authority?—Yes.

1663. The Treasury warrant is an authority from the Treasury, admitting the Royal order, and passing it on?—Yes.

1664. You would get rid of any authority from the Board of Treasury, leaving it entirely in the hands of one Secretary of the Treasury?—No; with regard to the Bank accounts, I should say that the Treasury would allow no authority to draw but under two signatures. It is not their practice in any case to allow the Bank accounts to be drawn upon without two signatures. There would be an authority from the Board, either a Treasury warrant or a power of attorney; you must have a document authorising the Bank to accept those two signatures.

1665. That, to a certain extent, must still remain?—Yes; you must have the authority.

1666. The next form is a "Monthly estimate of the Paymaster-general;" is that necessary or not necessary?—It is necessary; but that is a very small affair.

1667. There are 12 accounts in the year, are there not?—Yes.

1668. Whether it is large or small, it goes from the Paymaster to the Treasury, and it has nothing to do with the Comptroller?—It is nothing but an estimate to give a knowledge of prospective wants.

1669. Was the Duke of Wellington's funeral included in the monthly estimate?—It is a monthly estimate for a gross sum, so much for the army and so much for the navy.

1670. The next is a "Special application from the Paymaster-general for the particular sums required by him from day to day;" that, if sent in, must go?—It must continue.

1671. Was the Duke of Wellington's funeral included in that?—No; it was issued specially, as I explained before.

1672. The next is "A letter from the Assistant Secretary to the Treasury to the Comptroller-general of the Exchequer, authorising him to grant a credit to the Paymaster-general;" that would be unnecessary so far as regarded the Comptroller-general; the letter must go, but it would go to the Bank?—Yes; you save the operations of the Comptroller's office.

1673. Suppose you got rid of the Comptroller-general; it would not go to the Exchequer, which did not exist, but go to the Bank?—Yes.

1674. The letter would still remain, but go to a different authority?—Yes.

1675. Then, "A letter from the Assistant Secretary to the Treasury to the Paymaster-general, Paymaster-general, advising him of a credit having been given;" that would go still, would it not?—I suppose the authority would pass through the Paymaster, and that would render this advice unnecessary.

1676. You would not surely leave it in the Paymaster's hands; if you wished to have any check at all, you would not send it through him?—Yes, the write-off should be sent through him; there is no objection to that; he could make no improper use of it.

1677. You think that that might be got rid of?—Yes.

1678. "A letter from the Comptroller-general of the Exchequer to the Bank of England, founded on the letter from the Assistant Secretary, directing the Bank to give a credit to the Paymaster-general;" that would be got rid of?—Yes; that would be unnecessary.

1679. "A certificate from the Comptroller of the Exchequer, advising the Paymaster-general of the actual issue of the credit;" that would be got rid of?—Yes.

1680. "An order from the Treasury, or from some one of the naval or military departments, directing the Paymaster-general to make specific payments out of the sum so received by him from the Bank;" that, of course, must remain?—Yes.

1681. Do you think that, having got rid of them, any very great reduction of public labour would be effected?—The more numerous documents would be saved; the Royal orders, and Treasury warrants, are annual documents; the documents discontinued are daily documents.

1682. "A certificate from the Comptroller-general of the Exchequer, advising the Paymaster-general of the actual issue of the credit;" that would be got rid of; but the Bank would inform him, would they not?—No; the Paymaster would send the Treasury write-off at once to the Bank.

1683. You think that there would be a very considerable reduction of public business?—Yes; but the time saved is of more importance. We are now obliged to give notice of all our wants the day before, and it would be unnecessary to anticipate by a day the period for supplying the Paymaster with funds; it would be done on the morning when the money was wanted, when the Paymaster has a much more complete knowledge of the demands to be made upon him; there would be a great advantage in having a direct communication with the Bank.

1684. How long, if you want additional credit, does it take you to get it?—In order to keep the balances low, it is necessary to be very certain that you will have your credit; before 12 o'clock on each day the demands are sent in for the following day.

1685. Before 12 o'clock you have ample time?—Yes; but a day's notice would not be necessary if the Treasury made the issues directly; they might have the applications sent in on the following morning, and act upon them at once, and they would then act upon a more perfect knowledge of what the demands were likely to be, as ready money claims are not advised till the morning when they become payable.

1686. Why cannot you do that now?—We should not be certain of obtaining the credit in time. Where you depend upon other offices to execute your business, it would be unsafe in so important a matter as the supply of money for making the daily payments to trust to the chance of a person in another department being at his office to grant those credits at the moment they were wanted.

1687. Of course the Secretary of the Treasury is now always there, at a reasonable hour, and if it were necessary there is now always the Comptroller or the Deputy Comptroller of the Exchequer there for the purpose of giving the necessary directions; and if you were to change the hour he would be there, of course?—Still it always takes a longer time to work through two offices than one.

1688. Mr. Hankey.] Is it not the case that at the present time, occasionally, considerable inconvenience arises by an unexpected demand late in the day, and a message being obliged to be sent to the Bank to state that is not money on account, unless a fresh write-off is sent down?—Whenever a demand of that kind arises an additional issue is asked for from the Exchequer, but it rarely happens. I do not recollect many cases in which it has occurred, because there is always a margin taken to cover those unexpected demands.

1689. Chairman.] Have instances occurred of their having sent to the Exchequer, giving a credit to be sent down in a couple of hours?—Yes, that occurs, but not frequently.

1690. That is done, is it?—Yes.

1691. Before the consolidation of the Paymaster's offices, was not the system, to a certain extent, effective; for instance, you had a Paymaster of the Forces, a Treasurer of the Ordnance, and a Treasurer of the Navy, and at that time the monies which were voted for each department were issued to that department, were they not?—Yes; they were issued in gross, but they never attempted to issue under special votes; they were issues in a gross sum for the army or for the navy.

1692. Take the navy; so far as the votes for the navy were concerned, they were distinct, except for the Commissariat Chest advances, and other small things; they were separated practically, were they not?—The issues for the army, navy, and ordnance were made to separate paymasters.

1693. They were distinct for the general service?—Yes; but I should mention that the Army Extraordinaries at that time, which are now called the Commissariat Chest, were paid out of the Army Grants; and the advances for the navy and for the ordnance abroad were paid out of the Commissariat Chests.

1694. That is not done now?—It is necessary to do it even now, to a certain extent, but it is much diminished.

1695. Let us separate the foreign expenditure from the home expenditure; there were certain parts of that expenditure, were there not, that were at once posted to the right heads of the vote?—Before the offices were consolidated, they never kept in the Pay-offices any account of the votes at all, but merely a general account.

1696. Therefore, in the Pay-office of the Treasurer for the Navy they did not know where the money was spent?—No; only that it was spent for the naval services generally.

1697. A considerable part of the expenditure can be at once posted under the proper vote, can it not?—Yes. I mentioned that last year there were about three millions and a half in the Navy which could not be so apportioned.

1698. Were the three millions and a half imprest, or commissariat advances?—Imprest entirely.

1699. When it once comes into the hands of the navy; now it comes under the supervision of what is called Sir James Graham's order, does it not?—All the naval expenditure, all the receipts, and all the payments for the naval services made through the Paymaster's account are returned to the Admiralty, and then they come under the supervision of the auditors appointed under the Act of 1832.

1700. Will you state whether that is a joint audit, or a local audit, by the Accountant-general, and whether the auditors have an officer to see that the expenditure is posted under its proper vote?—The auditors do not examine the details of the expenditure, only the appropriation of the votes.

1701. What officers are you speaking of now?—The Audit-office Examiners do not go into the details of the expenditure, computations, and so forth; their audit secures that the expenditure is carried to its proper account in the books of the office, and that the usual documents audited in the department are produced in support of every charge so made in the books.

1702. Then so far as the audit goes, it is to a certain extent an audit, but the effective audit is in the Accountant of the Navy?—The effective audit is conducted by the Accountant-general of the Navy.

1703. The audit authority is mainly useful as a check upon the misappropriation of the votes?—Precisely, that is the object of the appropriation audit.

1704. You have been asked with regard to the impossibility of having an officer from the Exchequer, who should exercise something of the same functions in the Paymaster's office as the clerk of the audit exercises as to the naval expenditure; what difficulty do you foresee as to his being there?—That the whole of the payments made by the Paymaster-general are not final payments, and therefore could not be brought at once to the proper votes to which they belong.

1705. If you were to remove this audit clerk from the navy accounts, would it not be entirely in the power of the Admiralty to play with the votes as they liked?—They might prepare erroneous accounts, no doubt.

1706. As was done before?—Precisely, unless Parliament had the security of the audit for the faithful accounting of all of those monies, no doubt the same thing that has occurred might occur again.

1707. It is the Paul Pry of Parliament, looking in and seeing that nothing is wrongly done as to the navy accounts?—Exactly.

1708. What is your objection to Parliament having a Paul Pry in the Pay-office?—I do not see of what use he would be, because no final appropriation takes place in the Pay-office; the Paymaster's accounts are rendered to and are duplicates of accounts examined by the auditors in the various departments, and it is there that the final account is made up as regards the votes.

1709. In the first place, there is a doubt, at any rate, whether the practice of the Pay-office has been a legal practice, and whether the Pay-office has been carrying out the intentions of Parliament as contained in the Act; this has only come out in consequence of the appointment of this Committee; but would it not at once have come out, if they had had an officer of the Comptroller of the Exchequer in that department, who must have reported it to the House of Commons?—If you place a comptroller of that kind in any office, there is no question that he can report upon the mode in which the accounts are kept, and the mode in which the public monies are employed, but he could not prepare an appropriation account when a large portion of the money at the time of issue is not appropriated to the votes.

1710. I do not speak of the final appropriation, but of dealing with the monies which are in the hands of the Pay-office; for instance, this 150,000*l.* received from the Turkish Government, that would not come of course before Parliament in any shape through the Audit Board?—No, it would come before the Audit Board in the Paymaster's monthly account.

1711. It would never come before Parliament?—No, because it is not public money.

1712. Supposing that that service had never been called for, it might have remained in the Pay-office for a long time without Parliament knowing anything about it?—Yes, precisely; but the Turkish Government, I apprehend, would look after their own money; when the Admiralty found that they were not called upon to perform the service, they would naturally apply to the Turkish Ambassador to relieve them from the charge of that money.

1713. Mr. Henley.] Who would be answerable for it to the Turkish Government, if the money was not properly appropriated?—I think the House of Commons would be responsible, if the Admiralty had spent it for the public service.

1714. Is it not in that sense public money?—It no doubt would become so in such a case.

1715. Sir James Graham.] Supposing a dissolution of Parliament takes place, and not the Financial Secretary of the Treasury, but the other Secretary of the Treasury, for Parliamentary purposes during the dissolution, wants 40,000*l.*, what is there to prevent 40,000*l.* out of that Turkish advance of 150,000*l.* being employed for 40 days?—There is always the danger that the Turkish Government might call for it for its own purposes.

1716. I put it as being employed for only 40 days?—The Treasury would have no security that it would not be applied for in that interval; this money would be in the hands of the Paymaster a very short time. The Turkish Government would not deposit this money very long before it was actually required, and I apprehend that there is not much risk in matters of that kind; they very rarely occur; this is quite an exceptional case connected with the war.

1717. Chairman.] You have expressed an opinion that inconvenience would arise in the case of a double audit, an audit by the Audit-office, and an audit, as you expressed it, by an officer of the Comptroller of the Exchequer; would that be more inconvenient than the double audit which now exists at the Navy, the Accountant-general of the Navy auditing, and also an officer of the Audit Board?—One person of course could not do it. I should say that a dozen persons would be required to keep pace with the current operations of the Pay-office, the payments are so numerous; but if a control of that kind were thought necessary over the Pay-office, it should be extended on some system of uniformity; the Audit Board would be the proper department to do it.

1718. But you were asked the question, whether it would be more inconvenient venient than the control which the Audit-office now exercises?—It would depend upon the manner in which it was done; if it retarded the operations of the Pay-office the public would complain, especially if they had to wait for their money.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

16 June 1856.

1719. So far as principle goes is it not a fact that the Audit-office now interfere comparatively little, but it interferes more as an Audit Board at the Navy than an Exchequer officer would, who merely reported what transactions took place?—But the audit comes after payment. I understood the Right honourable Chairman to mean that the Exchequer should come before payment; in the one case the payment would be delayed, and in the other it would not.

1720. Why should you say that it would be necessary to have the sanction of an officer of the Exchequer; that is not what I contemplated?—I looked upon the whole check of the Exchequer, and the theory of it, as being a check before payment, and I concluded that you meant to carry that out in the Pay-office upon the same principle.

1721. I am supposing that officer should have the power to make himself acquainted with the transactions, and the mode in which you had disposed of the public money?—All those things are practicable; but whether they are useful is quite another question.

1722. At any rate it would be effective?—It would be nothing more than what the Paymaster does now.

1723. But it would be an eye that would be constantly there?—Yes; if it were considered necessary to know what the Paymaster was doing daily, such an officer could report it provided he had a sufficient staff.

1724. How could a Member ask in the House of Commons a question about this arrangement with the Turkish Government, the 150,000*l.* being in the Pay-office, when no human being knew anything about it?—You could not do it; you would know nothing of a transaction of that kind unless there were occasion to call for the interference of Parliament.

1725. If somebody had been there we should have heard of such payments?—Yes, you would.

1726. In point of fact, we should have known whether the Act of Parliament and the practice were not in strict conformity long before this time?—Yes; I have no doubt that that might be shown also.

1727. Would not it be an advantage, looking at it as a constitutional question, that as soon as the practice of the Treasury were found not to be in strict conformity with the intentions of the Legislature, that should be known as early as possible, and either the practice or the Act corrected?—I think that the practice of the Treasury is strictly conformable with the Appropriation Act, which is, after all, the great authority by which the public departments must be governed in the application of the public money, and I do not know that there is anything in the Exchequer Regulation Act which is departed from, so far as regards the issues from the Exchequer; all the rest after the issue becomes really a question of appropriation.

1728. Even if it is not in strict conformity with the Act, it is not in the spirit of the Act; is that so?—According to the first application of the Exchequer Regulation Act every party drew upon the Exchequer credit account, so that if the Paymaster-general were to follow out strictly the provisions of the Act, perhaps he would be required to draw upon 300 separate accounts instead of one.

1729. You have stated in your remarks, "The Comptroller-general very properly remarks, 'The law and the practice should assuredly be brought into exact conformity; the one should be repealed or the other reformed;'" do not you think that this would have been done long ago if Parliament had been aware of this defect?—Parliament has been made aware of it over and over again; the Minutes by which all this has been regulated have been laid before Parliament half a dozen times over.

1730. Will you have the goodness to turn to "Paper showing the alterations made in the Treasury Minute, dated 22d December 1848, in consequence of the preceding letter:" it states, "It is an object of great importance that the public money should not be drawn from the Exchequer, either before it is wanted or in larger sums than the services for which it is issued requires, or in other words, that the balances should be confined to the lowest sum necessary for carrying on the payments for the public service in a punctual and regular manner; manner; and as this object, so essential both to security and economy, is greatly facilitated by the arrangement and practice above referred to, my Lords desire," &c. That being the case, do you think that Parliament had reason to suppose that the sum of 80,000 l. had been drawn out in the case of the vote for the Duke of Wellington's funeral, and was that consistent with the notice given to Parliament?—Those alterations I have read. Here is the Minute as it was first drawn; and as to the alterations made, I confess I see no difference between the two; there are only different words; the same directions are given, which are that the balance shall form one fund at the Bank.

1731. This is the Minute; "It is an object of great importance that the public money should not be drawn from the Exchequer, either before it is wanted or in larger sums than the services for which it is issued requires"?—There is no doubt that at the time the issue was made by the Treasury, they thought that the whole of those claims were coming in at once; the final expenses; and they did not expect that there would be any great delay in the settlement of them, but the disputes that arose afterwards in the settlement with various parties led to delay, and to the issue of a credit larger than was actually required for the immediate disbursements.

1732. Would it not be an advantage to have somebody who could ascertain that those good intentions of the Treasury were not broken through in detail?—They have not been broken through, but whether it is necessary that Parliament should know these trifling details is another question.

1733. "By these arrangements," the Minute says, "the constitutional check exercised by the Comptroller-general of the Exchequer upon the issue of the public money under the provisions of the Act 4 Will. 4, c. 15, will in all respects be maintained; the regulations which their Lordships prescribe for the government of the Paymaster-general's office will afford to this Board a further control and check over the expenditure in detail, which will enable their Lordships to ensure that no payment is made upon the order of any department, under any head of service, beyond the amount of the specific grant of Parliament legally applicable thereto. In this manner my Lords will have the means of satisfactorily exercising that control and authority which is vested in them by the Appropriation Act, whereby, while on the one hand the departments of expenditure are restrained from applying any part of one specific grant in aid of another specific grant, this Board, on the other hand, in relation to navy, army, or ordnance services is authorised, on being satisfied of its being indispensably necessary to convey Her Majesty's sanction to the application of the surplus." Is there anything in that Minute that would lead Parliament to suppose that there had been a practice in the Pay-office not strictly conformable with law?—The practice of the Pay-office I consider to be conformable to the intentions of Parliament; the money is drawn out as closely as it can be, in anticipation of the services being applied for; it is impossible the day before to state exactly what services may be required; but on the following day, when the payments have been made, if the account has been overdrawn, it is immediately rectified by an application for a credit on that head of service. I ought not to infer, perhaps, that it is meant to say that the Pay-office, or any department, habitually draws out money under one head for the express purpose of applying it to another; that is never done; the money is applied for expressly for the payments which it is expected will be applied for; there may be a wrong estimate of the payments to be called for on the day following, but it would not do to refuse payment because a wrong estimate had been made. The payments and issues do tally much nearer than the question appears to suppose.

1734. But your former answer led me to believe that you did not think that the practice was in conformity with the law; in addition to that, there is an answer of yours to Sir James Graham, I think, in which you stated that carrying out the Act of Parliament was visionary?—As regards drawing money upon all the special votes (I take the army, navy, and ordnance as coming really under the provisions of that Act, because there is no exception made in the Act of Parliament), I still consider that it is impracticable. I mentioned a case with regard to Treasury bills; when they are presented for payment, as there is no vote of Parliament for them, if there is no money at the credit of the Commissariat chest, they must be paid out of some vote, and this would be decidedly against the proper construction of the Exchequer Act.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

16 June 1856.

1735. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Was it your meaning that the rules as to appropriation cannot be strictly followed in the Pay-office?—Yes; I stated distinctly that the cash account was not the account in which the final appropriation took place, and therefore you could not appropriate all those great payments, imprests, Treasury bills, specie remitted, at once to the particular votes of Parliament; they are transfers of money to the chests abroad; the appropriation takes place there, and we know nothing of that appropriation at the time of issue.

1736. Chairman.] I thought you had doubts, at any rate, whether the practice was in strict conformity with the law or not?—I stated that it was not in strict conformity with the law, if Lord Monteagle's interpretation, which I did not dispute, was the correct interpretation.

1737. Then you do not know how a strictly legal answer would be given?—I took Lord Monteagle's interpretation, and said that if that was the right one it would not be in strict conformity with the law.

1738. With regard to the Treasury, they seem to be in the same state of doubt whether it is legal or not legal; and I do not understand that they have taken any opinion of the law officers of the Crown?—I am not aware that any question has been raised by the Treasury upon that point; inquiry was deferred owing to the war.

1739. With regard to the great services, there would be no material difficulty, would there, in carrying out Lord Monteagle's view of the Act of Parliament, so far as regards the whole of the particular service?—If you abandon the whole principle of the Exchequer Act, there is no difficulty in carrying it out as regards those services.

1740. Without abandoning the whole principle of the Exchequer Act, with the present system is there any difficulty in carrying out Lord Monteagle's view of the Act?—It has been done from the first day when the Act was brought into operation; a special appropriation of credits for those great services has never been attempted.

1741. That is clearly the principle of the Exchequer Act?—I think that is clearly the principle of the Exchequer Act.

1742. In practice, you have abandoned that principle entirely, have you not?—The issues for those services have been always made in gross.

1743. You admit, do you not, that so far as regards the great services, you may confine the services within the great services?—With the exception of those large services which must be advanced first out of one service, and adjusted afterwards with another, and those large payments upon Treasury bills and specie purchased for the supply of the chests abroad.

1744. Except the Commissariat Chest Fund, and the advances from the Commissariat Chest Fund for expenses abroad, and the expenses probably from one department to another?—The transfer between the departments which take place after the issue.

1745. With regard to advances from the Commissariat Chest, how do they stand now; how would the imprests at home be regulated?—The imprests exist both at home and abroad, during peace as well as war; large advances are made to all the imprest accountants of those different departments. As I said before, the Paymaster-general is but one paymaster out of about 2,000 employed by the naval and military departments; every one of those 2,000 persons is appropriating money for those different services, and they have money issued to them which at the time of issue is not appropriated to particular votes; it may be appropriated to the general service of a department; for instance, a naval accountant will know that it is for naval services, but for what particular votes you cannot state at the time of issue.

1746. Take the imprest to the naval accountant, that imprest would be a general imprest for naval services, but it would not distinguish under which particular head of the service the expenditure was made; it would be for the naval service?—Yes.

1747. Therefore any expense incurred would be for the general service of the navy?—Yes.

1748. Are there any imprests of that nature in which money is issued to the naval accountant for anything but naval services?—No; all the imprests ultimately become chargeable against the Naval Votes, so far as my recollection carries me.

16 June 1856.

1749. Will you explain to the Committee how, if there is a payment on the part of the navy from the Commissariat Chest, that is accounted for now; I see that there are some regulations as to repayments, that they are made much more frequently and upon account?—The chests are supplied by drafts, from all parts of the world, on the Treasury, and those bills are paid by the paymaster out of any monies that he may have in his hands applicable to the Commissariat Chest Fund, so far as they will go; if there is a deficiency it must be taken out of the Army Grants, the army being the largest service for which issues are made. These commissaries render monthly accounts to the Audit Board of all the payments for the different departments, and the Audit Board make their claims upon all the departments for the recovery of the sums advanced on their account; those departments then authorise the Paymaster-general to transfer from their funds to the credit of the Commissariat Chest in his books the amount of those advances.

1750. But have not some arrangements been lately made with the view of getting back the money into the Commissariat Fund Account more rapidly than was the case?—Yes; I think when I was appointed to the Pay-office the Commissariat Chest Account was nearly 2,000,000 l. in debt to the army, and I brought the matter under the consideration of the Treasury, and one of the arrangements that was made to expedite the settlement of those claims was, that these departments should make a payment, on account, at the end of every month, so as to keep the Commissariat account as far as possible in funds. Of course it was directed to be made within the amount of the advances, to take care that they were not overpaying their grants; and in time of peace that arrangement would, in a great measure, provide funds to carry on the Commissariat Chest payments in the Pay-office without borrowing from any votes; but whenever any disturbance arises, such as an insurrection in Canada, or a Kaffir war, or a European war, that account is invariably overdrawn, and we have had to resort to the grants for army services in order to provide funds to meet from day to day the drafts made upon us from abroad.

1751. In point of fact, in time of peace are the advances sufficient to meet the repayments chargeable to the different departments within nearly about the amount?—Pretty nearly, and they would be decidedly so if the East India Company paid up their debt; they are always largely in arrear on account of the advances for recruiting for regiments in India, and if we could induce the East India Company to examine the accounts with greater expedition, the Commissariat Chest account might be kept always in credit on the paymaster's books in time of peace.

1752. Do you pay in advance for the month?—No; at the close of the month.

1753. The Commissariat account comes in every month, and at the termination of this month, do you pay in then such an amount as you estimate will be the charge for the past month of June?—Yes; the scale of expenditure of the preceding year is the guide. Suppose, for instance, the advances abroad in the past year for the Navy had been, say 300,000 l. the Treasury would say to the Admiralty, You can safely pay over at the close of each month, out of your vote, 20,000 l. in aid of the advances made from the chest abroad, leaving the balance to be settled on the final examination of the accounts.

1754. There is always a balance against the Navy, is there not?—Yes, which is settled afterwards on the final examination of the account; a voucher is sent to them from the Audit Board, when the claims have been received from all the distant stations.

1755. If an advance was made for a subsequent month it would resolve itself very much into an imprest account, would it not?—All those advances pass through the imprest account.

1756. And the only question is, which has advanced the most?—Precisely; it is not done in advance; it is always done in arrear at the close of the month.

1757. If we shifted the account it would come to a common imprest account very nearly?—Precisely.

1758. In that case the check, so far as regards the whole service, not as regards the different individual votes of the service, would be as strict as in any other imprest account?—As regards the whole service, if the department paid up in advance to the chest, the sums necessary to meet those bills, that would be merely transferring the debt from the army grant to the grants of the different departments.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

16 June 1856.

1759. But in that case the navy would have to draw the money from its own vote instead of borrowing it from the vote of the army, would it not?—Yes, precisely.

1760. That would settle the account more constitutionally?—Yes; it could only be done on estimate.

1761. It would be an account to be balanced afterwards, would it not?—Yes.

1762. With regard to an advance from one department to another: will you state how, if the Ordnance performs a service for the Navy, that is arranged?—That would depend upon the nature of the service. If it were a question involving materials and labour, the Ordnance would pay for the labour out of their own votes; they would buy the materials out of their own votes, and they would render a subsequent account of that to the department, and claim a repayment; but at the time that those payments are made by the Ordnance, they charge them to what they call a repayment account, which is opened in the Paymaster-general's books as a distinct account. All the advances that they make for other departments, they place under that account, and all the repayments made are carried to the credit of the same account; they do not charge such advances against any particular vote, but as advances out of their general funds to be subsequently repaid.

1763. That was the difficulty which was started immediately after the passing of the Exchequer Act?—Yes.

1764. The question was, whether there should be an advance made from the Navy to the Ordnance, and settling the account afterwards, or whether the expenditure should take place first, and the account be settled afterwards?—Yes.

1765. With regard to the advances by the collectors which you have mentioned, those are made specifically under the Act of Parliament, are they not?—Yes.

1766. Consequently, whatever is done, is done under the Act of Parliament?—Precisely.

1767. With regard to the cash balances, will you explain that point; do not they cause you a good deal of trouble?—Any sums that are paid in to the cash account belong either to the account of monies payable to the Exchequer, or they belong to some vote or account opened in the Paymaster's books. If the sum is paid in by any one of those departments for a service performed, it would be carried to the credit of the votes from which the advance was made, and the money would be used for those votes in lieu of drawing Exchequer credits.

1768. The East India Company are in the habit, I believe, of paying in large sums; will you give the Committee the sums?—They pay 62,000*l.* in one sum quarterly on account of regiments in India.

1769. Those are sums that you are prepared for?—Yes.

1770. Being sums that you are prepared for, they are principally for the army services, are they not?—Yes.

1771. You would deal with your Exchequer credits accordingly, and prepare yourself for them?—Yes.

1772. If any unexpected sums had been paid, what would happen then?—The money would be paid into the cash account, and used for any services that came in; the Exchequer credits would not be drawn till afterwards.

1773. Supposing a large sum came from the East India Company, which was a large repayment to the army vote, but it was much larger than would be actually wanted for the daily demand of the army for two or three days, in that case the payment would be an inconvenience to you, would it not; you would be obliged to use that money, and place it in your drawing account, and apply it, though it is a repayment to the army, to the general demands upon you?—Yes.

1774. That is a disturbing force, supposing Lord Monteagle's view to be a correct one?—Yes; but that is a matter which would set itself right the next day in the demands upon the Exchequer.

1775. Are the payments so large as to be an inconvenience for a very short time?—No; the payments of the Pay-office are so large that they absorb all the cash very rapidly.

1776. Your cash account is a very small one compared with the daily demands, is it not?—Yes, no doubt of it.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

16 June 1856.

1777. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] You have been asked some questions with respect to the communications between the Treasury and the Exchequer; in the first instance, what are the offices or departments of the Government with which the Exchequer Office corresponds?—The Exchequer communicates only with the Treasury and with the Bank. I know of no other office with which the Exchequer has any communication.

1778. What may be the number of letters which are addressed in the course of the week on the average by the Treasury to the Exchequer?—I calculate the money letters to be about six a day.

1779. How much time do you suppose the dealing with those six letters would occupy in the Exchequer?—Any competent junior clerk ought to be able to do everything that is required with those six letters, that is, making out the credits, and making a proper record of them, certainly in an hour at the outside.

1780. Then what further business is there that the Exchequer has to transact with the Bank of England?—Nothing that I am aware of but to grant those credits to the Bank, and to receive from the Bank a notification of the sums which are paid in to the credit of the different branches of the revenue.

1781. With the exception of keeping the Exchequer accounts, is that the whole business which the Exchequer has to transact in connexion with the issues of money?—It is the whole, with the exception of the preparation of Exchequer bills, which may occupy them for a week twice in the year.

1782. The business of preparing the Exchequer bills is wholly unconnected with the ordinary business of the Exchequer, is it not?—It occurs only at the two exchanges; there are a few Exchequer bills, of course, prepared every quarter connected with the deficiency of the Consolidated Fund; but those are not very numerous.

1783. What is the business of preparing Exchequer bills, as transacted in the Exchequer?—The Treasury furnish the Exchequer with a warrant for the issue of the total amount of Exchequer bills required for the exchanges. All that the Exchequer have to do with that matter is, I believe, to order the paper, and give directions to the printer; and when they receive them back drawn, they have a stamp by which they put on the date and the Act of Parliament, and they have to sign the bills; beyond that, they have nothing to do with the exchange, but to hand over the Exchequer bills bodily to the Paymaster, who distributes them.

1784. The exchange of Exchequer bills takes place in the Pay-office, does it not?—Yes.

1785. Did not the Commissioners of 1831 recommend that the business of preparing the Exchequer bills should be transacted in the Treasury?—That is one of the recommendations contained in the report.

1786. Is there any natural connexion or affinity between the business of the Exchequer, which consists in controlling the issues of the public money, and the preparation of Exchequer bills?—Nothing, except that the Comptroller may say that he checks the Treasury, and sees that they do not issue more bills than the law authorises them to issue; that is the only point.

1787. Then is that the ground upon which you conceive the preparation and issue of Exchequer bills to be lodged in the Exchequer?—I can discover no other. The recommendation of the Commissioners was distinct, that it was a Treasury duty, and should be done there. I apprehend that they never contemplated that the Treasury would exceed their powers in regard to raising money.

1788. Would there be any convenience in the preparation of Exchequer Bills being conducted by the Bank of England?—There is no doubt that the Bank would do it infinitely better than we could; and probably at much less cost.

1789. If the preparation of Exchequer bills were conducted by the Bank, instead of by the Exchequer, would there not be a check upon the Treasury as to the amount of issues?—It would be precisely the same check that there is in the Comptroller's office.

1790. Is there not a third branch of business in the Exchequer, relating to weights and measures?—Yes, there is a small department there of about two persons, I believe, at the outside three, and the chief is called the superintendent of weights and measures. It is a very small business, which might be done by the Mint.

1791. Does not it seem that that business has more affinity to the business of the Mint than to that of the Exchequer?—Yes, I think so.

1792. What is the entire establishment of the Exchequer; how many persons are there in the department; and will you mention their salaries at the same time?—The Comptroller-general has 2,000 l. a year.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

16 June 1856.

1793. The salary of the Comptroller-general is fixed on the Consolidated Fund by Act of Parliament?—Yes; it is fixed upon the Consolidated Fund by the Exchequer Act.

1794. His salary and his position are made by law similar to those of the Commissioners of Audit?—Yes; and of the Judges. The Assistant-comptroller has 1,000 l. a year.

1795. His salary is not fixed upon the Consolidated Fund?—No, on the Votes; all the other salaries are on the Votes. The chief clerk has 900 l.; the accountant has 550 l.; and seven clerks receive salaries which vary from 100 l. to 550 l.; and there are an office-keeper, messengers, watchman, and so forth. The total establishment costs more than 7,000 l. a year in salaries alone.

1796. Sir James Graham.] Did you state that you thought that all the business, excepting the preparation of the Exchequer bills, and the small duties connected with the weights and measures, might be transacted by one junior clerk?—If I allowed two clerks to do the whole business, I think that that would be a very liberal estimate.

1797. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] In addition to the amount of the annual salaries, there is the building which is appropriated to the office?—Yes; there are all the incidental expenses attendant upon keeping up the office in a separate building, contingencies, and so forth.

1798. Are you aware whether the original form of the Exchequer was not that the Lord High Treasurer, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the Under Treasurer of the Exchequer, transacted all the business in the Exchequer office?—Yes; the Treasury and the Exchequer in olden times, I believe, formed one office; and the Lord High Treasurer was the chief officer of it.

1799. The Treasury was separated from the Exchequer, was not it, about the time of Charles the Second?—I believe, after the Restoration the separation took place.

1800. From that time certain subordinate officers of the old Exchequer continued to exercise a control over the accounts of their former chiefs?—Precisely; and even now, up to the present day, the Treasury are bound to found their accounts upon the accounts of the Exchequer, and that is one of the inconveniences which I have pointed out. We are obliged, with every desire to improve our accounts, and carry out a system uniform with that which has been established in the great departments, to found our accounts upon a false principle, because the law requires that we shall adopt the Exchequer account as the basis of our own.

1801. Sir James Graham.] Are the Committee to understand that the system of double entry is barred by a system of account corresponding with the Exchequer account?—When I went to the Treasury two years ago, at the commencement of the war, I found certain accounts established which were founded upon the Exchequer accounts; there was no cash-book, journal, or ledger; none of the books which are ordinarily used in the double entry system; I found that I had to be responsible for the management of the public balances without any of those aids which were essential to enable me to carry on the business safely and economically; I knew nothing of the Exchequer balance except once a week, and that in the middle of the following week; I immediately set to work to establish a regular system, such as exists in the great departments; but I was only able to commence it at the beginning of the year 1855–56; I have introduced those books, and they are in very satisfactory operation, and they give me all the information that I want; still even those books I am bound to found upon Exchequer credits; I am obliged to carry out that system upon a false principle, because the Act of Parliament requires that our expenditure shall be founded on credits, and not upon actual payments, so that the books are perfect, but the results are not.

1802. The whole principle of double entry cannot be introduced on account of the necessity of an adherence as a basis of account to the Exchequer form?—Precisely.

1803. Chairman.] Are those books the books that were kept by Mr. Brooksbank?—Yes; they are the same books.

1804. They are the old books of the Revenue Department, of which Mr. Brooksbank was the head?—Yes.

1805. He

1805. He was selected, was he not, as an accountant to look into the system of bookkeeping, and to report upon it?—Yes.

1806. In consequence of a recommendation of the Committee of the House of Commons?—Yes.

1807. Mr. Wilson.] You have stated that you are compelled to make up your account upon the Exchequer account, which means this, does it not, that the Exchequer treat as a payment every issue to the credit of the Paymaster-general?—Precisely.

1808. Though, in point of fact, no issue can be made, but merely is a credit given, it is treated as a payment?—Yes.

1809. You are obliged to make a false account, are you not, because you treat as payments monies which are still in the Bank as Exchequer credits?—Yes.

1810. Sir James Graham.] The basis of double entry is, that nothing shall be recorded but actual facts; in this case it is not a fact, but a presumption?—Yes.

1811. Mr. Henley.] In point of fact, it is an actual payment out of the general fund of the Exchequer, is it not?—No, it is merely a credit given; that is, the Comptroller gives authority to the Bank to set aside and place at the disposal of the Paymaster certain credits upon a particular vote.

1812. From the moment that that authority is given, that money is at the disposal of the Paymaster to all intents and purposes, is it not?—It is a balance to his credit.

1813. Then, in point of fact, it is an actual payment out of the Exchequer?—It has not finally left the Exchequer, but it has left the control of the Exchequer.

1814. In point of fact and truth the money is never at the Exchequer, but at the Bank of England?—Yes.

1815. The issue by the Comptroller of the Exchequer of an Exchequer credit, is the placing of a distinct sum of money from the one general account of the Exchequer at the Bank of England under a particular name, which you call Exchequer Credits, out of the control of the Comptroller of the Exchequer into the control of the Paymaster, who deals with it as he thinks fit?—Yes.

1816. Then, in point of fact, that is not an assumption, but a reality, so far as the Exchequer account at the Bank goes?—It is an assumption if it is called a payment; it is called a payment in the public account of the Treasury.

1817. In point of fact, no payment takes place from the Exchequer, but only a transfer?—Yes; out of which payments are subsequently made.

1818. Then, in point of fact, the transfer is a reality, so far as the Exchequer in any sense is concerned?—Yes, undoubtedly, so far as the Exchequer in any sense is concerned; but what I stated was, that the account should not be based upon the transactions of the Exchequer, but upon the payments of the Paymaster, to become really an account of payments.

1819. Your view would be, that nothing should be called a real transaction till the money actually went out of the Bank of England into somebody's possession?—Yes, until it was paid away.

1820. Do you carry that to this length, that supposing A. B. keep an account at the Bank of England, a transfer from the account of A. to the account of B. is not a real transaction, because no money goes out of the Bank of England?—That is a different case. I think I recollect that Lord Monteagle stated in his evidence that his balance was different from the balance shown on the Treasury account of income and expenditure.

1821. Why was it different?—Because his balance included credits granted, but which remained on his account appropriated, but not expended.

1822. But it is gone from the control of the Exchequer?—Still it is the same account; it is the same public account.

1823. Chairman.] You know the Act of Parliament called the Exchequer Act, do you not?—Yes.

1824. I will read to you this clause: "Provided always, and be it further enacted, that in cases in which any credit shall be granted to any person by the said Governor and Company in pursuance of this Act, no sum of money shall be transferred from the account of his Majesty's Exchequer until the same shall be actually paid by the Bank to or on account of the person to whom such credit shall be granted." You stated that you considered that under this clause, when a credit was given to you, the payment was actually made by the Bank, and that the transfer had taken place, did you not?—In the ordinary way the paymaster applying for the money which he wants daily, the credit would pretty nearly represent the payment; but I was going to put a case which occurs at the close of every quarter. Last quarter there was 1,400,000 l. issued at the end of March, to enable the Paymaster-general to make his payments in the first week or ten days of April; the whole of that sum, though no part of it was spent, still remained on the Exchequer Account, and was charged in the account of the expenditure of the last year, ending the 31st of March, as a sum paid.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

16 June 1856.

1825. I was asking you whether the transfer which is made from the general Exchequer account to the credit account is not an actual payment?—It is not a payment.

1826. You were asked several questions before about that, and I understood you to state that you considered it a payment, and consequently that it was no longer in the general Exchequer account?—I stated that under the law it was a payment, and passed into the public accounts as one; it is a sum no longer under the control of the Comptroller of the Exchequer, as he has given the paymaster a credit upon his account to that extent; therefore it is a sum remaining on his account, but at the disposal of the paymaster.

1827. Under the Act of Parliament, that makes it a payment?—Yes.

1828. Mr. Henley.] You have stated, have you not, that in your judgment the transfer from the account of the Comptroller of the Exchequer at the Bank of England to the paymaster, is not a real transaction, but only a fiction, because the money is still in the hands of the Government officer?—It is not applied.

1829. You have stated in the former part of your evidence, that there are no less than 2,000 paymasters in the various services of the public?—Yes.

1830. Do you still consider it not a payment, but only a fiction, when the money is transferred from the Paymaster-general to each of those 2,000 paymasters, the money still remaining in the hands of those paymasters, and they being public servants; is that still only a fiction?—No portion of that money is ever charged as expenditure in the account rendered to Parliament—the appropriation account.

1831. I did not asked you that. I ask you your opinion whether what I put to you was still a fiction and not a reality?—Undoubtedly, when the paymaster has paid the money away, it is a payment in his account; it is issued to that officer for disbursements to be made by him; but it is not a final payment.

1832. In what way do you show the one to be a fiction, and the other not to be a fiction; you have stated that the transfer of money from the Comptroller-general to the Paymaster-general is a fiction; I ask you whether, when money is transferred from the Paymaster-general to the 2,000 paymasters of whom you have spoken, they still being public officers, there is a fiction or a reality?—When money is transferred away from the Bank into the hands of those paymasters, it is of course a payment on the paymaster's account, and it is paid away to be applied to the public service; but what I said was, not that that transaction was a fiction, but that the charge of expenditure in the account of the Treasury was a fiction, as the payment had not been made.

1833. Then in point of fact, the convenience of the public service requiring an advance at particular seasons of the year to keep the paymaster in funds, leads to the charge appearing at a period other than that at which it ought to appear?—Certainly, it would appear in the account of one year when it belongs to another.

1834. Still although that is so, would it not be more correct to put it in that shape than to state that that is a fiction, which in point of fact is an actual transfer from one account to another, though it is done at a season when it ought not to be?—Though not an actual transfer, it is a credit upon the account which is equal to that.

1835. Mr. Wilson.] Your complaint is this, is it not, that you are bound to make up your accounts of income and expenditure according to the Exchequer accounts, and not according to your own payments?—Precisely. I meant that it would be far more correct to found the public accounts upon the payments of the paymaster than upon the credits of the Exchequer.

1836. So far as the Exchequer account went, it would be perfectly proper to debit this transfer as a payment, if it were not an Exchequer account?—Precisely.

1837. When

1837. When it becomes a public Treasury account of income and expenditure, if you charge as expenditure a sum of money which has only been put at the disposal of the paymaster, and not paid by him, it necessarily conveys a false result?—That is what I meant to convey.

1838. Sir Henry Willoughby.] Then that fault arises in the Treasury?—No, it is the fault of the system: the Treasury is bound by the Act of Parliament.

1839. Mr. Wilson.] You are compelled by the Act of Parliament to make out your accounts in that way, based upon the Exchequer account?—We are compelled to make up the balance sheet on that principle.

1840. The difference in effect would be that, if 1,400,000 l. is issued from the Exchequer on the last day of the last quarter, for the payments of the next fortnight, if you made up your account according to the actual expenditure of that year there would arise a balance to be carried over to the next year?—Yes.

1841. In that case the account of expenditure would be the actual expenditure within the year, and not the mere issues from the Exchequer?—Precisely. That appears to be the true principle upon which the cash account should be prepared.

1842. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] That is to say, the account would show exactly the payments made by the paymaster within the year?—Yes.

1843. There would still be the element of error which would arise from the payments made by the subordinate paymasters?—Precisely; I explained that before. There are two accounts; there is the cash account of the Treasury, showing the whole of their receipts and payments within the year; and there is the final appropriation account, which is prepared in the departments, and is made up from the transactions of the whole 2,000 paymasters.

1844. The issues made by the Paymaster-general to the imprest paymasters are, in fact, in the nature of mere transfers from one public officer to another?—They are.

1845. The money, so long as it remains in the hands of the subordinate paymasters, is still public money in the hands of public officers?—Yes.

1846. Therefore, until the actual final payment is made by the subordinate paymasters, you do not get at the actual payments of the public money to the private individuals?—No; you do not get at the actual sum appropriated to the vote. There is a clause in the Act under which those accounts are examined, which provides that no payment in the nature of an imprest shall be charged as a final payment against those votes.

1847. If the accounts were kept according to your plan, they would show, at all events, the precise amount of the payments made by the Paymaster-general within the year, neither more nor less?—The accounts would show the actual amount of cash that the Treasury had parted with.

1848. Mr. Henley.] In point of fact, the necessity for the advance of this 1,400,000 l. which has been spoken of, and which confuses the account in the way you have described, arises from the necessity, at the end of the quarter, of the whole balance in the Exchequer being appropriated to the payment of dividends?—That causes the large issues at the close of each quarter.

1849. It is the necessity for those issues which makes that confusion; but that might be met, might it not, by the alteration of that provision of the law which empowered the Exchequer to retain in its hands such a sum as would be necessary for the exigencies of the public service until the incoming of the revenue?—That would undoubtedly lessen the inconvenience.

1850. In that case it would actually make the Exchequer account what you say the Treasury account ought to be?—It would approximate much more nearly to that.

1851. Sir James Graham.] Would not that diminish the security of the public credit, by a departure from the existing Loan Acts?—It would be a departure from the Loan Acts.

1852. Mr. Wilson.] You have been asked as to the 150,000 l. that was advanced by the Turkish Government; that sum was not paid to the Treasury, was it?—No; it was transferred from the Turkish account at the Bank of England to the account of the Paymaster-general.

1853. But on account of the Navy?—Yes.

1854. Practically, it was paid to the paymaster on behalf of the Navy?—Yes, and was placed at the disposal of the Admiralty.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

16 June 1856.

1855. It could not be disposed of by any department but the Admiralty?—No.

1856. Therefore the paymaster would not have been justified in attending to any instructions which the Treasury might have given him as to that money?—No, certainly not; if the Treasury had attempted to deal with it, he must have immediately communicated with the Admiralty, and I suppose that the First Lord of the Admiralty and the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have settled the matter.

1857. It was to all intents and purposes a part of the naval moneys?—Yes; it would be naval moneys in the hands of the paymaster.

1858. Chairman.] When it was gone, and the Navy applied for it, what would happen if the money were transferred to your drawing account, and drawn out for anything that you liked?—The Paymaster-general would never have applied that money for other purposes without telling the Admiralty.

1859. It was paid in to your cash balance?—Yes.

1860. And from the cash account it was carried to your drawing account?—Yes.

1861. And from the drawing account it was drawn out and spent for any service whatever?—Yes, it would be temporarily used for any authorised services; but it was placed in account to the credit of the naval cash, and returned, of course, to the Admiralty as naval cash.

1862. Mr. Williams.] Reference has been made to drawbacks, and I wish to ask you whether, in order that the whole revenue may be paid into the Exchequer, there would be any difficulty in the Customs Department, for instance, obtaining the amount required for the payment of drawbacks from the Treasury?—There would be no difficulty in voting the drawbacks; the customs might estimate for them as a part of their charges. The only objection that I see to it is, that it is swelling your revenue beyond its legitimate amount, and also your expenditure.

1863. What may be about the average amount of the drawbacks?—In the Customs the drawbacks amount to about 157,000 l. a year; and the repayments on over-entries, sums paid in anticipation and subsequently repaid, amount to something short of 100,000 l. In the Inland Revenue the drawbacks amount to about 338,000 l.; discounts and Parliamentary allowances to 403,000 l.; the allowances, and repayments on overcharges, over-assessments, about 244,000 l.; altogether 985,000 l. In the Post-office they are somewhere about 54,000 l.

1864. Then those different departments which you have named retain those different amounts in their hands; at least they retain an amount of the public revenue to meet those payments?—No; they never retain the money; they pay it out of the growing revenue from day to day; they never retain sixpence for that purpose, unless they know that a very large payment will be required on the following day which the revenue will not meet. In that case they might retain a sum sufficient to meet that payment, otherwise they do not retain any money.

1865. Do they account for those different items in detail?—Yes.

1866. Do they state all the particulars to the Treasury?—Every payment of that kind is recorded at the time it is made, and it passes before the Audit Board.

1867. And the amounts which you have given as the payments of the different revenue departments are pretty much about the same in each year, are they not?—No, they vary very much. This year, in July, there will be 1,000,000 l. as a drawback on malt alone, owing to a change in the duty. If there was no change in the taxes they probably would not vary very much from year to year.

1868. Is it not the case, that the drawback upon malt is not to be paid in money, but that it is to be deducted from the coming duty?—It will be an actual payment of money to the holders on their stocks in hand.

THE RIGHT HON. SIR FRANCIS T. BARING, BART., IN THE CHAIR.

William George Anderson, Esq., called in; and further Examined.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

19 June 1856.

1869. Chairman.] I OMITTED to ask you with regard to the Estimates of the Woods and Forests; at present the Woods and Forests do not, like other departments, take an estimate for their expenses, but they pay them out of the gross revenue as they come in, do they not?—They only take an estimate for the salaries, and the contingent expenses of the office in London.

1870. With regard to the other expenses, they are deducted from the gross revenue, and for those there is no estimate?—All the other charges for collection and management are taken out of the gross revenue, and the net revenue only is paid to the Exchequer.

1871. Their expenses are conducted upon a different principle from other departments; they do not come before Parliament until the money is expended; there is no previous vote?—There is no vote for those charges which are defrayed out of the revenue.

1872. In the papers that have been laid before the Committee, there is a memorandum of yours and Sir Charles Trevelyan's, and you state there is no objection, and you apprehend there is no difficulty in doing what with regard to other departments has been done; namely, bringing the expenditure previously before Parliament, and then taking a vote?—I think there is no difficulty, and it would make the system more uniform if we could have the gross revenue on the one side, and the gross expenditure on the other.

1873. Does the opinion which you have now expressed relate to the Woods and Forests?—Yes; and I gave that opinion before a Committee some years ago.

1874. You have seen no reason to change that opinion?—No.

1875. With regard to what is called the capital fund, does that come under the Treasury at all?—Yes, it is subject to the directions of the Treasury; but there is a particular application of the capital fund under the Act of the 10th of Geo. the 4th, by which the land revenues are regulated.

1876. You have stated, in answer to some questions put to you by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that in your opinion one clerk in a couple of hours would do such work as comes from the Treasury to the Exchequer?—The question put to me was as to the daily issues, how long it would take to pass on the six credits, which on an average of each day the Exchequer sends to the Bank, and my answer was limited of course to that.

1877. Yes; but it was rather understood by Honourable Members who afterwards asked you questions, that you seemed to think that, deducting the issue of Exchequer bills and the custody of the weights and measures, a couple of clerks would easily do the remaining work of the Exchequer?—I think so, judging from the work that passes before me. I think I see the whole of the Exchequer duty at the Treasury; or it has come before me at the Pay office; and if that business is done in a simple and efficient manner, I see nothing that should occupy more than two clerks.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

19 June 1856.

1878. You have entertained that opinion for some time, have you not?—It is only lately, since I have been at the Treasury, that I have seen the whole working of the Exchequer.

1879. You have been there a couple of years, have you not?—Yes.

1880. Have you expressed that opinion to the officers of the Treasury?—Yes; though it is not any part of my duty to suggest alterations in the departments, I have not failed to express that opinion when it has been asked.

1881. Whose duty is it to check the expenditure of Miscellaneous Estimates?—The Miscellaneous Estimates are divided amongst a number of departments.

1882. What is the practice with regard to the estimates, such as the estimate for the Exchequer expenditure?—The Comptroller of the Exchequer is responsible for preparing that estimate and submitting it to the Treasury.

1883. It has been stated before the Committee upon Civil Service Estimates that it is the practice for the department to prepare the estimate, and it is then checked by the Treasury?—Yes; but then the Treasury would only see that it corresponded with the authorities which existed for that expenditure.

1884. Has the practice so far changed, that the Treasury exercise no discretion when they submit the Civil Service Estimates to Parliament?—When an estimate is submitted to the Treasury, and it embraces the establishment of an office, the Treasury satisfies itself that that establishment corresponds with the establishment which has been authorised.

1885. I mean this: is not the Treasury responsible if they submit for a vote in Parliament a sum which is not required for any particular office which is contained in the Civil Service Estimates?—You cannot ascertain whether the sum for an establishment is too much, or whether the establishment is too large, without an investigation into the duties of the office itself; that would necessitate a revision of the whole duties of the department. As long as the establishment exists the money must be provided to pay it.

1886. Take, for example, the Civil Service Estimates: do not the Treasury, in the first instance, consider them, and are they not considered, either by the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the business Secretary of the Treasury, or by both; and if there appears reason to suppose that the amount is too great, is it not the habit strictly to check the amount, and call for an explanation, if necessary?—There has been an inquiry into the Exchequer contemplated for some time; ever since Lord Monteagle prepared his memorandum, it has been intended; when it was first laid before the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he said it must be investigated, but the commencement of a great war is not the time when we should disturb existing regulations, but when the Treasury has leisure, and the war is at an end, and matters are settled down a little, the whole of these matters must be fully investigated.

1887. It is not with regard to Lord Monteagle's memorandum, or the subject of an inquiry of this Committee, but whether Lord Monteagle has a considerable establishment to perform the duties of Comptroller of the Exchequer, which you seem to be under the impression, and I suppose the Chancellor of the Exchequer also, might be done by one clerk in two hours?—There is no doubt that the establishment is far greater than is necessary for the performance of the duties. That you may spin out the work by a particular mode of transacting business, that you may increase it so as to employ a larger number of persons, no one doubts; but let that business be properly done, and it ought not to employ more than the establishment which I have stated.

1888. Is it or is it not the duty of the Treasury, before they submit an estimate for the service of the Exchequer, to satisfy themselves that that is not an extravagant estimate?—It would be undoubtedly the duty of the Treasury to do that with regard to every establishment.

1889. But it would be the duty of the Treasury, would it not?—Yes.

1890. Are you aware that in 1848 it so happened that Parliament, having decided not to grant the income-tax, the estimates were withdrawn by the Government and reconsidered by the Government?—Yes, in 1848 there was a Committee appointed to investigate the various estimates.

1891. But the estimates were withdrawn by the Government and reconsidered by the Government, and new and reduced estimates were afterwards submitted to Parliament?—That was the case in 1848.

1892. And the Civil Service Estimates were reconsidered by the Treasury, were

were they not?—I presume they were. I was not in the Treasury then, and therefore I cannot say what happened before I was appointed.

1893. There was subsequently a Committee to examine the Civil Service Estimates, was there not?—Yes.

1894. Have you referred to the report of that Committee?—I have read it; not lately; but at the time I read it.

1895. They gave their opinion upon the Exchequer establishment, did they not?—I do not recollect the opinion given upon the Exchequer establishment.

1896. You have been asked as to the form, and you mentioned that there was some difficulty with regard to the way in which the Exchequer make out their accounts; will you have the goodness to read the heading of that account?—"An account of the net public income of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in the year ended the 31st day of March 1856 (after abating the expenditure thereout defrayed by the several revenue departments), and of the actual issues or payments within the same period, exclusive of the sums applied to the redemption of funded or paying off unfunded debt, and of the advances and repayments for local works."

1897. Having reference to those words, "after abating the expenditure thereout defrayed by the several revenue departments," will you have the goodness to refer to that department out of which the 213,000*l.* was paid; which was it?—The Excise and Post Office.

1898. Out of that, have you deducted the expenditure of the pensions that were bought?—No; we have only deducted the expenses of collection and management of the revenue.

1899. Is that the practice of the department, and has it been so done on former occasions?—No; on former occasions it was the practice to suppress those items altogether in this account.

1900. It was always the practice to deduct all the payments made out of the revenue departments in former accounts, was it not?—Yes; it was.

1901. In those accounts you have not deducted those payments?—We have only deducted the clear charges for collection and management: those extraordinary payments are not deducted. The object of this alteration was to bring before Parliament the extraordinary payment that had been made out of the gross revenue, and therefore the revenue is shown in full, and the extraordinary payment for the redemption of those pensions is shown on the other side of the account.

1902. I suppose that the Government who moved for the payment might have made a minute, and brought that minute before Parliament?—They could, undoubtedly; but there is no more convenient mode of doing that than by placing it in the account of the Treasury finance transactions for the period.

1903. Is it convenient to change what hitherto has been considered the mode of calculating the income without the knowledge of Parliament at all?—It is done with the full knowledge of Parliament, and I think it is convenient to make a change whenever there appears to be a necessity for it; if we make no change we shall never make improvements at all.

1904. I did not ask you that; but if the Excise net income is generally supposed to mean one thing, is it advisable to make alterations without Parliament knowing in the least that the alterations are made?—What we understand by net income, is the income after abating the charges of collection, and I think that that is a fair interpretation to put upon those words.

1905. Is that the interpretation which has been put before upon those words?—In a previous case it was not done.

1906. In point of fact, was not it the case that all those charges, the whole of those pensions, were annual payments, and were regularly deducted and considered as expenditure defrayed by the revenue departments, and deducted from the net income?—It was; still I think when you come to the redemption of a debt of that kind, it is proper that it should be shown and not taken out of the net income.

1907. Therefore, at any rate, so far as it appears, your return may be much better than it was before, but it is not in conformity with the old practice of the department?—No; this has been a variation from the previous practice; I only know of two previous accounts; there is one in 1853 and one in 1826.

1908. With regard to the redemption, it is quite true, but as to the pensions themselves, themselves, they were annually deducted?—The annual pensions were deducted; it was an annual charge upon the revenue.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

19 June 1856.

1909. You stated, did you not, that you thought that only the charges of collection should be deducted under the net income?—The permanent charges upon the revenue, and the charges of collection and management. There are other charges which are by law fixed upon the annual revenue, and those have been invariably deducted.

1910. Will you have the goodness to turn to the other sheet of the income, and explain to the Committee what is meant by this: under the head of "Balances in the Exchequer," it states the balances in England and Ireland to be "3,949,774 l. 11 s. 8 d.," and it ends again with, "Balances in the Exchequer; Bank of England, so much; Bank of Ireland, so much." That is on the other side "Issued." Was there any issue from the Exchequer of those hereditary pensions?—No, but there was an issue out of the revenue; those two accounts must be looked upon as one, because the second statement is confined to the balances taken away from the first account, and to the redemption of debt and other charges, which do not belong to income or expenditure; but you may consolidate those two accounts, for they are really one account; if you debit the gross revenue you must of necessity place the payment on the other side, or the account would not balance.

1911. No doubt, having put in one thing which has not been issued from the Exchequer, you must put in a payment to counterbalance it?—If you charge on the one side the gross revenue you must on the other side have that which has been taken out of that revenue.

1912. It is not exactly the gross revenue, but it is the net revenue after abating the annual charges which are defrayed out of the revenue; you have charged as an issue that which was not issued from the Exchequer, but that which was made as a payment out of the revenue?—It was an issue out of the Excise and out of the Post-office revenues.

1913. Is not this the first time when a charge of that kind has been shown under such an account?—It is the first time, I believe, that it has been shown in this account of income and expenditure.

1914. As an account, it is the first time that it has appeared?—Yes, it is the first time that it has appeared in this account.

1915. Is it not the habit to place under the issues the issues from the Exchequer?—Yes; the account consists of issues from the Exchequer, with the exception of those two pensions which had been redeemed out of the revenue; there is a third charge, a sum deducted by the Bank for the management of the loan.

1916. Has that been usually put in before?—I suspect that it has appeared in the finance accounts before, but the other two have not.

1917. Sir Henry Willoughby.] That is under an Act of Parliament, is it not?—Yes.

1918. Chairman.] The gross sum is not paid to the Exchequer?—No; but the Bank are allowed to retain out of the gross sums received their charge for management; we have altered it in the last loan, and it is directed to be made by issues from the Exchequer.

1919. Will you state whether, those items being charged under the head of issues, it is not a new mode of introducing them, and whether they have been introduced in the same way before?—It is a new practice; it is the first time that it has been done; but the object is, of course, perfectly clear, namely, to give the earliest information to Parliament of that transaction.

1920. When did the transaction take place?—It took place in March, I believe.

1921. You could easily have laid on the table the Treasury Minute, and given that information?—Yes; but it is far better I think, as a matter of account, to place these things on record in the public accounts; we have only continued the net public income for a time till Mr. Gladstone's Act is fully carried out; it is intended to be a statement of the gross income from the beginning of this year, and it is only a step towards the final carrying out of that Act.

1922. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Has it not been argued that, though the Treasury have power to pay, and indeed were bound to pay the annual hereditary pensions out of the gross revenue, it was not considered right for them them to redeem them out of the gross revenue without the authority of Parliament?—Yes.

1923. Does not that argument assume that there is a difference between the annual payment out of the gross revenue, and the payment of a gross sum for the redemption of the pensions?—Certainly.

1924. Adopting the spirit of that argument, is there not a reason for showing, upon the face of the accounts, the large sums paid for the redemption, while the smaller sums for the annual pensions was not stated on the accounts?—I think that is the natural conclusion; the proper mode of preparing accounts is to state the whole of the facts, and not to have to look to the two sides of the account for the payments, one portion being deducted from the receipts. We are now in a state of transition; and if it had not been contemplated to bring, in a very short time, the gross revenue before Parliament, it might have been a question as to the propriety of deviating from precedent. I think the proper course has been adopted in this case in placing the matter on record in the account where it ought to appear; it is not the account of the Exchequer, but the Treasury account, in which they are bound to tell Parliament all that they have done with regard to the finances of the country.

1925. Mr. Cardwell.] Suppose the redemption to take place in the year 1856, and the capital payment to be made out of the Excise revenue, then, taking the three accounts for the year 1855, the year 1856, and the year 1857, though appearing to be the same accounts, they would, in reality, have represented three different states of facts. If this entry had not been made, the first account would have represented the Excise burdened with the annual charge; the second account would have represented the Excise, the capital value of the charge having been deducted from the Excise revenue; and the third account would represent the Excise without any burden at all, either for principal or interest?—That would have been the effect, undoubtedly; there is also a prior account which I will mention, namely, the account of the revenue published in the newspapers at the close of each quarter under each head of revenue; if we had taken off in one quarter 213,000 l. from the revenue, of course the country would have been led to expect that the Excise and Post-office revenues for that quarter had fallen off to that extent. We were therefore obliged, in order to avoid any misconception on the part of the public, to show the revenue received without reference to those deductions, and to place those transactions on the other side of the account, that they might be shown; and, as a matter of comparison, it is no doubt far better to make the accounts as uniform as you can.

1926. Whether, speaking of the immediate effect of the publication of the account, or of the permanent effect of keeping the accounts of different years, for the purpose of comparison, you avoided ambiguity, and gave useful information by the course which you adopted?—That was the reason why that course was adopted by the Treasury; it was considered that it would be the most intelligible to the public.

1927. Sir Henry Willoughby.] Would it not have been a proper question to submit to Parliament, first, whether those pensions should be redeemed at all; and, secondly, at what price?—I can hardly answer that; whether those matters should be dealt with by the Government or by Parliament, is a question which is determined in a great measure by precedent; in all former cases it had been done in precisely the same manner as on this occasion, and as Parliament had been told of the course that was to be adopted, I think that the Treasury in this case acted rightly.

1928. Are you of opinion that it is a proper course to pay 213,000 l. out of the public revenue, without the knowledge or sanction of Parliament?—If the pension was a legal charge upon the revenue it could only be redeemed out of the revenue, and the object of the redemption of those pensions was to enable the Government to place before Parliament the gross revenue, and to enable them to deal with the gross expenditure. Mr. Gladstone, upon introducing his Bill, explained distinctly to the House that the negotiations for buying up these pensions were nearly completed, and I consider that Parliament had full information of the intentions of Government.

1929. That was when the transaction was completed; had Parliament any information before that transaction was completed?—They had; it was communicated by the finance minister to the House at the time that he announced his intentions.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

19 June 1856.

1930. Did the finance minister communicate to the House that he was about to redeem certain pensions at an expense of 213,000 l.?—He stated the facts clearly, not only as to that 213,000 l., but as regards the whole of the pensions.

1931. When did he state that fact?—On introducing his Bill for removing certain charges from the gross revenue to the votes.

1932. To what finance minister do you refer?—Mr. Gladstone.

1933. Will you undertake to say that he asserted in Parliament that he was going to expend 213,000 l. of the public revenue in the redemption of certain pensions?—Mr. Gladstone did not name the sum, because the negotiations were not completed; but his statement went to a much larger sum than 213,000 l.

1934. Did he mention any sum?—No; but the purchase-money of the pensions to be redeemed was very much larger than that sum would represent.

1935. Did he do more than state that it was desirable that those pensions should be redeemed, leaving the question as to the mode of redemption entirely open?—He did more than that; he told the House that the negotiations were in a very advanced state; he might say almost completed.

1936. Sir Henry Willoughby.] Whence do you derive this information?—From Hansard.

1937. Mr. Williams.] What is the necessity for having those pensions redeemed, in order to pay the whole amount of the public money into the Exchequer: I am aware that sums are charged upon branches of the revenue; but would it not be as well to to charge them on the Consolidated Fund generally; and in that case there would be no necessity for their being redeemed, in order to pay the whole amount into the Exchequer?—That is a matter entirely for the consideration of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; it is not one which I can give an opinion upon.

1938. Can you show any necessity, in order to effect a public object, for paying the whole of the revenue into the Exchequer?—If those pensions were transferred, and became a permanent charge upon the Consolidated Fund, and removed from the revenue, then the gross revenue could be paid in.

1939. There was one instance in which a high degree of patriotism was shown; the case of the Marquis of Camden, who resigned to the public a very large pension to which he was entitled?—It was not a pension at all. The Marquis Camden was entitled by virtue of the office which he held, I believe the office of Teller of the Exchequer, to a large amount of fees; he considered that those fees were larger than he was justified in drawing, for the services which he performed for the public; and I believe he retained 2,700 l. a year for his services, and the remainder was paid into the Exchequer.

1940. The original sum which was assigned to him, and to which he was entitled, was 10,000 l., was it not?—It was a very large sum.

1941. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Was not it in the nature of a sinecure office held for life?—Yes; and it dropped with the Marquis Camden.

1942. Are not the hereditary pensions grants made by the Crown in perpetuity to a particular family?—Yes; and many of them have been sold; it is a freehold.

1943. It is in the nature of hereditary property, is it not?—Yes.

1944. Sir James Graham.] They are fixed annuities?—Yes.

1945. Before commutation?—Yes.

1946. Lord Camden's receipts as Teller of the Exchequer, according to his legal title, varied in amount with the fees of the year?—Precisely.

1947. And he by a voluntary act commuted that varying income from fees to a fixed annuity during his life of 2,700 l. a year?—Yes, and he surrendered the difference for the public use.

1948. Sir Henry Willoughby.] Did not those fees vary with the amount of taxation?—They were fees upon the issues of public money.

1949. Sir James Graham.] And the larger the expenditure, the larger his receipts?—Yes.

1950. Sir Henry Willoughby.] You stated, did you not, that so far as the public monies being in the Bank of England are concerned, you consider that the issues of the money may be safely managed, and payments made by the Treasury and by the Pay-office?—Yes.

1951. You consider those offices sufficient to perform that work safely?—I think so.

1952. Are you of opinion that they require no control or check whatever up to the period of payment?—There would be just as much check under the proposed plan of paying through the Pay-office under the Treasury authority as there is at present; I see no difference. The Treasury is a department of check; the Treasury does not authorise all the expenditure paid by the Paymaster; that expenditure is authorised by the great naval and military and many of the civil departments; and the duty of the Treasury is to see that those departments keep within the limits of their grants.

1953. If the Treasury could order the receivers of the revenue to pay 213,000 l., is it in the power of the Treasury to order those receivers to pay any sum of money that they think right?—The Treasury can only authorise the payment of charges that are legitimately payable out of the revenue.

1954. Could the receivers of the public revenue exercise a control over the Treasury, and refuse to pay?—I apprehend not; I do not know how far the Treasury power extends over those receivers, but the revenue, till it reaches the Exchequer, is undoubtedly under the sole control of the Executive Government.

1955. Do you mean the Treasury?—I mean the Revenue Boards first, and with power to the Treasury to interfere when their interference is necessary.

1956. You use the word "Treasury;" what does that mean?—The finance department.

1957. Who are the responsible officers?—The Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Board.

1958. What does the Board consist of?—It consists of the First Lord of the Treasury, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and three junior Lords.

1959. Is it not the fact that a great deal of the financial business of the Treasury must be transacted by the secretary?—No doubt a great deal of the financial business of the Treasury is conducted by the secretary.

1960. All those officers hold office at the will of the Crown, and may be removed at a short notice, may they not?—Yes.

1961. In the system that you speak of, may not the Secretary of the Treasury perform a great deal of this business on his own responsibility?—He is supposed, in all important matters, to consult the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Board.

1962. If anything went wrong who would be responsible?—The Board would be responsible.

1963. With regard to the Paymaster-general's office, who is the responsible person in that office?—The Paymaster-general.

1964. Does the Paymaster-general perform any functions at all?—The Paymaster-general does not attend to the details of the duties of the Pay-office, but all the officers in that department act under powers derived from him.

1965. If anything went wrong in the Pay-office, who is responsible?—The Paymaster-general would be responsible to the Treasury.

1966. Does he enter into any security?—No; it would be impossible to require adequate security from an officer having so large a trust.

1967. Is it, in your opinion, a safe system to place those important duties in the hands of a person who performs his functions by deputy?—The whole of the duties of that department are duties of detail, and are conducted under defined regulations laid down in the Minutes of the Treasury; there is no discretion which he can exercise, and therefore when he has given his deputation to different officers to act for him, the business may go on safely, by only calling his attention to points that require new regulations; you cannot expect the Paymaster-general to sit down and draw cheques, or to superintend the working of the cash business of the office. It requires a great deal of previous experience, and he can do no more than give his authority to others to act for him in those detail duties; but whenever a matter arises which requires the exercise of his judgment it is invariably submitted to him.

1968. When the Acts of Parliament impose, as they do, very important duties on the Paymaster-general in that name, is it not a dangerous system that devolves those duties, in point of fact, upon deputies?—I think the manner in which it is done could hardly be improved, unless you abolish the office of Paymaster-general and make the deputy the principal.

1969. Is it not the fact, that the Paymaster-general is occupied in other duties?—He has other duties to perform as Vice-President of the Board of Trade.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

19 June 1856.

1970. You stated, did you not, that you consider the office of Comptroller-general to be a useless office?—It is useless to the extent to which I stated it; as to the mode of conducting the pecuniary business, I think that it might be done more expeditiously and better without that office.

1971. At the beginning of the year there was a certain grant of money voted in supply, 7,632,000 l. under the head of "Provisions, Forage, Fuel, and Light," will you be pleased to state how that sum would pass into the Paymaster-general's office?—The Minister for War is solely responsible for the expenditure of that vote, and from time to time he will issue his orders for payments upon the contracts made for those supplies. When those orders come to the knowledge of the Paymaster-general, he applies to the Treasury for the issue; the Treasury authorises the Exchequer to place that issue to the credit of his account, and the Paymaster-general makes the payment ordered by the Minister for War out of the issue so made.

1972. Does the Treasury exercise any control whatsoever upon that amount of expenditure?—The Treasury can exercise no control over the details of the contracts or the details of the expenditure for the naval and military services. That rests upon the responsibility of the departments entrusted with the application of those votes.

1973. Therefore all that the Treasury has to do, is to see that no greater sum than 7,632,000 l. is paid under that head?—The control of the Treasury is limited to that; but the Minister of War would not alter the scale of allowances without reference to the Treasury for their previous sanction.

1974. Does the application of that money entirely depend upon the Secretary for War?—The Minister for War is solely responsible for the proper application of that money.

1975. Supposing there were what the Paymaster-general might think was an improper demand for payment, has he or his deputy any power to decline to order that payment?—None whatever.

1976. Then what is the check upon the Secretary for War?—The check upon the Secretary for War is the check which Parliament exercises by requiring him to submit to them a detailed estimate of the expenditure which he intends to incur; that is the check which Parliament establishes upon the future. Upon the present, they exercise a check by appointing the Audit Board to watch the progress of the accounts of that expenditure, and to see that no part of it is placed under a wrong vote, and that the accounts are honestly prepared. The check upon the past is when the account of that expenditure is laid before Parliament, and they have an opportunity of calling upon the responsible Minister for any explanation that they think proper as to the application of the votes.

1977. After the expenditure is incurred?—Yes.

1978. And that, in point of fact, is the whole control?—Yes, that is the whole control.

1979. Suppose the Secretary of State for War chose to employ 25,000 l. in building a house at Aldershot or in fireworks, any objection to such an expenditure could only be made after it had been incurred, and it had gone through the audit?—Supposing the Minister for War to do that on his own authority, it could only be detected after the account had been prepared; but it is the practice for the Minister for War, whenever he intends to construct any building which is not specially provided for in the Estimates, to submit the matter to the Treasury, and to receive their sanction for any deviation from the Estimates.

1980. Are such deviations of common occurrence?—The references to the Treasury are numerous upon those points.

1981. Do the Treasury, in point of fact, authorise deviations from the Estimates?—Not from the vote; but in cases of absolute necessity, deviations are sanctioned, provided they are within the limits of the vote; they would authorise the execution of a repair that was not contemplated in the Estimate, provided it did not exceed the funds placed at the disposal of the department by Parliament for works and repairs.

1982. In what shape would that authority of the Treasury be made to appear?—It would be a report made from the Minister for War to the Treasury, and, after consideration by the Board of Treasury, a sanction would be given in the shape of a Treasury Minute.

1983. You

1983. You have spoken of the cash account; who controls that?—The departments to which the cash belongs; the Paymaster-general renders to each department, weekly, a statement of all the sums that he has received on his cash account, and he receives nothing upon that account without previous authority from them.

1984. You have stated that the Pay-office, to a certain extent, is the receiver of the revenue; I think you said to the extent of 300,000 l.?—The Pay-office receives various small sums, from the departments of expenditure principally; I believe 300,000 l. was the amount that I stated.

1985. Do you see nothing objectionable in making the Pay-office an office for the receipt of revenue?—Nothing whatever; on the contrary, a great part of those receipts must be collected through the Pay-office, because they come through the departments of expenditure, whose monies are kept at the Pay-office, and they have no means of making that payment to the Exchequer except through the Paymaster-general. I doubt whether the Exchequer ought to take any cognizance of the monies until they are actually received; and there should be for all the departments some functionary to be responsible for the collection, the same as it is with regard to the great branches of the revenue; for those miscellaneous branches it would be very convenient that the Paymaster-general should be the person responsible for looking after those miscellaneous receipts; there is a danger of their being lost sight of, unless there is somebody whose specific duty it is to watch and collect them.

1986. It is not your opinion that you could remove that receipt of revenue from the Pay-office, so that it should get into the Exchequer?—It all passes into the Exchequer; the Pay-office merely acts as the collector for those sums, and having collected them, it hands them over to the Exchequer.

1987. Do you see any objection to receiving the revenue in the Pay-office?—None whatever; I think that any pecuniary agent will do for the receipt of money as well as for the payment.

1988. Some evidence was given with regard to the 150,000 l. that was paid by the Turkish Government with certain objects. In Question 1713, you were asked this question by Mr. Henley, "Who would be answerable for it to the Turkish Government if the money was not properly appropriated?" and your answer is, "I think the House of Commons"?—I said that if the money was appropriated by the Naval department to naval services; if such an improbable event happened, I thought Parliament would be bound to make it good.

1989. How could the House of Commons know anything about it?—It must come before the House of Commons; if the Navy spent that money it would be shown in their accounts; their accounts come before Parliament, with a certificate from the Audit Board, and a report.

1990. Do you seriously mean to say that the House of Commons would be answerable for the expenditure of a sum of money, of the existence of which they could by possibility know nothing?—I think that in equity they would be bound to make good to the Turkish Government any monies which a public department in this country had misappropriated.

1991. Have you known any other instance of money being expended in the same way as that 150,000 l.?—No; I said that it was quite a special case, that arose out of the war.

1992. You never heard of another case?—I cannot recollect another case of that kind.

1993. There was a little confusion about the misappropriation of money in the Pay-office; and I want to know whether it is not the fact that, for a day, constant misappropriations of money do take place; that is, that monies that arrive by Exchequer credits for one purpose are applied to another?—Yes; but we must not call that misappropriation. The temporary employment of monies drawn for one purpose, for other purposes which have credits in the Exchequer, with the object of lessening the balances at the disposal of the Pay-office, can never be called misappropriation.

1994. It is a fact that, for a day, the Navy money may be expended for Ordnance purposes, or vice versâ?—The practice is this: I will repeat it, that there may be no misunderstanding about it. The monies are drawn from day to day, according to the best estimate that can be formed of the probable demands of the day, and they are placed in the working accounts; and if a service has to be paid for which no credits have been drawn, that service would be be paid; you never could think of rejecting a bill for a service which had funds in the Exchequer, because monies had accidentally not been drawn to meet it; the advance is adjusted on the next issue: so that the service stands in credit as if that payment had not been made out of other monies.

1995. Does that application of money ever last longer than 24 hours?—It might last more than 24 hours, because it must depend very much upon the amount of money required; but it is not the practice ever to issue beyond the credits which can be called for at any moment.

1996. With regard to the monies for civil services, can you state that monies which have been voted for one object have never been applied to another by the order of the Treasury?—No monies for the civil services which have been voted for one service are applied to another.

1997. Are you able to say that that has never been done?—I have laid before the Committee a statement showing the balances at the close of the year, which will show the cases in which that has been done. I think there were two cases; I think one was for Labuan, as to which, after the vote had ceased, some bills were presented for payment, and the Treasury directed them to be paid, and they intend to recover the amount from the Colonial Government. I do not know whether there is another case. With regard to "Stationery" and "Extraordinary Expenses of Foreign Ministers," those were cases in which those expenses were clearly provided for by Parliament out of the extraordinary grant; and they were merely shown as accounts overdrawn, as it was thought better to bring them specially before Parliament, rather than take the excess out of that grant.

1998. Are you able to state, with those exceptions, that such a practice has never been carried out?—I am not aware of any case; the sums remaining on the miscellaneous votes are so large that there is very little danger of that occurring. I have a statement here which shows that the sum remaining on hand of miscellaneous votes on the 31st of March last amounted to 4,177,000*l.*, and with that fund at our disposal we stand in no great danger of exceeding the miscellaneous votes. The Committee are aware that the balances are not surrendered upon those votes from year to year as they are upon the votes for naval and military services.

1999. Who is the judge of what is an "old store"?—The Naval and the Ordnance departments.

2000. Is that a right expression, "Old stores"?—It is an ancient term, which includes all unserviceable stores which are sold, and are not replaced.

2001. Would that include new stores that are not wanted?—Yes, it would include new stores that are not wanted.

2002. Then, in that sense, it would be an incorrect term?—Yes, they are old and unserviceable stores; you may call them unserviceable if they are not wanted.

2003. Who is the executive officer who determines these points?—The local officers at the different establishments; those stores are sold by auction, under the sanction of the departments in London, and the whole sale goes to the account of old stores.

2004. Assuming that it was desirable to make the office of Comptroller-general more efficient, would it be impossible to supply him with information of everything that takes place in the Pay-office from day to day?—There is no difficulty in the Pay-office furnishing any information that may be required.

2005. Has he any information as matters now stand?—None; his duty is limited by Act of Parliament to the issue of public money.

2006. Therefore he is constantly in a state of ignorance of the actual state of the money affairs of the departments?—The application of the monies does not pass under his review, and he knows nothing about it.

2007. Do you see any objection, if you wanted to make his office efficient, to his being informed?—That information must not be derived solely from the Pay-office; it must be derived from the great departments of expenditure; the Pay-office is not the department in which the expenditure is incurred; the expenditure is incurred in those great departments, and the Pay-office has nothing to do but to pay the money that is ordered.

2008. What plan would you suggest in order to afford that information to the office of the Comptroller-general?—That duty, as the Committee are aware, is already performed by the Audit Board, and whether it is necessary that it should should be done twice over, is a question for the Committee to consider. If the Comptroller of the Exchequer were to supersede the Audit Board in their duties, he would have his clerk in each of the departments, or a set of clerks to watch the expenditure.

2009. My question had reference to some means of acquiring a knowledge of the expenditure, as it is actually expending?—The actual application of the money can only be ascertained in the departments where the expenditure takes place.

2010. That can only be done by an officer in each of those departments?—Yes.

2011. Do you see any objections to such a course being adopted?—None whatever, because it is already done in the great departments. I see no objection to an officer being placed there on the part of the Audit Board because it is an audit; but I do not think that it is necessary to set up another audit.

2012. Your view is, that no check is necessary except an effective audit?—I think that an effective audit is the most stringent of all checks.

2013. Sir James Graham.] To whom was the 213,000 l. commutation paid?—It was paid by the revenue departments to the holders of those pensions. I think one was the Duke of Grafton, and the other was a Mr. Eyre, who held a fourth, I believe, of the pension that was granted to the Duke of Schomberg.

2014. How many years' purchase was granted?—Twenty-six years and a fraction.

2015. I will assume that instead of 213,000 l. at 26 years' purchase, 400,000 l., or about 40 years' purchase, were given in the first instance, there was no check upon the Treasury commuting for the larger sum, was there?—No; it rested entirely upon the fidelity of the Treasury.

2016. In illustration of the check after payment, on which you rely, the discretion of the Treasury in giving only 26 years' purchase instead of 40 years' purchase was exercised under the certainty that the sum paid would at last be known to Parliament?—Precisely, and we took the earliest opportunity of laying the information before Parliament.

2017. But if they had not taken the earliest opportunity of doing so, the finance accounts when presented would have shown the payment?—Yes, they must have shown the payment as one of the charges paid out of the revenue.

2018. Then the prodigal grant to the Duke of Grafton must have appeared?—Yes, it must have appeared then.

2019. The Minister who had made that improvident bargain must have been responsible to Parliament?—He must have been; publicity is the great check upon all Governments.

2020. Applying your doctrine to that transaction, do you think that a more efficient check upon the discretion of the Treasury in making that bargain could be provided than that of publicity and responsibility to Parliament?—I think that that is the best check that you can have.

2021. Would any intervention of the Comptroller of the Exchequer have been more efficient?—No; the Comptroller of the Exchequer could hardly question the act of the Government in that respect; he must have issued the money which the Treasury authorised.

2022. If you gave to the Comptroller of the Exchequer the right of interference after issue, with reference to expenditure and appropriation, would he not be lord over the Treasury, over the First Lord of the Treasury and the First Minister of the Crown?—He would be lord over the whole of the public departments; he would have the power to question all the expenditure, and with very limited knowledge.

2023. What would become of Parliamentary responsibility if he exercised that control; and what would be the responsibility of the Executive Government?—There would be none at all; he would be really an officer of Parliament interfering with every department.

2024. Would he not be lord paramount over the whole expenditure?—Yes; he might interfere, and question every contract that was made for carrying on the public service, and every act of the Government.

2025. If he were captious and minute in his interference, would it be possible for the great departments to conduct their daily business?—I doubt whether you you would find ministers who would undertake to conduct the business of those departments.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

19 June 1856.

2026. With regard to the Paymaster, he personally does not draw any money, or interfere with the issues of money?—No, he never touches the money; he or his deputy can only write off from the accounts at the Bank to the issuing accounts which are operated upon by others.

2027. With regard to the abuse of the power which the Paymaster-general qua paymaster enjoys, are not checks devised as stringent as expert accountants can frame against the danger of tampering with the public money?—I think that the checks are as perfect as they can be.

2028. Are they multifarious?—Yes; but at the same time the checks are not of such a character or so numerous as to interfere with the proper execution of the business; the arrangement of the business is such that no operation is done twice, and where you have different officers who conduct different parts of the business, they act as a check upon each other.

2029. You for a long time conducted that business, did you not?—For 16 years I was the responsible officer in that department.

2030. You are not now immediately connected with it?—I am not.

2031. After your long experience, can you suggest anything more effectual than the checks which exist at present?—Nothing. The checks are, I think, perfect in that office against tampering with the public money.

2032. That is the result of your long experience in an office with which you are no longer connected?—Yes.

2033. Chairman.] You have been asked with regard to the control which would be vested in the Comptroller of the Exchequer; supposing a clerk of his office was placed in the Paymaster's office, and you have expressed a strong opinion that it would be an interference and check upon the public service, is the existence of a clerk of the Audit-office in all the departments of the great services any check whatever upon the public services?—The question put to me was, whether, if you gave the Comptroller of the Exchequer the power of interfering with the acts of the great departments, it would not seriously derange the business of those departments; and it was not applicable solely to the Pay-office, because the Pay-office has nothing to do with conducting the expenditure, but only making payments which are legally authorised.

2034. If an officer of the Exchequer, with an officer from the Audit-office were in the Paymaster-general's office, with the view of reporting to Parliament whether the rules laid down were carried out in the Paymaster's office, would that be any check upon the public services?—No. There would be nothing in the Pay-office which would interfere with the conduct of the business in the respective departments.

2035. It would be merely furnishing Parliament with a report as to whether the rules which Parliament might choose to lay down were carried out or not?—That is all that it would be.

2036. Mr. Cardwell.] In your opinion the nature of that control to which your attention has been last directed corresponds more with the established functions of the Board of Audit, than with those of the Comptroller of the Exchequer?—Precisely; it is to do in the Pay-office that which is done by the audit clerks in the other departments, only it cannot go so directly to appropriation in that office as it does in the naval and military departments, because the expenditure is not finally appropriated to the votes in that office. I do not know of what use the Comptroller's clerk would be in the Pay-office. I can see no practical benefit that would arise; but it is quite practicable for him to see that the accounts are properly prepared.

2037. Still if the Comptroller's clerk were there he would be discharging functions which more properly belong to a clerk from the Audit Board?—Yes; he would have no vouchers placed before him to enable him to do the duty properly. For instance, a bill comes before him, simply an order for payment from the naval department: "Pay to A. B. 10,000 l., and charge it to stores;" he could do nothing more than see that the Paymaster had that authority, but whether it was for stores or not he would have no means of finding out. But the Audit clerk, who sees that document before it is issued from the department, has the invoice of the contractor before him, the contract and other vouchers upon which that bill is made out, and he has, therefore, a real control; the other would have none.

2038. I think I collect from your evidence that in your opinion the whole idea of Exchequer control belongs to a period of remote antiquity, when the payments were made by actual transfers of cash?—To a period when the Exchequer actually received the cash, and had the custody of it, and even to a certain extent the payment of it; which continued up to a recent period.

2039. Is it your opinion that in order to make the theory of the Exchequer control complete and effective, we must in a great degree forego those advantages which the modern system of banking and finance have introduced into the transactions of the public departments?—Undoubtedly you must make a very great change indeed before you can carry out the Exchequer control.

2040. Sir James Graham.] Must you not go back instead of going forward, if you remodel the Exchequer in this sense?—Yes, for at least three quarters of a century, to 1780, when Parliament found so much fault with the accumulation of the balances, and you must allow such a balance as I think would imply danger to the public interests.

2041. Mr. Cardwell.] You do not differ from the Comptroller of the Exchequer in thinking that great improvements are to be effected in the control of the public monies?—There is no difference of opinion between any of us as to the objects; it is only as to the mode in which those objects are to be carried out.

2042. You would proceed in a direction entirely opposite to that in which the Comptroller would proceed?—Precisely. I think that practically the mode which the Comptroller suggests would never work efficiently or simply.

2043. Chairman.] Those duties which you have spoken of are, as you say, not those of audit; you can have no audit in the Paymaster's office; the clerk who would be there from the Audit-office would have no vouchers to look at?—None beyond the documents upon which the payments are made, which in themselves would furnish him with no information beyond perhaps the amount chargeable against the vote, if the payment belonged to a vote.

2044. Suppose Parliament were to lay down a rule of this kind: that if you had overdrawn your credits one day that should be set right the next, it would not be known, would it, whether that rule was observed or not, unless there was some check in the Paymaster's office?—There is no objection to any check whatever of that kind; the Pay-office may fearlessly throw open its transactions to the whole world; there is nothing there to conceal.

2045. I am not blaming the Pay-office, who have acted upon the notion that the Treasury seem to have entertained as to the mode of appropriating public money; but I ask you whether, if Parliament thought that a stricter appropriation would be necessary, there would be any difficulty in carrying it out by having a clerk at the Pay-office to ascertain that the regulations were carried out?—There is no difficulty whatever in it. If Parliament were to lay down rules, they would be observed, whether there was a clerk there or not. The Paymaster is not an officer who is interested in deviating from the regulations laid down; but you must lay down this principle, either it must be done with the smallest balance that is necessary to carry on the service, or you must remove that restriction and let him have an unlimited balance.

2046. You have stated that you did not see how anything can be known under the proposed alteration, which would not be known now, and that the rule laid down now is, that things should be set right with regard to the credits by the next day. With regard to the money voted for the Duke of Wellington's funeral, is it not the fact that for two years that money, being a surplus, has been applied to other services than that for which Parliament voted it?—The question with regard to the Duke of Wellington's funeral is precisely that which would occur on any day; the money was issued at an earlier period than it was wanted, and it was used immediately for any services that came in course of payment, and on the following day the money for the services which had been overdrawn would be drawn to replace that credit right on the books again, and so on for the whole period.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

arose with the different parties who had to conduct that funeral; their charges were deemed excessive, and the Treasury endeavoured to cut them down; in some cases they were referred to arbitration, and that led to delay; accidents of that kind will occur, and I do not think that a solitary case of that kind should be taken up to illustrate a system.

2048. You have stated, have you not, that you do not understand how anything would be known by Parliament that was not known at present; would such a fact as that, first, that the Treasury had issued the money without any application from the Paymaster; and next, that that money had been drawn upon before the sum was actually wanted; and thirdly, that the surplus had been applied to a variety of other services, have been known at once by Parliament if somebody had been there to report the fact?—You cannot say that the surplus of that vote has been applied to other services; the money which was drawn may have been temporarily used for other services, but not a sixpence of that money has been applied, taking it in its final sense, or expended for other services; the money is still forthcoming for its original service.

2049. The fact that for two years it has been temporarily used for other services would not have come out before Parliament?—Undoubtedly; but it would have been known at any time by any return which Parliament might have required the Pay-office to prepare, whether there was an officer there or not; if Parliament calls upon the Pay-office to lay before the House a statement embracing those transactions, Parliament would know it from that statement, whether there was a clerk there or not.

2050. It was not known until this Committee was appointed; would not it have been known if there had been a person present who was bound to report whether the regulations were carried out?—A party stationed there by Parliament, and making a report to Parliament, would undoubtedly have brought it to the knowledge of Parliament, but it would have been brought to their knowledge without that if Parliament had wished to have information, by calling for a return; if Parliament chose to direct a return to be annually prepared, as they do in regard to the other offices, that information would have appeared.

2051. With regard to that 150,000 l. that came into the hands of the Pay-office from the Turkish Government, will you say whether that is not a fact which might not have come out by a report to Parliament, supposing there had been an officer present whose duty it was to have reported it?—I do not think that that transaction was really of such importance that Parliament need know much about it; it was a fact that in the heat of the war, the Turkish Government wishing certain purchases to be made for them in this country, solicited the aid of the Government for that purpose, and they handed over to them the money to make them.

2052. Leaving to Parliament the decision as to whether those things are important to be known or not, would it not have been known if there had been an individual, whether a clerk of the Audit or the Exchequer, in the office to report?—That transaction could have been known without placing an officer in the Pay-office; as it was a naval transaction it passed under the cognisance of the Audit-office, and I do not see why, if it was necessary to state it to Parliament, the auditor could not have done so on the naval account.

2053. You stated, did you not, that the auditor would in all probability not do so?—I stated that I did not think that he would consider it a transaction which came within the line of his duty, but there is no difficulty in his doing so.

2055. Suppose anything of that nature took place at this time, will you state when the report of the auditor would come to the knowledge of Parliament?—Eight months after the expiration of the year, the naval account is made up and laid before Parliament in the session that immediately follows the expiration of the year.

2058. The navy account would be closed in October 1857, would it not?—Yes.

2059. The report would be made, would it not, at the beginning of the session of 1858?—Precisely.

2060. Then it would come to the knowledge of Parliament about two years after the transaction had taken place?—Yes; if it took place now.

2061. Mr. Wilson.] Could a clerk from the Exchequer in the Pay-office do anything more than the annual account laid before Parliament could do?—That would depend entirely upon what the regulations laid down by Parliament might be; but if the House required him to make a monthly report to Parliament upon the accounts of this department, it would be seen monthly during the sitting of Parliament.

2062. Would it be compatible with carrying on the public business that any clerk should take upon himself the responsibility of calling in question the estimate that the Paymaster makes one day of the payments that he is to make on the following day?—No clerk could question that estimate unless he had a better knowledge of what was forthcoming than the Pay-office.

2063. Would not it be devolving upon the clerk the whole of the duties and the responsibility of the Pay-office, if he had to control the amount of money that the Paymaster himself might call for?—Undoubtedly; if he had the power of interference it would seriously derange the business of that office.

2064. Supposing he did not take that function upon him, might it not be that issues might be received from the Exchequer, as at present, which might not be required on the following day, or for some time to come?—Yes.

2065. All that he could do, would be, in the account, to state that such issues had been made and not expended?—Yes; he could only report the fact.

2066. Then he could only report what the account would give?—Nothing more.

2067. Sir James Graham.] You do not contend that the check on the expenditure of the miscellaneous estimates, as now existing, is a perfect check?—No; on the contrary, I have stated that I thought the checks upon those estimates were imperfect. In the first place, I think it is wrong that the unexpended balances of votes should be carried on from year to year, because, although it is not considered a misappropriation at present to do so, yet practically it is so. If a surplus remains on the grant of one year, it is carried forward and expended in the next; that is practically a misappropriation of the money, though it is expended for the same object. I think we should have a more perfect account of the expenditure of those votes, and that the system which has been already established for the naval and military services should be extended to the whole of the votes of Parliament.

2068. To the miscellaneous votes and civil contingencies?—Yes; and that it should also extend to the expenses which are permanently charged upon the Consolidated Fund.

2070. You would extend that rule to the civil contingencies and the whole of the miscellaneous estimates?—To the whole of the expenditure of the country.

2071. You would introduce, would you not, as to those estimates, a daily audit by a clerk from the Audit-office?—I think that it is a part of the system of control that they should check the appropriation of that account, so that Parliament may have a guarantee that the account is a true and honest statement.

2073. It is a certain check; and your doctrine is that that certainty operates as a moral check of the strongest kind?—I think so.

2074. You rely upon that certainty?—I should rely upon that check as the best that can be established.

2075. And that, if it be effectual as a single check, has all the advantage of simplicity?—

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

19 June 1856.

simplicity?—It has this great advantage also, that it does not interfere with the current operations of Government. The business progresses in its ordinary course; and if anything is done which may appear to be at variance with the intentions of Parliament, the whole of the documents are placed before the auditors, and they exercise their judgment upon it, and report to Parliament their opinion.

2076. As an accountant, you regard a single check, if simple and effectual, as greatly to be preferred to multiplied checks which are not more stringent?—Undoubtedly, and that check should be applied to facts, and not to estimates; because to check the application of money upon the first issue, it must be done upon the estimate, and the check is not final; but when you come to a check after expenditure, the vouchers are complete, and there is no getting away from the facts; but before payment, or even during the progress of the payments through the Pay-office, it is an intermediate stage; it is not the final charge against the Vote of Parliament. There is a clause in the Act under which the Naval and Military accounts are prepared, which says that nothing in the nature of imprest or of advance, for the final expenditure of which the vouchers have not been returned, shall be charged against the votes in those accounts.

2077. That check in the original Act applied, did it not, to the naval service?—Yes; it is a very necessary check.

2078. Is not the Audit Board altogether independent of the various departments whose accounts it audits?—It is independent of the Government.

2079. Therefore it is not a departmental audit, but an independent audit?—Yes; the appropriation audit is independent.

2080. Would it be possible for Parliament to enact that, if that audit were extended through all the departments, and anything were discovered by them at variance with the appropriation intended by Parliament, or rather, enjoined by the Annual Appropriation Act, they should make a special report to Parliament?—Nothing would be easier than that. In any revision of the duties of the Audit Board, it would be far better if there were any deficiency in the present system of audit, that it should be amended, than that an entirely new machinery should be set up, which might clash with the other.

2081. Instead of having double machinery, from the very circumstance of its being double and therefore complicated, if it were necessary to strengthen the audit, it ought to be by operating upon the existing Audit Board?—I think so; and by extending a system which, from experience, is found to be really effective.

2082. In your opinion, if that were done effectually, as you think it might be done, the remnant of the old Exchequer, the ruin now left standing, might be obliterated?—I think so.

2083. Mr. Williams.] You have stated that you think that all the unexpended portions of the votes at the termination of the financial year should be returned to the Exchequer?—Yes.

2084. Do not you think that it would be also desirable that the unexpended portions of the votes should be laid before Parliament in detail, stating the various items that had been unexpended?—Precisely so; it is done as to the naval and military expenditure; the excess or saving is shown on each separate vote, and the net result is the sum which is either voted or surrendered to Parliament. If an account were prepared in a similar form for all miscellaneous services, the same course would be adopted, and the amount of vote for each service, the amount of expenditure for it, and the balance remaining unexpended, would be shown in the account itself; so that the whole detail of the surplus grants would be shown to Parliament annually in the account of the expenditure of those grants.

2085. How soon is that account rendered to Parliament as to the army and navy?—The navy are allowed eight months for the preparation of their account; the army, commissariat, and ordnance have been allowed 12 months, owing to the large amount of the imprest expenditure which takes place abroad. The principle upon which the account is prepared is, that it shall embrace the whole of the expenditure for those services at home and abroad within the period of the account. It is therefore necessary to allow time for the receipt of all those accounts from the most distant stations, for the final examination and audit of them after they are received, and for the preparation of the annual balance sheet for Parliament.

2086. Then you think that the difficulty on account of a part of the expenditure being abroad would be too great to have a statement prepared so soon after the termination of the financial year?—It would be impossible to present a finally appropriated account immediately after the termination of the year. If Parliament desired it I can see no reason why they should not have a provisional statement showing the state of the transactions up to the period when the account might be prepared.

2087. So that the unappropriated part of the money should be paid back into the Treasury, and a statement, as soon as possible, showing the amounts in detail, be laid before Parliament?—You could have two accounts, the provisional account of the year made up as closely as possible to the termination of the year, and the finally appropriated account after the whole of the transactions of the year have been completed.

2088. Chairman.] You have stated that the Admiralty is an independent Board; has the Treasury no power of directing the expenditure to be made without account?—The Treasury have that power, and I believe it is exercised in regard to a number of small services, such as travelling expenses of schoolmasters, inspectors of anatomy, and other trifling matters.

2089. It is the case that they have that power?—Yes.

2091. Can you state by what authority the whole of the Commissariat accounts used to be audited by the Audit-office?—While they were Treasury accounts they were audited by the Audit-office.

2093. Without any authority or sanction from Parliament whatever?—None.

2094. By a mere Minute of the Treasury?—Yes.

2095. Supposing there is any question between the Audit Board and the authorities at the Admiralty as to any item in the naval account, who decides it?—If there is any difference of opinion between the Audit Board and the Admiralty, as to the mode of presenting any transaction in the naval account, it rests with the Treasury, under the Act of Parliament, to decide the mode in which that shall be presented to Parliament; but the Act requires that the report of the Commissioners of Audit shall be laid before Parliament with the account.

2096. But the Treasury decide?—The Treasury decide the manner in which it is to be presented; if there is a difference of opinion, the Treasury come in as umpire, and decide in what manner the items shall be presented to Parliament in the naval account.

2097. The question being in this case between Parliament and the Executive, the Treasury decide how the account is to be made?—Those are questions which are provided for in the Act; a difference of opinion in the classification of an item in the account may arise, as, for instance, whether it should appear under "stores," or under "works;" if there is a difference of opinion upon that point, and the Audit Board and the Admiralty cannot agree, the papers are referred to the Treasury; each party states his case, and the Treasury decide according to the best of their judgment under what head it shall be placed in the account; if the auditors differed from the Treasury, those reports would be laid before Parliament with the account, so that ultimately Parliament would be the judge as to whether the Treasury or the Audit Board were right.

2098. Parliament would know that, but the Audit Board in those cases cannot act against the decision of the Treasury?—The order would be sent to the department which prepares the account; it is only a question as to whether the item should appear under one head of service or under another; when the Treasury decide that question they send their order to the department to place it under the vote to which it belongs.

2099. Supposing a question about old stores arose, whether a sum were to be carried to the Exchequer or not, and there was a difference of opinion upon that point, point, it would be decided by the Treasury, would it not?—The Treasury would give their orders to the Admiralty as to the mode in which that item should be presented in the accounts.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

19 June 1856.

2100. The Audit Board could not act upon their own independent opinion?—The Audit Board have no power of altering the account; the department prepares the account and the Audit Board examine it, and make their report to Parliament on the different items; if the Treasury should decide against the judgment of the auditors, the auditors would, in their report upon the account, call the attention of Parliament to the disputed item, and give their reasons why they considered that the Treasury decision was an improper one.

2101. You consider that the present arrangement is perfect with regard to preventing the expenditure exceeding the estimate?—I consider that the audit is perfect as regards the objects for which it was established, which was to give security to Parliament that the accounts presented to them, showing the actual expenditure of the monies voted, are true. It was never intended by the Act that the Board of Audit should have any power of interfering with the discretion of the department as to incurring expenditure; but that the departments should have no power of concealing from Parliament any act of theirs in connection with that expenditure.

2102. The whole principle being the very wise one of not interfering with the action of the executive, but of giving Parliament a perfect knowledge of what was going on within the department?—Precisely to give Parliament the means of calling upon the Minister to explain.

2103. Until you had that Paul Pry, the department was in the habit of neglecting the appropriation?—Yes, the appropriation was neglected until the audit was established.

2104. With regard to the actual expenditure, will you be so good as to ate whether it is a perfect check upon the Admiralty, not expending beyond the sum voted by Parliament?—The Admiralty have the power of expending beyond the grant of Parliament, but they cannot do it without the knowledge of Parliament.

2105. Supposing that the First Lord of the Admiralty, or the Admiralty Board, were pleased to enter into a contract for a certain article, and payment for that article being made on the 1st of April, how would that be known to Parliament?—The Committee are aware probably that the vote for the purchase of stores is taken, not for the expenditure of stores in a year, but for the purchase of stores to be placed in the storehouses; therefore, if the Admiralty wanted to expend more, they have nothing to do but to open their stores; they need not play any tricks with the money; they have full power to spend more for stores in the year than Parliament has voted for the purchase of stores.

2106. They can do that if they please to do it?—Yes, undoubtedly. I do not see what power you can place over the executive in a matter of that kind.

2108. In point of fact, the Admiralty and other great departments also, may, if they please to do so, spend money, and postpone the payment to another year, may they not?—They cannot very well postpone the payments, unless their contracts are so framed, but there is generally a specified period for making such payments; prompt payment is the rule of the department.

2111. Mr. Wilson.] Nor do the payments represent them?—No, they do not. Parliament does not vote money for that object; it does not say you shall spend so much for stores in the year. It merely says, "We grant you so much for the purchase of stores;" and those stores may not be expended for years.

2112. Chairman.]

2112. Chairman.] And Parliament is simple enough to suppose that that represents what the expenditure really is?—No; after war there must be a great accumulation of stores, and the first thing to be done ought to be to consume the extra stock, and not to ask for additional money from Parliament to make fresh purchases; therefore, after a war, the first vote would be smaller than the expenditure of the year in which that vote was taken.

2113. Mr. Cardwell.] What the Board of Audit cannot accomplish in the inspection and the control of the consumption of stores, could the Comptroller of the Exchequer accomplish by any mechanism that you can suggest?—No; he would be in the same position as the auditors in that respect; the expenditure for stores is a matter upon which no Parliamentary check is established.

2115. We have heard that since the union of the Commissariat department with the War department, the Commissariat audit has been removed from the Audit Board and transferred to the War-office?—That is the fact.

2116. That, of course, is for convenience, under the impression that the audit can be carried on more efficiently at the War-office than elsewhere?—That is the object, and also to establish something like uniformity in the mode of examination of the great army account. It would hardly do in a great department like the War department to have a portion of the account examined in their own office, and another portion examined in another department. The auditors have still a certain control over those accounts, inasmuch as they come again under their review with regard to the Parliamentary audit.

2119. But what we want to know is, whether there would be any difficulty in having within the War-office itself a concurrent audit conducted by officers who were responsible only to the Commissioners of Audit?—That audit does exist as regards the appropriation of the grants. The Audit Board have their officers in the War department; watching from day to day the progress of the preparation of the account; that already exists in that department.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

department, where there was already an audit branch established, it naturally fell within the duties of that department.

2121. But you said, in answer to a previous question, that there would be no difficulty in investing the Commissioners of Audit with the power, and imposing upon them the duty, of making a special report to Parliament whenever anything occurred in any public department which appeared to them to be inconsistent with the intentions of Parliament?—Precisely.

2122. I ask you whether there would be any difficulty in letting the persons who conducted the audit be responsible, not to the office whose accounts they are auditing, but to the Commissioners of Audit; so that if that office sanctioned any expenditure which might appear to be inconsistent with the intention of Parliament, the officers should report it to their superiors, the Commissioners of Audit, and the Commissioners of Audit, if they thought proper, should exercise that power, and discharge that duty which you contemplate, of making an independent and special report to Parliament?—The auditors could perform that duty now, because all the accounts as they are examined in the department are immediately placed before the auditors when the entry of them is made in the books; therefore if there is anything in those accounts which they consider inconsistent with the appropriation directed by Parliament, they have a knowledge of it at the moment the first account is placed before them.

2123. Does not it make a great difference in the audit, whether the detail of the audit is conducted by a person immediately subordinate to the person who is to judge of the audit?—I am afraid that the auditors could not conduct a duty of that kind. It appears to me that they would be still bound to conduct it according to the rules laid down by the Minister for War; all those regulations are framed by the authority under which the expenditure is incurred, and he is the fittest person to see that those regulations have been observed.

2124. No doubt they must conduct it according to instructions received from the Minister of War, but they would have an opportunity, if they doubted the propriety of those instructions, of reporting directly to Parliament?—It would be giving the auditors a power over the Minister, which I think they ought not to have.

2125. Then you qualify your former answer; do not you think it is expedient that the Audit Board should have in such a case the power of making a special report to Parliament?—My former answer referred to any clear case of misappropriation which they might think it necessary to call the attention of Parliament to, before they have finally reported upon the account, and not to a case in which they might exercise their judgment upon the necessity of an expense, and consider that the Minister for War had made a regulation of which they might not approve, such, for instance, as increasing the ration of the soldier.

2126. That is a matter of expenditure, and not a matter of audit; but the objection to the efficiency of the control by the audit was, that it would frequently be two years after the occurrence of the transaction before the final report of the Board of Audit was made, and Parliament would be aware of the departure. In order to obviate that difficulty, I understood you to say that the auditors might be invested with the power of making forthwith a special report to Parliament, whenever a case appeared to be sufficiently important to require it?—Precisely. I referred then to a case of misappropriation to which it might be desirable to call the immediate attention of Parliament.

2127. Do you think as matters now stand, that they are informed sufficiently?—Yes; because the documents are placed before the auditors from day to day. This account is not made up at the close of the year; it is a general account which is prepared from day to day throughout the year, and throughout the period allowed after the expiration of a year for bringing in the final accounts; it would be hopeless to audit an account of that kind if it was not prepared till the close of the year.

2128. Then what difficulty would arise if the persons who prepared it were servants of the Board of Audit instead of being servants of the War department?—I do not see that any object would be gained by making them servants of the Board of Audit; that Board has the same means through the inspectors, whom they place in those departments, of ascertaining the truth of every transaction which is recorded, as if they prepared the account themselves; it would be a mere transfer of the establishment from the departments to the Audit Office.

2129. Mr. Wilson.] In point of fact, the Board of Audit does now prepare the account, as an officer of the Board of Audit approves every entry prior to its being made?—Yes, he checks every entry that is made in the books and all the vouchers upon which the account is prepared, and as soon as the entries are made, the books and vouchers are placed before the officers of the Audit Board.

2130. The department examines the transactions of the office, and the Board of Audit sees that those accounts on examination are placed under their proper heads?—Yes, they examine the documents to see that they have undergone the usual official examination, and that the sums are charged to their proper accounts.

2131. With regard to the removal of the audit of the Commissariat account which has been alluded to, is there any difference now in the change that has been made between the audit of the Commissariat accounts and those of all the other large departments?—No; they are now uniform with the general system; before that transfer took place, it was an exception to the system.

2132. Was not it the fact, that the Board of Audit before performed a double function as to the Commissariat accounts; that is the function of examining the accounts in detail which is performed by the department itself, and the function of audit besides, and that in consequence of the Treasury having no officer to examine within their department?—Yes, they conducted in that case two audits.

2133. Then the same audit still remains to the Board of Audit with regard to the Commissariat accounts that has always been there as to the Naval and Army accounts?—Precisely.

2135. Would the Treasury have any power to limit the functions of the Board of Audit with regard to the audit of appropriations which they exercise as to the War department now?—That is settled by the Act of Parliament; the Treasury could exercise no power of that kind.

2136. The only power which the Treasury could exercise, was that of removing the first examination of those accounts, which they themselves had vested in the Audit Board for convenience?—Yes; they were accounts of expenditure incurred by the Treasury; the Treasury, having no Audit department of its own, sent them to the Audit Board for examination.

2137. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Was not that transfer made by the Treasury in connection with the other changes involved in the consolidation of the War departments?—It necessarily followed upon the consolidation of the Commissariat with the War department.

2138. Was not that consolidation made with the full cognizance and approbation of Parliament?—Yes, it was made under pressure from Parliament.

2140. Before they were removed to the Treasury Chambers the Lord High Treasurer, and the other principal officers of the Treasury, performed their duties in the office of the Exchequer, did they not?—Yes, they did.

2141. About the time of the Restoration, the Lord High Treasurer and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the other chief officers of the Exchequer, were removed into the Chambers in Whitehall?—Yes.

2142. By that change, the chief superintendence of the finance department was taken out of the Exchequer, was it not?—Yes; it then remained with the Treasury.

2143. Therefore, after that change the Exchequer became the bank of the Government, and also it contained certain subordinate officers, who exercised control upon the issues of money deposited in the Exchequer?—Yes; it was a department supposed to exercise a control over the Treasury issues.

2144. Did it not exercise its control in this way, that the whole of the public money was paid into the Exchequer, and there were certain auditors or tellers in the Exchequer who exercised a control over the issues of that money?—Precisely; the Exchequer had then the real custody of the monies, and held them in the Exchequer.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

19 June 1856.

2145. The monies were actually paid into the Exchequer, and paid out of the Exchequer?—Yes.

2146. And the Exchequer took certain receipts for payments in the form of tally sticks?—Yes.

2147. At what time was it that the practice of paying the public money into the Bank of England was established by Act of Parliament?—It was done at different periods, I believe; as to different services; I think it was not finally carried out till the present Exchequer Act was passed.

2148. Was it done in successive periods during the last century?—Yes.

2149. Did not some branches of the revenue continue to pay into the Exchequer, up to the Exchequer Act of 1834?—Yes; payments were made into the Exchequer Office up to that date.

2150. In the year 1834 the Exchequer ceased to receive any actual payments of money, and became merely an office of account, did it not?—That was the change that took place in 1834.

2151. Having formerly been the Treasury, and having been the office in which those officers exercised the control over the financial department, and also being the bank of the Government, it ceased to be the Treasury, and it ceased to be the bank of the Government?—It did.

2154. Will you just explain to the Committee the extent to which the Treasury at present is a department of expenditure?—Without the Miscellaneous Estimates, I can hardly go through the services which are still controlled by the Treasury; but take the first class; as to the great services, the Treasury is not a department of expenditure; now that the Commissariat is removed, there is no portion of the Naval or Military expenditure which is authorised by the Treasury. Then we come to the Miscellaneons Estimates; nearly the whole of Class 1, which relates to public works and buildings, is managed either by the Board of Works in England, or the Board of Works in Ireland; the Treasury do not manage that expenditure. Class 2 embraces the salaries of the different departments; no salary can be granted without the authority of the Treasury; but the Treasury having fixed the establishments, and Parliament having voted the amount, the different departments give their orders upon the Paymaster-general direct without the interference of the Treasury. The third class relates to law and justice, and also to Government prisons and convict hulks. There is a department under the Home-office which directs a great part of that expenditure; it is called the Department of the Directors of Convict Prisons; the whole of that expenditure is managed by them under the directions of the Home Secretary. With regard to the law charges, they depend entirely upon the expense incurred; the Treasury have nothing to do with these matters but to order the payment after the charges have been taxed by their solicitor. With regard to the fourth class, the principal item in that relates to education; the Committee of Council on Education expend that vote, and the Treasury exercise no control over its application; the Council give their orders direct upon the Paymaster. Class 5 relates principally to the salaries of the colonial establishments; they are small votes, and the Treasury, in connexion with the Colonial departments, may fix the salaries, but when once they are fixed, the parties draw periodically direct upon the Paymaster. There is little opportunity for any misappropriation in any of those votes. In the 6th class, the largest amount is the superannuations; these are granted by the Treasury under Act of Parliament; and if they relate to the Naval and Military departments, a communication is made from the Treasury to those departments, and those departments authorise the Paymaster to pay. As to the Civil departments, the Treasury give their orders direct upon the Paymaster; the Pensions are fixed sums, which are granted in conformity with an Act of Parliament. Then with regard to the Miscellaneous Services, which are in Class 7, most of them are specific grants which Parliament sanctions, and the Treasury only pay within the limits of those grants; there is very little opportunity for any improper improper expenditure as to those grants. The only vote which remains is that for Civil Contingencies, and that is entirely at the disposal of the Treasury.

2156. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] With regard to making direct payments, is the power of the Treasury limited very much to the disposal of the sums granted for Civil Contingencies, and the payments of the salaries of their own department?—Those are the principal items over which they exercise any control; there are various accounts which are examined at the Treasury before payment, such as the maintenance of prisoners in county gaols and the removal of convicts; but all those charges are settled by Act of Parliament, and the Treasury have nothing to do, when those accounts come in, but to see that the charges are according to the rates fixed, and to order the payment of them out of the grant of Parliament for that service.

2157. With regard to the amount of the payments for the entire service of the Government, the Treasury exercise a general control; but with regard to making those payments, the detail duty rests with the individual departments, does it not?—Principally so; and even where the Treasury order payments in detail, it is not for expenditure actually incurred by them, but by the departments which conduct the service; the Treasury order the payments by way of controlling the expenditure.

2158. The great functions of the Treasury may be described not as expenditure, but as the control of expenditure?—Entirely; it is a department of control over other departments; that is the real function of the Board of Treasury.

2161. Then the control exercised by the Treasury over the general expenditure is only partial under all circumstances?—The great departments charged with the execution of the public business are the departments that really control the expenditure. The control of the Treasury is of a general character, to see that those departments keep within the limits of the sums appropriated by Parliament for their respective departments.

2162. That same function is exercised, is it not, by the Comptroller-general as well?—The Comptroller-general has also a similar duty to perform.

2163. Mr. Wilson.] Before any of those applications are made to Parliament by any department, is it not their duty to apply to the Treasury and obtain the sanction of the Treasury for that expenditure, as a preliminary step beforehand?—Yes. The necessity for incurring that expenditure is of course discussed between the department and the Treasury before a vote is asked for; the control of the Treasury comes in before Parliament is asked to vote the expense.

2164. And it is only after Parliament has sanctioned a certain vote made to a department, that that department becomes no longer accountable to the Treasury for that expenditure, but accountable to Parliament?—Precisely.

2166. Do you conceive that his remarks apply in any way to the Exchequer, his own office?—No; I think not.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

19 June 1856.

2167. Do you understand them as applying exclusively to the Pay-office?—I think that they apply to the Pay-office, and indirectly to the Treasury, as having framed the regulations for the conduct of the Pay-office.

2168. That is to say, the Treasury ought to establish a different set of regulations with respect to the Pay-office, but as regards the practice of the Treasury itself he does not object?—No; I think it is after all really a question of balances. The Treasury feel that great responsibility rests upon them for the proper employment of the public balances, and for the safe custody of them; they think that it is necessary therefore to give the Paymaster only the sum required for carrying on the public service from day to day; and one of the first duties of the Treasury is to look to that. That principle is inconsistent with what Lord Monteagle considers ought to be the rule for conducting those payments. He thinks that there should be a sum in the Paymaster's hands upon each separate vote. To carry out that system would place at the disposal of the Paymaster so large a sum, that the Treasury, in fulfilling the duty which strictly belongs to them, naturally object to place the public money in such large amounts, in the hands of an officer having the power to draw upon it; but the whole question really resolves itself into a question of balances.

2169. There would be no difficulty in carrying that principle into effect, provided the accounts were made more complex, and the public were subjected to greater risk as to the amount of money placed at the disposal of the Paymaster?—No doubt that would enable us to carry on the service more in conformity with Lord Monteagle's views. If you remove the restriction as to the amount of the balance, making it an unlimited balance, and also remove the restriction as to the cash account, so that the monies paid in to that account may be kept, and only used for the services for which they are paid in, if you do away with existing safeguards, and neglect the public interests, Lord Monteagle's views may be carried out more closely than they are now.

2170. Chairman.] When you speak of balances, how is the public interest concerned in a balance?—It is very much concerned in the amount of the balance that you place at the disposal of the Paymaster.

2174. It is a very small balance as to public service, but a pretty large sum still to be at the disposal of an individual?—Those are the balances remaining at the close of the preceding evening, and of course they are wanted the first thing the next morning to be written in.

2177. What is your alarm as to that 60,000 l. being doubled?—I doubt if 1,000,000 l. would enable the Paymaster-general to keep all his balances in credit; the temptation would be always greater with a large balance which could never be called for; there is a greater temptation then than when the balance is no larger than is actually necessary to carry on the public service.

2178. The Bank would, from day to day, return an account of the balance in their hands?—The larger the balance the more incumbent it would be, both upon the Treasury and upon the heads of the Pay-office, to watch the balances; but there is always danger in a large balance.

2179. To whom can the Bank make any payments; are they not all transfers to different accounts?—They are transfers to the working accounts; but the drawing account is operated upon by cheques.

2180. Checks to private parties, as well as to departments?—To private parties principally.

2181. If anything wrong took place, that would be the way in which it might take place?—I think it affords a temptation; I do not say that the checks are so deficient that I see any danger of it, but when once there is a temptation means may be found to evade the best checks.

2182. You do not suppose that a man presenting a cheque for 1,000,000 l. at the Bank would get it paid?—No, it would never be done in large sums.

2183. It would be small sums probably?—I do not see how the checks would fail; but still I think a large balance is always a temptation.

2184. If a fraud were committed in small amounts with a balance of 100,000 l., there would be an opportunity to commit fraud now?—There is an opportunity undoubtedly of committing fraud, but your checks are very perfect, and I do not see, if those checks are enforced, that there is much danger of the public sustaining any loss; but to keep a larger balance than necessary is waste.

2185. The balance, so far as the public service is concerned, seems small; but as regards the amount, if any one wanted to commit a fraud, 100,000 l. seems to be ample enough to tempt parties to commit fraud?—Yes, it is sufficient for that purpose, certainly.

2186. Mr. Hankey.] A great deal has been said in this discussion about the Paymaster-general. Will you be good enough to state the duties which are now actually performed by the Paymaster-general himself?—The Paymaster-general takes no part in the detailed execution of the duties of the Pay-office. When he comes into office, he grants deputations to various officers to act for him; but if there is any departure from the regulations, or any question arises which calls for further authority, the Paymaster-general is the first person to consult; and if any reference is necessary to the Treasury it is the Paymaster-general who makes it.

2187. Has he any responsibility whatever if the duties of the Paymaster-general's Office are not properly discharged?—The accounts stand in his name, and he is nominally, I will not say that he is actually, responsible for any fraud that takes place. If fraud takes place he must get relieved from the charge, because it stands against him at the Audit-office.

2189. Then he is nominally responsible respecting the discharge of the duties of his office?—Yes.

2190. Has he any means now of knowing what is the nature of the transactions that are daily carried on?—Yes, he has every means of knowing what goes on in the office through the officers who act for him, but it has not been the practice to trouble him with the details of the office which are generally conducted according to settled regulations laid down by the higher authority of the Treasury; and he is only consulted when any departure from those regulations takes place.

2191. Practically, does he know anything of what is going on in his own department?—Only from the reports of his deputy; he does not attend himself at the office.

2193. Would it not be much better if the duties required of the Paymaster-general were performed by him personally, rather than that the office should be a mere fiction, as it is at present?—It would be better that the duties should be conducted by some permanent, practical officer than by one who is constantly removeable; it requires a knowledge of the detailed regulations, and it requires very close attendance during the whole of business hours, which you would hardly expect from a public officer in his position, having Parliamentary duties to attend to; therefore I think if a change were made, it should be that the deputy should be the principal, and not the principal be the executive officer.

2194. Do you think it a good arrangement that the Paymaster-general should receive no pay, or know nothing of what is going on in his department?—No, it is an anomaly. I should mention that, as Paymaster-general, he has some duties to perform; he is chairman of the Chelsea Board, and he has to attend every week a Board at Chelsea to pass pensioners, and conduct other business at that establishment, and he has some other ex-officio duties.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

19 June 1856.

2195. Is there any pay whatever attached to the office of Paymaster-general?—Not at present.

2197. Then after the services are settled by the Government, the amount of the estimates for the Army and Navy are considered by the departments, and after that they are submitted to the Treasury?—Yes; and they are approved by them before they are submitted to Parliament.

2198. Does the Treasury exercise any authority over the amounts of the different items?—The Treasury has the power of objecting to any items in those estimates; and if that occurred there would be a communication between the ministers at the head of the two departments, and the estimates would probably be withdrawn and presented afresh. There is a power in the Treasury of objecting to any items in those estimates.

2199. And that objection would be made effective, would it not?—In my short experience at the Treasury I do not recollect any case in which the estimates have been reduced. It would be a serious responsibility for the Treasury to cut down war estimates.

2200. In time of peace do they exercise any more authority?—Yes; those estimates undergo revision; I do not say that it is very minute; but the scale of expenditure is so agreed on beforehand between the ministers at the head of the two departments, (between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the ministers controlling those departments), that there is no chance of any rejection when the estimates come before the Treasury.

2201. Then it comes to a question of agreement amongst the Cabinet Ministers?—Yes; those large questions are Cabinet questions.

2202. Mr. Hankey.] Is not every estimate when made out by the department submitted to the Treasury before it is laid before Parliament?—Every estimate is submitted to the Treasury.

2204. Mr. Wilson.] It is on the responsibility of the Treasury, is it not, that those estimates are presented to Parliament?—Yes.

2205. As to the Army Estimates, it is customary for the Cabinet to decide what number of men are to be retained; and that number of men forms the basis of all other calculations?—Yes.

2206. It is for the Treasury to see that provision is made in accordance with the proposed number of men?—Yes, in the navy; there is an Order in Council which fixes the vote as to the number of men to be employed.

2207. Chairman.] The Ordnance Estimates are very much canvassed at the Treasury in times of peace, are they not?—Previously to the formation of the estimates, of course there are a number of questions which come before the Treasury for decision; and when the estimates are finally put together there is very little to object to in them; by anticipation those questions have been already discussed and settled.

2208. There is a check, either before the estimates are framed or after they are framed?—Generally the check is before.

2209. Mr. Hankey.] Is the Paymaster-general required to put his own signature

ture to any public documents?—Yes; but very few beyond letters to the Treasury; a new regulation, or anything in connexion with the establishment of his department, would go to the Treasury upon his signature. The only voucher that he actually signs in the conduct of the business is a receipt for the exchange of Exchequer bills; the new bills are issued on his signature.

2210. Practically, is not his signature a mere matter of form?—Not as regards the questions which are submitted to the Treasury by letter; these are matters which he investigates before he ventures to make a submission to the Treasury.

2211. Could not the functions of the Paymaster-general be performed by the Deputy Paymaster-general, without any public inconvenience?—Undoubtedly.

2214. With the exception of the Royal warrant, the same regulations apply to the Commissariat and to the Ordnance, do they not?—Yes, with the exception of the Royal Warrant; the non-effective services in the Army are paid also upon Queen's warrants; no officer in the army can be placed on the half-pay list without a Royal warrant, and that becomes the authority upon which the Paymaster makes the payment, and the authority also upon which the Audit Board allows that payment.

2215. With regard to the Navy, will you describe the method of paying the effective and non-effective services of the Navy?—As to the Navy, there is an Act of Parliament which directs that all orders for payment on the Paymaster-general shall be signed by the Accountant-general of the Navy, approved by a Lord or such other authority as the Board of Admiralty may from time to time direct; all Naval payments are made in pursuance of that Act of Parliament. Most of the naval payments for effective services are final payments to be charged at once against the votes. The imprest payments are dealt with in precisely the same manner as those which I have described for the War department; they are charged against the parties to whom the money is advanced, who render subsequently accounts showing how they have applied the money; these accounts are examined in the department, and are finally passed to the bookkeeper to be recorded against the respective votes.

2216. And the mode in which they are brought to account, the examination, the record, the audit, and the appropriation, is the same as you have described in all the other departments?—Yes; it all takes place in the departments; it is uniform throughout.

2217. This audited account forms the basis of the balance-sheet that is presented sented to Parliament, does it not?—Yes; the balance-sheet is founded upon entries made in the books from the audited accounts.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

19 June 1856.

2218. A statement has been made before the Committee as to the discontinuance of the quarterly warrant, called the Consolidated Fund warrant; is it your opinion that there is any less security to the public, or to the department, in making up the accounts, by the discontinuance of that warrant?—None whatever. I found, shortly after my appointment to the Treasury, that the business of my branch was running into arrear, and when I came to inquire into the cause of it, I found that the clerks were employed in preparing a very voluminous document, called the Consolidated Fund warrant, embracing the whole of the Consolidated Fund, income and expenditure, in very great detail. It was my duty, before I asked the Treasury to give me further assistance, to ascertain the nature of this document, and I found that it related entirely to charges that were gone by. I had some difficulty in understanding how authority could be required from the Treasury for the payment of charges which had already been paid. I found that the practice was this; all the separate services which were paid out of the Consolidated Fund were paid upon distinct warrants furnished by the Treasury, complete in themselves, with all the names, authorities, and sums in detail; those warrants were sent to the Exchequer, and those authorities were final. This document, when I inquired into it, I found to be a duplicate of all those warrants, with the addition of some details furnished by the Exchequer itself, in order to make it a debtor and creditor account. I brought the matter under the consideration of my superiors, and the first inquiry that was made was to ascertain whether this document was required by law; as, if such were the case, whether it was useful or not it was the duty of the Treasury to continue the preparation of it at whatever inconvenience to themselves. The question was referred to the solicitor of the Treasury, and on investigation it was found that there was no legal authority whatever for the preparation of that document. The matter was then brought under the consideration of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but he was very unwilling to discontinue a document that had been sanctioned by ancient usage, and therefore he thought it right, before he discontinued it, to ask the Comptroller of the Exchequer if he could point out any practical utility that arose from the preparation of this warrant. This was done, and as the Comptroller's answer did not satisfy the Board that the document was of any practical use, an order was given to discontinue it; the document was considered by the Treasury to be a very objectionable one, because it was an authority coming after the fact; and in order to give this so-called warrant the semblance of authority, it was pre-dated about six weeks or two months. That was considered to be an objectionable practice: the Treasury objected also to the practice of one office furnishing another with details, in order that that office might furnish them back again. It was considered at that time, when we were very much pressed, that it was an unjustifiable waste of the public time, and the Board passed a Minute directing that the document should be discontinued; and I am not aware that any inconvenience has arisen from that decision.

2219. Was there any information in that document that did not otherwise exist in a more mature form?—All the information had been previously furnished to the Comptroller, and all the issues made, and the transactions completed.

2220. It was partly an account and partly an estimate, was it not?—Yes.

2221. While it professed to be an account of the whole of the proceedings of the quarter as to the Consolidated Fund, in point of fact, that part of it which was an account was a mere copy of accounts which had already passed between the departments, and the other part was an estimate for the succeeding quarter?—Yes; the estimated charge for the following quarter.

2222. Is it your opinion that any person looking at that account could by possibility learn anything from it?—Nothing; the document was perfectly useless to the Comptroller of the Exchequer; it might have been of use to the Treasury; it was a document by which we could ascertain the amount of deficiency bills wanted in the following quarter; but it came six weeks or two months too late, when the information had been obtained from other documents.

2223. That document was not prepared in time for the purposes for which it professed professed to be made?—No, certainly not; it was generally pre-dated about six weeks, when it was considered not to be in arrear.

2224. It was partly an account and partly an estimate; it told nothing that had occurred which had not been already shown by better documents, and it was of no practical utility whatever?—No.

2225. What was the bulk of that account, and what was the amount of labour it required to prepare it?—I should say it was from 40 to 50 pages of figures.

2226. Though it had been customary for the Comptroller of the Exchequer to attach his signature to that document as appearing to be an authority for issuing the deficiency bills, the power of the Treasury to issue those bills was entire by Act of Parliament without it?—The words in the Act were precise on that point; "if it shall appear to the Commissioners of the Treasury that the income of the Consolidated Fund is insufficient to meet the charges, they shall direct the Comptroller to issue deficiency bills," but not a word is said as to the interference of the Comptroller in the matter; that point was specially referred to the Solicitor for his opinion, and he said that there was no authority given by the Act to the Comptroller.

2227. It has been stated that the finance accounts, as prepared up to the 1st of April last year, were not placed before Parliament till the month of October, and a great complaint and objection were being made to the new system in consequence of that delay; was that delay accidental, or would it be necessarily the uniform result of the new system?—It was accidental, because in the first year of the change, in consequence of the removal of various charges from the Consolidated Fund to the votes, and other matters, there were difficulties in the preparation of that account which would not occur in the preparation of any subsequent account.

2228. How soon do you think the account may be usually laid before Parliament?—So far as the Treasury is concerned their part might be prepared in three weeks instead of three months; but we are dependent upon other departments for information which is necessary for the completion of those accounts. I would strongly recommend that that account should be broken up, and that those parts which can be prepared at an earlier period, should be submitted to the House of Commons at once, instead of keeping three-fourths of the accounts waiting for, perhaps, one class which cannot be prepared so soon.

2229. What you propose is, that at the earliest possible period the account in its main features should be prepared and presented to Parliament, and that further details, when points which cannot be obtained at the time, should be presented subsequently?—Yes, as soon as possible.

2230. Chairman.] Cannot the Pay-office present an annual account, which would be easily prepared, and placed almost immediately on the table, and which would give a good deal of information, and render the finance accounts less necessary?—The Pay-office could undoubtedly furnish an account of the whole of its payments. I do not know whether it would be of much use, because a large portion of the payments cannot be classed against the votes, and it might mislead; but all financial returns, those relating to the income and expenditure of the country, and all issues by the Treasury out of the votes, could be presented at a very early period; probably within three weeks after the expiration of the year.

2231. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] All the charges upon the Consolidated Fund?—Yes.

2233. Mr. Cardwell.] Do you think that the House could have the finance accounts prepared by the 31st of March, or by the time that the Chancellor of the Exchequer makes his financial statement?—Not the whole of the financial accounts; but a large portion of the financial returns could be prepared in time for the Chancellor of the Exchequer's statement.

2234. Mr. Wilson.] You remember that a change was made a little time ago as to the acquittances; was not it the practice, and a very cumbrous and inconvenient one, to require that all the chief collectors of the revenue should go in the first instance to the Exchequer, to receive from the Exchequer an authority to pay their money into the Bank of England before the Bank of England would receive it, and then after going to the Bank, they subsequently received an acquittance from the Exchequer. Was that their final acquittance?—No. that acquittance was merely a voucher to the Commissioners of Audit. No public public accountant can receive his final acquittance except from the Audit Board.

G. W. Anderson, Esq.

19 June 1856.

2235. It is a mistake to suppose, is it not, that the Comptroller of the Exchequer ever gave an acquittance at all?—His acquittance was simply a receipt.

2238. Are the accounts which are now furnished by the Exchequer to the Treasury, of any use to the Treasury in making up their annual accounts?—Not in the least; they are all duplicate accounts. The Exchequer keep one set of accounts, and they furnish us with a second set; and from the second set a third set is prepared in the Treasury; but I did not find that those accounts answered my purpose, and therefore I prepared a fourth set. The two systems are going on concurrently, and as an inquiry into this matter has been pending for some time, the double accounts are carried on until we know precisely what Parliament may determine in reference to the general accounts of the Treasury and the Exchequer.

2239. A charge has been brought against the Treasury before this Committee for refusing to pay into the Exchequer the amount of the profit by way of premiums which had been made upon the issue of Exchequer bills in the autumn of 1854, amounting to 10,000 l. or 12,000 l.; do you recollect the occurrence of that circumstance?—Yes; it occurred upon the re-issue of bills, about three millions of which had been paid off in money in 1853. Those bills were issued for supply services from time to time between the month of October and the end of December.

2240. That account was closed in the end of December?—Yes.

2241. When was it that Lord Monteagle first wrote to the Treasury on the subject?—At the close of December, I think.

2242. Was not it in the month of December that the first letter was written to him, in reply to his communication?—Yes, or early in January 1854; in the first letter that was written to him in reply to the question raised by him, he was told distinctly that although it was no part of the functions of the Exchequer to look after the recovery of those monies, it was not the intention of the Treasury to depart from the established practice of paying such sums into the Exchequer, the same as all other profits; it has been the practice to pay in those premiums for a very considerable time; I think the Committee have before them the Minute of the Treasury in 1810, in which they lay down the regulations under which those premiums are to be repaid.

2243. Was not it the Minute of 1810 which has been given in by Lord Monteagle?—Yes.

2245. The profit that remained was paid by the Treasury without any interference by the Exchequer, into the Exchequer?—Yes.

2246. In the first letter that was sent to the Comptroller of the Exchequer in December 1853, was he not informed that the same practice would be pursued as had been always pursued?—Yes.

2247. That account was closed, was it not, at the end of December 1853?—The transactions were not completed so soon as that; the Bank furnished an account in the month of January.

2249. Immediately upon the account being furnished to the Treasury the Treasury directed the Bank to pay the money into the Exchequer?—Yes, in the usual course.

2250. In the month of January?—Yes.

2251. If this Committee has been induced to believe, or if a representation has been made, that the Treasury first refused to make that payment into the Exchequer, or delayed to make that payment into the Exchequer, and were

were only at last induced to make that payment into the Exchequer by the continued representations of the Comptroller of the Exchequer, as late as the month of April, would that be a correct representation?—Such a statement could only have been made under a misconception of the facts.

2252. And from an entire want of reference to the early correspondence which had taken place upon the subject?—Yes; the whole transaction was upon record in the correspondence.

2253. The course pursued by the Treasury, with regard to that transaction, was strictly correct, was it not, and according to all precedent?—It was.

2254. You have been asked with regard to the legality of the proceedings of the Treasury, and as to a variation between the practice and the law; had your answer any reference to transactions between the Treasury and the Exchequer?—No; it had reference to Lord Monteagle's interpretation of the law as regarded the Pay-office.

2255. With regard to the Exchequer itself, for the regulation of which the Act was passed, there never has been, and there is not now, the slightest doubt as to the construction of the law, as between the Treasury and the Exchequer?—Clearly not; if there had been any difficulty upon that question, of course the Comptroller would have told us.

2256. When Lord Monteagle proposed to the Treasury to take the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, it must have had either regard to a subject not connected with his own office or to a dispute that did not exist, there being no difference of opinion as to the practice between the Treasury and the Exchequer?—It had reference entirely to the practice of the Pay-office as to the mode of dealing with their floating balance; that was the whole question which Lord Monteagle raised. I may add, that ever since Lord Monteagle's memorandum has been before the Treasury, from the moment when it was first laid before the Chancellor of the Exchequer, there has been a determination to refer the whole question for the consideration of a commission. When it was first placed in Mr. Gladstone's hands he called for some explanations; but on a representation from the officers engaged in the duty of making the issues, he admitted that it was not the time, at the commencement of a great war, to incur the risk of deranging the business of the different offices by inquiring into a matter of such great detail as this involved; but that it should be kept in view, and be investigated by a Royal Commission as soon as time and opportunity offered. It was never the intention of the Treasury to give the go-by to Lord Monteagle's representations.

2257. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Are you aware that those intentions have been retained up to this present time?—Yes; it was intended to institute an inquiry, notwithstanding the great pressure upon us, in 1854. Mr. Gladstone was then very much inclined to appoint a commission; but when it was communicated to the officers of the Treasury that he intended to do so, he was told that it would so seriously interrupt the course of public business at a time when we were all at high pressure, that he consented to defer it. When his successor came into office he expressed the same intention, and the same representations were made to him; we requested that the inquiry might be deferred till it could be efficiently conducted; but the pressure of the current business upon us, since the commencement of the war, has been too great to admit of our commencing the investigation of a subject of so much detail.

2258. Lord Monteagle's complaint did not relate to any recent change with regard to the practice which had been in existence ever since the Exchequer Act had been passed?—It referred more particularly to a practice which he considers to have commenced in 1848, but it really commenced in 1836, when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer himself, and gave his sanction to the change.

2259. The practice to which Lord Monteagle referred had no connexion with the war; it had existed some years at least, had it not, before the commencement of the war?—Yes; it had existed for many years when he brought it before the Treasury.

2260. It was not therefore brought under the notice of the Treasury as an urgent matter, but as a defective system which had been for some time in operation?—Precisely so.

2261. You know that it has been the intention ever since that representation was made, to submit the whole system to the consideration and inquiry of a commission, as soon as the state of public affairs would render such an inquiry inquiry convenient and useful?—Yes; both the late and the present Chancellor of the Exchequer pressed the expediency of an early inquiry upon us; and it was solely for the convenience of the public service that they listened to our representations to postpone it until a better opportunity offered for a full investigation.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

19 June 1856.

2263. Mr. Wilson.] You wish, do you not, to give some explanation with regard to an answer that you gave on the last occasion, as to the French accounts: you were asked as to the distinct line of demarcation between the receivers and payers in France?—From some questions put to me on my last examination, an impression seemed to me to prevail that the duties of receivers and payers in France were never united in the same person. I thought that the distinction more particularly referred to those who authorised payments, and those who made them; and, on referring to Dr. Bowring's Reports, I find it is the case. He says that the functions of administrator, (that is, the person who authorises the expenditure,) are incompatible with those of a pecuniary agent, whether receiver or paymaster, both being pecuniary agents; and I find those duties are frequently blended, indeed generally so, in the French system; and it must be so, because that perfect piece of machinery which exists in the French Treasury, which is called the "Mouvement des Fonds," and which is the pride of every French financier, is plainly directed to that object. Dr. Bowring says, "The bureau of the 'Mouvement des Fonds' is specially charged with making all the necessary provision for the emergencies of the public services through all the provinces of France. They take charge of all the receipts, and so appropriate them to the expenditure, that the excess of receipt in one place is made to supply the deficiency in another. This department takes no cognizance of the collection of the revenues until they reach the hands of the receivers-general. Of these there is one in every department of France (amounting to 86 in all), and the administration of the 'Mouvement des Fonds' is charged with making all the monies recovered for the public account applicable to the public services with the least possible delay, and the least possible expense." He gives an illustration, and he says: "The assessor fixes the amount due by the taxpayer; that amount is received by the collector, and is immediately disposed of by the district receivers, or by the receivers-general. The receivers-general, whose duty it is to preserve a proper equilibrium between the income and outgoing of the public money, sometimes authorise the collectors to make payments to the creditor of the state when the claimant dwells in their particular locality, or more frequently require the amount to be promptly paid to the district receivers, who again may be authorised to apply the amounts to local expenses, or to remit them directly to himself or to the central chest of the treasury; or it may be that the amounts will be required to be transferred to the paymaster for the payment of the orders drawn upon him by the treasury. In this way it is of constant occurrence that the money received from the tax-payer is transferred, the very day of its payment, to individuals having claims on the State, every transfer being made subordinate to the great object of despatch. From the collector to the primary receiver, to the principal receiver, to the paymaster, or to the treasury in Paris, the steps are all subservient to the object which is laid down as the basis of the 'Mouvement des Fonds' department, 'that in every part of the kingdom the public resources shall be applied to the public service with the least possible delay.'" So that the French system is in a great measure similar to our own; as to the employment of our collectors to make payments in every district of the country, in that respect there is no difference of practice.

2264. Do you know what Dr. Bowring thinks now with regard to the relations of the Exchequer and the Pay-office, after all his experience and the inquiries he has made into the subject?—I have had conversations with both Sir Henry Parnell, when he was in the Pay-office as Paymaster-general, and with Dr. Bowring on his last visit to this country, and I found that they had both changed their opinions as to the system of credits, and admitted that it had not answered their expectations.

Lunæ, 23° die Junii, 1856.

MEMBERS PRESENT.

Sir Francis T. Baring.	Mr. Williams.
Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.	Sir James Graham.
Mr. James MacGregor.	Mr. Cardwell.
Sir Henry Willoughby.	Mr. Bowyer.
Mr. Wilson.	Mr. Hankey.

THE RIGHT HON. SIR FRANCIS T. BARING, BART., IN THE CHAIR.

Ernest Albert Hoffay, Esq., called in; and Examined.

E. A. Hoffay, Esq.

23 June 1856.

2265. Chairman.] WHAT office do you hold?—That of Assistant Paymaster-general.

2266. When were you appointed to that office?—In March 1854.

2267. What office did you hold before that?—That of inspector, in charge of the naval and military accounts, under the Commissioners of Audit.

2268. That is the office at the head of the Appropriation Audit, is it not?—Yes.

2269. How long did you hold that office?—From April 1846 till March 1854.

2270. Before that you were in the Audit Office as a clerk, were you not?—Before that I was in the Commissariat; I entered the Commissariat in the year 1812, and have been employed at various times on civil duties.

2271. Have you had Mr. Anderson's evidence before you?—Yes, and have read the whole of it, save the last day's.

2272. With regard to the manner in which the monies are paid in to the Pay-office; take a case with regard to the repayment of old naval stores; will you state all the different steps that are taken upon it; there is first a communication, is there not, from the Navy department to the Paymaster, directing him to pay in, as their banker, a given sum?—They send us an order upon their imprest account for the amount.

2273. You then go to the Treasury for a credit, do you not?—Not unless the balance of naval monies in hand is insufficient. We make the charge under the Admiralty order to the imprest account, which is the account to which all charges are made which cannot be finally appropriated. The reason of this is, that the whole of the transactions out of which old store monies are brought to account arise out of the accounts of Admiralty imprest accountants. The stores are sold at various stations at home and abroad, and the proceeds brought to account by the Admiralty accountants, who use them for any purpose they may require. When the accounts come home, the transactions are all passed through the general imprest account. The monies with which the accountants have debited themselves as the proceeds of old stores are collected into an order to the Paymaster-general to pay the amount thereof over to the Exchequer, which is done quarterly.

2274. What is the imprest account?—It is a naval account.

2275. Did not Mr. Anderson state that it was paid out of the cash account?—Yes, it passes through the Paymaster-general's cash account.

2276. That is the account to which the question had reference: how does the Pay-office make a payment?—In this case it is made by transfer.

2277. What is your first step; you must go to the Treasury for a credit, must you not?—Yes, but in this case no money passes; it is a mere transfer in the books.

2278. But how do you get the money from the Exchequer, supposing there are 50,000 l.?—By a credit for the Navy.

2279. How do you get that credit?—By application to the Treasury.

2280. Your first step is to apply to the Treasury for a credit, or for an issuing letter?—Yes; credits are asked for daily, under various heads.

2281. You include it in your credit; if you have 50,000 l. you must pay it out of the Exchequer?—Yes; if we had not navy money in hand, we should ask the Treasury for a credit.

E. A. Hoffay, Esq.

23 June 1856.

2282. You would apply that same evening, having that order for more than you would othewise have?—Yes, if we had not enough in hand.

2283. The balances are kept low, are they not?—Yes.

2284. Then there would be an issuing letter from the Treasury to the Exchequer, and then you would draw from the Exchequer: where would you place the credit that you received from the Exchequer?—We should place the credit to navy services.

2285. Does that go to your cash account?—It would go from the Exchequer credit account into the drawing account.

2286. First from the Exchequer to the Exchequer credit account?—Yes.

2287. From thence it would be transferred to the drawing account, would it not?—Yes.

2288. And from the drawing account where would it go?—It would be made available for general purposes.

2289. Where is the money transferred to; from what account is the transfer made into the Exchequer?—From navy services.

2290. Does it come from your drawing account, or from your cash account, or your Exchequer account?—From the Exchequer credit account to the drawing account.

2291. Then it goes from that drawing account to the credit of the Exchequer back again?—Certainly; it is a payment to the Exchequer account at the Bank of England.

2292. But it never goes through the cash account?—Never as cash.

2293. It comes back again to the Exchequer?—Yes.

2294. Is not that rather a roundabout process?—No; I conceive nothing can be more simple.

2295. It comes out of the Exchequer and it goes back to the Exchequer?—Yes.

2296. Is there any necessity for that?—I conceive so.

2297. Is there any absolute necessity, the money being in the Exchequer, and going back into the Exchequer, that you should apply to the Treasury, that the Treasury should give an order that you should issue to the Exchequer credit, that the Exchequer credit should be transferred to the drawing account, and then ultimately paid back again to the Exchequer; might it not at once, upon the warrant of the Admiralty, go direct from the Exchequer?—Of course it might be done, but I do not see what would be gained by that course.

2300. Have you read the early minutes?—Yes; but there are many of them, and I do not bear every part of them in mind.

2301. I mean the minute giving the directions to the Pay-office?—Certainly; but I have paid more attention to the minute of 1848.

2302. You must recollect that the first minute directs those monies to be paid into the cash account?—I do not recollect any difference from the present practice, unless it is that formerly those moneys were appropriated in aid of the estimates.

2303. Is not the first minute that was laid down the leading minute?—Yes.

2304. Will you have the goodness to state, when you receive the direction, what check there is, supposing you were to detain that money?—The returns of receipts and payments made to the department, and the examination of the account of the Paymaster-general by the Commissioners of Audit.

2305. What interest has the navy in having the money paid into the Exchequer?—I cannot say.

2306. That is known, is it; it does not go to its estimates?—Certainly not.

2307. Consequently the navy has no reason for checking the payment into the Exchequer?—Probably not.

2309. Is that payment made into the Exchequer account?—No, not by the navy, but through the intervention of the Paymaster-general.

2310. They keep an account of the orders which they give you, do they not?—They do.

2311. Do they receive a receipt from the Exchequer?—No.

2312. In what way would they know. Suppose you were to receive directions from the Treasury to keep that money for a month; how would that be checked?—By the Audit-office on the examination of the Paymaster-general's accounts.

2313. Can you state, supposing a sum of that kind was, by the Treasury, paid into civil contingencies or anything else, what is the check that would show that payment?—The examination of the Paymaster-general's accounts at the Audit Office.

2314. Can you state whether, if such an order were given, it would be reported upon in any shape by the Audit Board; it would go probably in your accounts to the Audit Board?—No order given by the Treasury to act upon navy moneys would be attended to by the Paymaster-general.

2315. Do you mean to say that you would disobey the orders of the Treasury?—I should not recommend acquiescence, without remonstrance and communication with the Admiralty.

2316. You would go to the Paymaster-general in such a case?—Yes.

2317. Do you mean to say that he would disobey the order of the Treasury?—It is difficult to say what his view of the case might be.

2318. I ask you whether the Pay-office is not an office under the Treasury?—It is.

2319. Suppose you still received an order from the Admiralty?—As regards the disposal of their own monies it would I suppose be attended to.

2320. Supposing the Admiralty issued an order that instead of paying it into the Exchequer, you should pay it to the civil contingencies or any other fund, would there be any difficulty in fulfilling those directions?—With the consent of the Admiralty, I conceive not.

2321. That would appear probably in your accounts that were submitted to the Audit-office?—Yes.

2322. Would the auditors examine at all when they saw an order, either from the Treasury or the Admiralty, into the propriety of that order, or would they not?—I think they would, such an order as is supposed, but they would become more immediately cognizant of it through the appropriation audit, if the order was given by the Admiralty.

2323. Will you explain how it would appear in the appropriation audit?—Because the audit clerk could not help noticing an order to pay to civil contingencies a sum which should be paid into the Exchequer.

2324. He would immediately see the order given?—Yes; and it would be objected to.

2325. He would see the order given to transfer it to civil contingencies?—Yes; and it would be immediately objected to by the Commissioners of Audit, under the appropriation audit.

2326. They would object to the order given, would they not?—No question they would.

2327. But suppose the Treasury order is obeyed, it would not come to them in any shape in the Navy accounts?—Yes, it would appear in the Navy accounts. If we obeyed the order of the Treasury to appropriate naval monies for any other purposes than the naval service, it would, of course, appear.

2328. The money is not to be appropriated to naval purposes; it is a sum to be paid into the Exchequer; I ask you whether it would appear in the naval accounts before the appropriation audit?—Yes, it would.

2329. How would it appear?—It would appear in their books, and the auditor therefore would see at once that those monies had not been paid to the Exchequer. but that they had been paid to civil contingencies.

2330. He would see that the direction had been given by the Admiralty for payment of this money; would he see anything more than that the Admiralty had ordered it to be paid into civil contingencies?—Perhaps not till he came to the accounts of the Paymaster-general.

2331. He would see it there?—Yes.*

2332. At the Audit-office, with regard to the accounts of the Paymaster-general,

* On reflection, I find that my answers to this and the four preceding questions were given in error. If the order to pay to civil contingencies proceeded from the Treasury alone, the only check would be through the examination of the Paymaster-general's accounts by the Commissioners of Audit.

E. A. Hoffay, Esq.

ral, does the Audit Board examine into the propriety of the orders, or do they merely examine to see that a sufficient order has been given?—Not into the propriety of the orders, as the Paymaster-general is simply the banker of the departments, and is bound to obey any order issued under proper authority.

2333. Is your experience of the Audit-office sufficient to say whether the Audit Board are in the habit of examining into the propriety of an order, or would they, if they saw such an order of the Treasury, consider it sufficient without ascertaining whether that was a proper order or not?—To what extent they attend to those points in the Paymaster-general's account I am not competent to say.

2334. With respect to advances, at the present moment the Ordnance and some other departments are in the habit of performing certain works for other departments; I think originally they were performed by the Ordnance, and when the account was made up it was paid from the department for whom the work had been done: is that the case now; I think by the minute of December 1848 there has been some alteration?—It is done in the same manner. I am not aware of any alteration. Services done by one department for another are repaid by the department for which the service is done out of the proper grant of Parliament. I am not aware of any difference in practice.

2335. Will you look at that Minute (the Minute being handed to the Witness.) What is the practice now with regard to the Ordnance; is money furnished as an imprest from the department who employ them, or do the Ordnance do the work, and then bring their bill for payment when they know exactly the sum required?—The Ordnance do the work and they pay for it out of their funds, and repayment is made by the department for which the work has been done.

2336. There is no advance made?—No, not generally.

2337. Not till the work is completed?—No; but I will give the Committee an instance where advances are made. The payments of the Greenwich pensioners are made by the War-office, and in that case advances are made because the amount is so large that it would be inconvenient for the War-office to disburse so large an amount.

2338. No alteration has been made as to the Ordnance?—No.

2339. What are the "Navy and Army Prize Accounts;" what account is that?—The navy prize account is an account opened in the Paymaster-general's books into which are carried all sums which the Paymaster-general is desired to receive, and out of which payments are made upon orders from the Admiralty.

2340. Is that in a separate account at the Bank?—No, only in the books of the Paymaster-general.

2341. What is the amount of that navy prize account?—£. 67,226.

2342. Do you know what the army prize account is?—A similar account as regards army prize money. The amount is 4,767 l.

2343. I see that the Act of the 11th & 12th of Victoria, chap. 55, sec. 7, speaks of the sum of 100,000 l. as being vested in the Funds for the army account; is that still vested?—At this moment there are only 57,102 l. 19 s. 10 d. in the 3 per Cents. on account of army prize money, vested in the names of the Paymaster-general for the time being and the Secretary-at-War.

2344. The difference of the sum arises, does it not, from payments to the Army?—The difference arises from the employment of a part of that fund for the enlargement and alteration of the Military Asylum, under Acts of Parliament.

2345. With regard to the navy prize money, that seems to be kept separate? Yes, in the books of the Paymaster-general, but not at the Bank.

2346. It used to be kept at the Bank of England separate, did it not?—Yes, it was.

2347. It is now kept in the Paymaster-general's hands, is it not?—Yes.

2348. It is a very small sum, is it not?—Not a very large one.

2349. Is this correct?—Yes, I conceive so.

2350. Should you say that it was consistent with what you think the Pay-office ought to do?—Yes; for it would greatly embarrass the operations of the Pay-office to have to open separate accounts at the Bank for the different funds for which it is the depository.

2351. Are there any other funds of that nature which you have at the Pay-office?—There are various miscellaneous funds which are in our hands for a time; the Board of Works, for instance, have various funds of that description; for instance, the Metropolitan Improvements General Account, Spitalfields Extension, the Menai and Conway Bridges, Pimlico Improvements, and Westminster

New

New Bridge; but with the origin of those funds we are but imperfectly acquainted; we get an order from the department, for whom we act as bankers, to hold those monies and open separate accounts for them in our books; we have no control over them; a return which was put in by Mr. Anderson gives a list of them.

2352. Could you mark out those which are deposit funds, and not drawn from the Exchequer?—The whole of these are (marking the same).

2353. Can you furnish the Committee with an account up to the 31st of March of those deposit funds, and the sums total?—Yes, I will do so.

2354. Are the Committee to understand that those monies go into your general account?—Yes; but we are able to produce them at any moment.

2355. Sir James Graham.] With respect to the naval prize money, at the commencement of the Russian war an Act was passed with respect to that?—Yes.

2356. And the origin of that Act was the losses sustained by the captors by the failure of the agents?—I believe so.

2357. Was not it provided by that Act, that the prize money, from time to time, should be paid in to the public credit at the Bank of England, the captors having the benefit of public security, and the State having the usufruct of the money?—The Act in question distinctly provides for all prize money being paid to the account of the Paymaster-general.

2358. The agents used heretofore to have the interest of the money until the distribution?—Yes, that was so.

2359. The public now have the benefit of it, have they not?—Yes, that is so.

2360. That is provided, is it not, by the Act of Parliament?—Yes.

2361. The payment is direct from the Admiralty into the public credit, is it not?—Yes, it is; when a vessel is sold at any of the ports by the collector of Customs, it is paid direct into the account of the Paymaster-general, as directed by the Act.

2362. Do the public now enjoy the benefit which the agents heretofore enjoyed?—Yes, with the additional security to the captors of the money being held by Government.

2363. That Act contemplated the use of the money for the benefit of the public until payment is made to the captors, did it not?—I presume it did, inasmuch as money is not generally allowed to remain idle.

2364. That Act was very much opposed by the agents, was it not?—Very much.

2365. On account of the benefit to be transferred to the public from them?—Yes.

2366. Therefore the public derived a benefit, and the only parties losing were the navy agents?—Precisely so.

2367. Chairman.] Will you have the goodness to look at the page of the Act to which I was referring, and state whether that was not the Act which, in 1848, transferred the monies from the Bank to the Paymaster-general's fund; does that Act transfer the naval monies from the Bank of England to the Paymaster-general's hands?—Yes.

2368. That was in 1848?—Yes.

2369. Before the Russian war?—Yes, it transferred the account of the monies then standing to a separate account at the Bank, to the cash account of the Paymaster-general, but it did not prevent the operation of the subsequent Act of 1854.

2370. No; but the transfer took place in 1848?—Yes; what was then a separate account ceased to be so after the Act of 1848.

2371. Sir James Graham.] Will you look at that Act, the 17 & 18 Vict., c. 19 (the Witness referred to the Act); that is the last Act which directs the proceeds of the prize to be paid to the public credit?—Yes.

2372. And introduces new regulations?—It does.

2373. Mr. Wilson.] The Act of 1848 was for the purpose merely of transferring to the Paymaster certain monies standing to a separate account in the Bank of England to the naval prize money?—Exactly.

2374. It did nothing to regulate the further management of that naval prize money?—No.

2375. The Act of 1854 was for the purpose of the future regulation of the payment of prize money altogether?—Yes.

 2376. Instead

E. A. Hoffay, Esq.

23 June 1856.

2376. Instead of being paid to private agents for distribution, it was in future to be paid in to the Paymaster-general's hands as public monies?—Yes.

2377. It is under that last Act that the 67,000 l. to which reference has been made has accumulated?—Yes.

2378. The sales of old stores generally take place at the various out-stations under the direction of the Admiralty, do they not?—They do.

2379. Take an example; supposing at the Cape of Good Hope a sale of old stores, on behalf of the Admiralty, takes place, to the amount of 25,000 l., the process would be, that that 25,000 l. would be received by the agent of the Admiralty upon the spot, and would be expended by him, for naval services, on the spot?—Yes.

2380. Then the next operation would be, that he would give credit in his account to the Admiralty at home for 25,000 l. as if for money received direct from the Admiralty for his expenditure?—Precisely.

2381. The Admiralty therefore would have that account for 25,000 l. which had been expended at the Cape of Good Hope, but for which money had not been sent there?—Yes.

2382. The way in which the Admiralty would account for it, would be to pay that 25,000*l.* in to the Exchequer?—Yes.

2383. Now as the Admiralty has no banking account at all; but as the Paymaster-general is the banker for the Admiralty, the only means which the Admiralty would have of making that payment, would be by directing the Paymaster-general to pay to the Exchequer 25,000*l.*?—So it appears to me; I can see no other way.

2384. When the Paymaster receives an order from the Admiralty to pay to the Exchequer 25,000 l., the way in which he does it, is to debit the Admiralty account in his books with 25,000 l. and to make that transfer into the Exchequer?—Yes.

2385. So that in point of fact the 25,000 l. which was received on account of the Exchequer for the sale of old stores at the Cape of Good Hope, has by this transfer found its way into the Exchequer, without the transmission of a single shilling of money, and without the risk attending it, or any chance of mistake in its transmission?—That is exactly the course.

2386. Now suppose that the Admiralty were to order this 25,000 l. to be paid, instead of into the Exchequer, to the civil contingencies, or to any other purposes, the 25,000 l. being to be accounted for at the end of the quarter when the accounts are made up, would not the officer of the Audit Board who attends in the Admiralty, have to see that a balance was created for that 25,000 l. by a payment into the Exchequer?—Yes, he would.

2387. If the auditor at the Admiralty must receive from the Paymaster-general, at the end of every week, an account of all receipts and disbursements on account of the Admiralty, any misappropriation of that 25,000 l. would be immediately discovered?—It must be so.

2388. Would it not be within the knowledge of the officer of the Audit Board, to know that that 25,000*l.* must go into the Exchequer, and to no other account?—It would.

2389. If it were directed into any other account, he would have cognizance of it, and it would be his duty to report that fact to the Commissioners of Audit?—Yes, and he would do it immediately.

2390. Then if the Treasury were to give an order to the Paymaster-general to dispose of this 25,000 l. which he had received from the Admiralty, with a direction to pay it in to the Exchequer in any other way, if the paymaster were so neglectful of his duty as to obey that instruction, would it not immediately in the following month's account be discovered at the Admiralty, by the officer of the Audit Board?—It would.

2391. The misappropriation of that money would be known at the close of one month to the Commissioners of Audit, and whether that misappropriation had been made by the Admiralty themselves or by the Treasury?—It would.

2392. Mr. James MacGregor.] Do you mean that the 25,000 l. would be paid to the Comptroller-general's Exchequer account, or to the Paymaster-general's Exchequer account?—To the Exchequer account; we know of only one Exchequer account at the Bank.

2393. Mr. Wilson.] There is only one?—Only one.

2394. It

2394. It would be paid into the Exchequer, would it not, in the same way as the Customs Revenue?—Yes, but through the intervention of the Paymaster-general.

2395. And become a part of the monies applicable as ways and means?—Yes.

2396. Mr. Williams.] Has the Paymaster an account at the Bank?—Yes, he has four accounts at the Bank; first, a credit on the Exchequer, which is the Exchequer credit account, and he has a cash account for monies that come in, and he has two working accounts, the drawing account and the bill account.

2397. Mr. Wilson.] You furnish to the Audit Board a monthly account of all your transactions, do you not?—Yes, the whole of them.

2398. Suppose the Audit Board had had information that 25,000 l. had been sent to you on account of the Admiralty, to be paid into the Exchequer, would it be the duty of their audit clerk, even admitting that the immediate checks to which I have alluded have failed to discover that that 25,000 l. had not been appropriated as directed?—It would. As I have observed, it would be the duty of the Paymaster-general. Whether I ought to go so far as to say that he would refuse is another question, to represent to the Treasury the infraction of the law by any proceeding of that kind.

2399. If the Treasury instructed you to dispose of the Admiralty money, would you, as Paymaster, feel authorised to do so?—Not without remonstrance, particularly if it were done without the concurrence of the Admiralty.

2400. Chairman.] You are the Deputy Paymaster, are you not?—I am the Assistant Paymaster-general.

2401. Mr. Wilson.] If ever you have found a dispute between a department and the Audit Board, as to the appropriation of monies, and when reference has been, as must be the case, made to the Treasury for a decision, is it within your experience that the Treasury show a sympathy for the department, or for the Audit Board?—I think generally they support the Audit Board.

2402. Do you ever remember a case where the Treasury having been appealed to, have supported the department and not the Audit Board?—Within my time I think no case of that description has occurred.

2403. Do you remember many cases in which the Treasury have supported the Audit Board and not the department?—Yes, I remember several. The Audit Board are particularly careful in not making objections without good grounds.

2404. With reference to those large sums, the naval and military prize monies which are paid into the hands of the Paymaster by Act of Parliament, and various regulations, those monies do not in any way swell the balances at the command of the Paymaster, do they?—No; the military prize money is very inconsiderable.

2405. The Paymaster's account on which he operates is kept from day to day at the smallest amount, is it not?—Yes.

2406. Those monies being used for public purposes have the effect of saving and economising the monies in the Exchequer?—Yes.

2407. But for the use of those monies you would have had to draw from the Exchequer a sum of money equivalent to them?—Yes.

2408. Therefore the use of those monies in your hands is, in point of fact, a great saving and economy of the public monies of this country?—Very considerable.

2409. Chairman.] They are practically a loan, are they not?—Yes.

2410. Mr. Cardwell.] You have been asked whether the Treasury does not usually support the Audit Board against the departments. You have had, I dare say, no experience of any question of a political character, and therefore you do not undertake to say what the conduct of the Treasury might be if there was any political object in issue?—I cannot say.

2411. Mr. Bouyer.] Your experience relates to the routine of the ordinary business, and not to any extraordinary case?—To the routine of the ordinary business. I may add, in reference to a previous question, that I have known a case wherein the Treasury went with the Audit Board, and yet the department did not assent to the decision made.

2412. Chairman.] What case was that; what amount was involved?—It was not much; it was the principle that was contended for.

2413. Do not you remember that the Admiralty in that case pressed for some regulations to serve for their guidance?—I recollect a correspondence stating that there

T. A. Hoffay, Esq.

23 June 1856.

there was considerable difficulty (I think it was to that effect) in determining particular cases.

2414. The money was expended, was it not?—What use the Admiralty made of the money I cannot say; they carried it to the credit of the vote.

2415. It was a question whether a certain quantity of soil was to be taken up which would have cost more to remove than to give away; a party took it and did the work for less, having the use of that soil?—Yes; it was useful for building purposes.

2416. Did the Admiralty at all contend that they would in future follow that course?—I cannot recollect the particulars.

2417. You have stated that you remember a case in which, though the Treasury had given their opinion, yet the department proceeded against the opinion of the Treasury; will you have the goodness to recall to your mind whether the Admiralty Board did not say that it was not a very important question, and that they would obey any regulations that were laid down, if the Treasury would lay them down?—I do not bear the particulars in mind; but the fact is that the money was not paid into the Exchequer; it was carried to the credit of the vote against the opinion of the Treasury.

2418. Against the opinion of the Admiralty Board, did the Treasury give any opinion?—Yes, they concurred entirely in the view of the Audit Board, and I think that they went so far as to direct the Admiralty to pay it into the Exchequer, or in terms amounting to that, and the Admiralty did not pay the money into the Exchequer.

2419. Mr. Bowyer.] Therefore the Admiralty had their own way?—Yes.

2420. Mr. Williams.] You have stated, I think, that if money was paid into your department, on account of the navy, and you received an order from the Treasury to apply that money to another purpose, or a part of it, (the civil contingencies were mentioned,) that in such a case you would communicate the circumstance to the Admiralty, and if the Admiralty concurred with the order which you had received from the Treasury, would you then pay the money?—After having remonstrated against the order given, as being an application of naval monies to purposes for which they were not voted, and it is impossible for me to say what course would have been taken. I say distinctly that I should have reported to the Treasury and represented the irregularity of the proceeding, and have reported to the Admiralty the intention to apply the money. I think I could hardly go further.

2421. Suppose the Admiralty concurred in the order given by the Treasury, what course would your department have taken?—That is a question I can hardly answer. I think that the Paymaster-general would have fulfilled his duty to the full when he had represented to the Treasury the illegality of the proceeding, and to the Admiralty the course taken by the Treasury.

2422. Would your department pay the money under such circumstances as that both the departments, the Admiralty and the Treasury, concurred?—Had there been a conference between the two departments, and the Government had made a positive order upon the Paymaster-general to do so, I suppose he must have obeyed the order.

2423. Would you, in that case, communicate the circumstance to the Audit Board?—They would know it of their own knowledge.

2424. Mr. Wilson.] The Commissioners of Audit would not pass the accounts, and a report would be made to Parliament on the subject?—Yes.

2425. Chairman.] Do you mean to say that the Commissioners of Audit would not pass the accounts of the Paymaster?—I am speaking rather of the naval account.

2426. Would the Commissioners of Audit make any objection to the Paymaster's accounts on that ground?—I cannot say. The Paymaster-general's account, while I was in the Audit Office, never came under my observation; therefore the manner in which a case of this description would be dealt with I am not competent to speak to.

2427. Sir Henry Willoughby.] In point of fact, all the duties of the Paymaster-general are performed by deputy, are they not?—They are, generally speaking.

2428. Who is responsible?—I conceive that the Paymaster-general is responsible.

2429. Does he perform his functions through more than one deputy?—Yes, part of his functions; to one person alone he entrusts the general conduct of the business; business; but the mode of operating upon the monies is confided to more than one person.

2430. Can you state to how many?—Yes. to five; and in this way: he gives to the Assistant Paymaster-general the power to write off from the Exchequer credit and cash accounts to his drawing and bill accounts, and to another person, in the absence of the Assistant Paymaster-general. Then he gives to three other persons who are paymasters the power of drawing upon the drawing account, and of accepting bills payable out of the bill account.

2431. Should the conduct of any of those five officers be wrong, is the Paymaster-general responsible?—I conceive he is.

2432. Do you consider that in any case the Paymaster-general, or those who act for him, has a right to refuse any payments?—Yes; in the case of an order not drawn up in accordance with the regulations laid down for that purpose, or at variance with the instructions of the Paymaster-general.

2434. But those forms being gone through, the Paymaster and his deputies are merely ministerial officers to make the payment?—Exactly. But nevertheless if the payment ordered were of an illegal character, it would be refused; and if the order emanated from the Treasury, a representation would be made to the Treasury on the subject.

2435. Your power of check, whatever it be, consists in making a representation in such a case?—I think it goes no further where the order emanates from the Treasury.

2436. Chairman.] You have read the memorandum by Lord Monteagle, which had been given in evidence, and which is attached to the papers, have you not?—I have.

2437. Lord Monteagle states that, according to the process to which he objects, payments may be made (first take No. 4) "For services for which no Exchequer warrant to the Bank of England has issued directing a credit to the Paymaster for this particular service or head of service;" can that be so according to the present practice?—Yes; it can.

2438. Is that a common case, or is it a rare case?—Does the question refer to the Exchequer warrant to the Bank?

2439. Yes?—It is quite common.

2440. No. 3. Payments may be made "For services respecting which no Royal Order, Treasury Warrant, and issuing letter have ever issued; or if issued, have never been sanctioned by the Exchequer as regular and conformable to law"; can that be done?—That is not done as a rule; I know of no exception.

2441. You think that it has never been done?—To my knowledge, not in my time; I remember indeed a case, wherein I refused to pay upon an order from the Commissioners of Works, because I was not satisfied that the Royal Order had issued, though I was satisfied that the grant had been made by the House of Commons. I sent and made inquiries; and it was not till after I had satisfied myself that the Royal Order had issued, that I paid it.

2442. Then payments may be made, No. 2, "For services for which no ways and means have been provided, and which cannot therefore be legally defrayed"; can that be done?—It is not done; no payment is made for anything but what has been voted, and for which ways and means have been provided; as to payments made under the authority of the Treasury, they would never issue an order without ways and means had been provided.

2443. That is not done?—No.

2444. "For services not voted by Parliament or sanctioned by statute"; can payments be made for that?—I am not aware of any payments that can be made of that description.

2445. Have payments ever been made, to your knowledge, of that description?—If the question has reference to monies which appertain to the departments, of course payments are made that are not voted by Parliament, otherwise my answer would be in the negative.

2446. That has never been done?—Not to my knowledge.

2447. Do you never advance for a service before a vote is taken?—No; because because I do not think that it has ever been necessary, so far as I recollect; of course if Parliament were late, I do not know what would be done. I am not aware of any instance.

E. A. Hoffay, Esq.

2448. There has never been, to your recollection, an advance made before a vote has been agreed upon in Parliament?—Yes, there have been cases where the civil contingencies have been brought in aid.

2449. Then, technically speaking, the issue takes place out of the civil contingencies as an advance?—Yes, those are the only cases; in the other departments, the great services, it does not occur.

2450. Are there no cases in which advances have been made before the votes have actually passed?—I think not in my time, because Parliament has always assembled sufficiently early to vote a sum on account.*

2451. Has it not been done?—As a rule it is not done; but I recollect a case in which it was done. There is one case in which the Ordnance ran short, and though a supplemental estimate was before the House, before that could be passed, we were obliged to carry on the Ordnance service with the Army grants.

2452. That was a great service?—Yes; and in that particular year there was such an intermixture; it was the year in which the Ordnance was blended with the Army; there was an intermixture of money, and a transfer of votes from one department to the other, which obliged us to consider the whole as army monies.

2453. That was in what year?—That was very recently, when the Ordnance was blended with the Army, I think, last March 12 months.

2454. Then that would come into last year's expenditure, would it not?—Yes; there was enough money left to carry on an estimated number of days, in expectation that the vote would be reported by that time, but it was not quite ready by that time; there was a great deal of money owing to the Ordnance, and it was very uncertain whether they would or would not have sufficient; but that was an exceptional case; as a rule it is not done.

2455. Then you would have no difficulty in giving the Committee a return as to those three first items; they were advances made for services not voted by Parliament, or sanctioned by statute, and again, for services for which no means had been provided?—Any return that the Committee may call for I will do my best to make.

2456. The Committee have been informed that it is the practice to pay all charges out of your drawing account, and to set right any excess over the credits in the Exchequer in the course of the day; is it done in the course of the day, or when is it done?—It is not done in the course of the day, but occasionally when the necessity arises, always at the end of the month, and more frequently if necessary.

2457. Mr. Anderson, I think, said that it was done in the evening that different orders were sent, and that the next day the Exchequer credits were set right?—Yes, if the sum is considerable; but if it is small there may be no necessity for calling for a credit just at that moment; that is occasionally done when the sum is large and we require it, and always at the end of the month, to place all the services in credit as far as possible.

2458. Do you in the course of the same day go through this process of ascertaining how you have drawn upon the Exchequer credits, or not?—The credits are carried to account daily; therefore we know the precise position of the credits under each service we have to deal with.

2459. But you do not apply to the Treasury, as a matter of practice, till the next day?—No. Sometimes we may be able to foresee the necessity for calling for it, if the sum is large. For instance, supposing I received information of orders from the Admiralty which would probably come in for payment to the extent of 100,000 l., and I hear nothing from any other quarter, and have therefore no reason to suppose that any other services will come in, I should simply simply apply for a credit for 100,000 l. for Navy; in the course of the day, however, 90,000 l. only comes in for payment on account of the Navy. On the other hand, various small miscellaneous payments have come in, and been paid out of the 10,000 l. unclaimed; then, of course, with regard to that 10,000 l. I must put myself in funds, in order to meet the unsatisfied claims of the Navy. But if I had occasion to ask the next day for another naval credit, and the 10,000 l. was not likely to be wanted that day, I should not ask for credits simply to restore that sum at that moment.

* On reviewing Lord Monteagle's memorandum, I find that the whole of my answers to Questions 2440 to 2450 were given under an erroneous impression of the whole subject. It did not occur to me that in all cases wherein payments had been made in excess or anticipation of a grant (which were not defrayed as advances from Civil Contingencies), the regulations adverted to by Lord Monteagle, viz., in regard to services not voted, for which no ways and means had been provided, and in respect of which no Royal Order, Treasury Warrant, or issuing letter had ever issued, had been infringed.

2460. How long would it be outstanding?—That would depend entirely upon the amount of the credits and the necessity for drawing them; but at the end of the month they would be drawn out, for if we were to draw them all out when we did not require them, we should keep permanently a large balance; the object being to keep a low one.

2461. I do not quite see, when you have exceeded your credits, how that would affect your balance uncomfortably, if the next day you do what would set it right?—We might have more money than we wanted the next day.

2462. You clearly would not have more money upon that, because you have spent it?—Yes; but expected claims might not have come in, while cash might have accumulated.

2463. You might set the credits right the next day, might you not?—Certainly we could.

2464. It would only require an issuing letter from the Secretary of the Treasury?—Nothing more. This is the form in which we apply for the credits daily (handing in the same).

2465. You set it right at the end of the month?—Always; but frequently before.

2466. Do you do it at the end of a fortnight, or is it accidental, whether you do it till the end of the month comes?—It is accidental till the end of the month.

2467. It may happen that the thing is not set right in a particular vote till the end of the month?—It may be, if the sum is small and immaterial.

2468. There are some statements made by Lord Monteagle in his Appendix, with regard to certain charges upon the Consolidated Fund; he seems to be under the impression that certain salaries and charges are paid before any credit of the Comptroller is issued at all?—I have no recollection of it in my time.*

2469. You were in office in 1853, were you not?—No, not till 1854.

2470. You do not know whether this was so or not?—I cannot say without referring to the particular case alluded to.

2471. There would be no difficulty as to the charges upon the Consolidated Fund?—No.

2472. Do you think there would be any real difficulty in making a rule that those Exchequer credits should be set right, either the next day or the day after?—No; but I do not know what utility would attend it; if I drew out the whole of the naval credits and exhausted them, and took the next in succession, the result would be the same.

2473. Would there be any difficulty in doing that?—There would be no real difficulty.

2474. If Parliament said, "For one day you may issue beyond what you have for any particular credit, but set it right the next day," there would be no difficulty, would there?—No; we could do that, certainly.

2475. Do you contemplate any difficulty?—As I see it at present, I do not contemplate any difficulty.

2476. Your cash balances are never so large as to interfere very much with your payments, are they?—As I said before, as regards small sums I see no difficulty, in the case of large sums there might be.

2477. What is the amount of your cash balance?—It varies so much; we have hardly any control over it, and we cannot tell till the Bank books come up; we may find by the Bank book that a large amount has come in.

2479. I thought it was composed of old stores and of monies repaid?—No.

2480. Of

* I was not aware at the time I made this answer that this has occurred.

E. A. Hoffay, Esq.

23 June 1856.

2480. Of what is it composed?—Of a variety of sums that are paid in; there are remittances through the East India Company from regiments in India, regimental funds, balances repaid by agents, repayments on account of the navy, and we have no knowledge of the amount until the Bank book comes up.

2481. What does the cash account ever amount to?—In 1855-6 it was 5,750,000 l.

2482. What is your maximum daily?—From memory I cannot say.

2483. Do you ever remember an occasion on which it was not exhausted in the course of the next day?—No, I do not remember; it is exhausted, and sometimes not.

2484. You are directed by both minutes to draw and to exhaust your cash account before you go to the Exchequer credit account?—Yes.

2485. Do you remember any case in which the cash account was not exhausted in the course of the day?—Not exhausted to a fraction, certainly. I do not consider the rule to be so stringent as that, because moneys may come in unexpectedly which we cannot well exhaust. I understand it to mean that we are to use the cash in preference to drawing credits from the Exchequer.

2486. It would not interfere with you if you could exhaust it in the next day?—Perhaps not, although it might in the case of an unexpected run upon us.

2487. Lord Monteagle made an allusion to an advance that was made for the purchase of certain lands, and he stated that it was extremely pressing, and that in consequence he went beyond what, probably, the law might justify, and that he procured a bill of indemnity to be inserted in the Appropriation Act; do you remember that?—I do not remember the particulars.

2488. Mr. Wilson.] Suppose your estimated expenditure to-morrow for the navy should be 250,000 l., you request an Exchequer credit for that amount?—Yes.

2489. Suppose that the navy, instead of drawing 250,000 l. as you are told is probable, draws only 220,000 l., and does not draw anything more for a week, it would be impossible for you to adjust that account until they required a further payment to be made; you could not return the money into the Exchequer, could you?—No; but I might apply it to other services.

2490. If you have an Exchequer credit to-day on behalf of the navy for 250,000 l., and only 220,000 l. are really required to-morrow, you have no means of adjusting the account until the service for which it has been drawn requires payments to exhaust that credit?—Exactly so; I have not.

2491. If, on the other hand, the service requires 250,000 l., and you draw to the amount of 260,000 l., then you are 10,000 l. overdrawn, and that account you can readily adjust the following day?—Yes.

2492. So that, in point of fact, when you overdraw an account you can adjust it immediately, but where you have not spent the whole sum, you cannot adjust that balance until that same service requires a further payment?—Precisely; when overdrawn the account can be adjusted the next day, but when underdrawn not until further orders for payment come in.

2493. In the meantime all this makes no difference in your cash; whether you under-estimate or over-estimate there is no difference in your cash?—None.

2494. You draw no more money from the Exchequer in the one case than in the other, though you have obtained Exchequer credits for more than is required?—Yes, that is the case.

2495. Not a shilling is taken out of the Exchequer whatever the issues may be, but what is necessary for the public service?—That is our aim.

2496. It may be that you find payments made into your cash account from the East India Company, or advances made from one department to another, which places you in cash upon the cash account, which you had no means of anticipating?—That is so.

2497. Therefore, though you have provided to-day for the expenditure of to-morrow, it may turn out that not a shilling may be required?—Yes.

2498. Therefore it would be impossible to control your payments from day to day by means of Exchequer credits without leaving unnecessarily large balances on the cash account to the account of those various departments?—They would be unnecessarily large occasionally, certainly.

2499. But although you may exceed on one day, and those credits from day to to day may not be exactly equivalent to the demands of the service, there is one rule, is there not, which you invariably follow, that you never, under any circumstances, exceed the vote of Parliament?—That is the rule.

2500. Until you have exceeded the vote of Parliament, up to the amount of that vote, you use the public monies for the public service in the way the most economical, keeping the smallest balances?—Exactly.

2501. You would conceive that the object of the appropriation audit is substantially and literally accomplished when the public monies are used in the most economical manner, and in such a way as that the vote cannot be exceeded in the course of the year?—Most certainly; because the use of that money for other purposes is not appropriation or application, in the sense in which Lord Monteagle appears to conceive it.

2502. With regard to the charges upon the Consolidated Fund, you are authorised to pay certain charges for judges' salaries, and other things, by Exchequer issues, as charges upon the Consolidated Fund?—Yes.

2503. Have you any means of knowing when those payments may be called for?—No; a certain number would be called for in the regular course.

2504. In the quarterly charges upon the Consolidated Fund, which are provided for in the close of the quarterly accounts, those charges have been provided for and are paid in the currency of the following quarter, at uncertain times?—Yes.

2505. It would be impossible, notwithstanding that the charge itself is a specific charge by Act of Parliament, if you were from day to day to make requisitions upon the Treasury for issues in respect of those payments, so as to secure an absolute amount of money in your hands, always exactly to meet the demands of the day?—Quite so.

2506. Of the sum of 30,000 l. issued to you for payments to-morrow as charges upon the Consolidated Fund, it may be that many of those payments may not be called for for five or six weeks to come?—Yes.

2507. But you must be always ready to pay them?—Yes, to pay them at the moment.

2508. Mr. Williams.] Do you keep an account of the different items of payments on account of each of the votes of Parliament?—Certainly.

2509. When the amount is paid up, would you refuse any application made beyond that amount?—Yes, we should; in all cases when we were aware of it.

2510. The Exchequer, you are aware, keeps a similar account?—Of credits; but the one that has just been alluded to as kept by the Paymaster-general is of payments. We are obliged, owing to the system of credits at the Exchequer, to keep two accounts under every head, one to record the credits, and the other the payments.

2511. That is, a debtor and creditor account?—Yes, but they are separate accounts, one relates to credits, the other to payments.

2512. If the payments were made to the full extent of the vote, you would then refuse any further payment, would you not?—Yes, so far as we have knowledge of it; but with regard to the three great services, which comprehend 50,000,000 l. out of 56,000,000 l., we have no means of knowing whether the grants for a particular year are exhausted or not; that is, have been finally expended.

2513. How is it possible, unless you keep a correct account, that you can ascertain that the amount to be drawn on the vote of Parliament is exhausted?—That is done by the Commissioners of Audit, when they audit the accounts of those departments.

2514. How often do you send your accounts to the Commissioners of Audit?—Monthly. I have a statement here, showing that we had balances in the Exchequer, and service balances on our books, on respect of the Army, Navy, Commissariat, and Ordnance, on the 31st of March 1848, when all those four services had exceeded their grants, which will show the impossibility of having such a check at the Pay-office.

2515. If they exceeded their grants you would have made issues beyond the authority of Parliament?—No, not to our knowledge.

2516. Do not you consider that the votes of Parliament are to be regarded as they are to be found in the Appropriation Bill?—But there is an especial audit to check their appropriation. The Paymaster-general's account is a mere cash account. For instance, we may issue out of the grants of 1855-6 large sums on imprest, a portion of which may be expended in the following year, and brought into the account of the following year; on the other hand, there may be large sums expended abroad in 1856 which cannot be recorded as expenditure until after the termination of the year.

2517. You state that you send your accounts to the Audit department monthly; do they examine them soon after?—Yes, I presume so.

2518. Suppose, in the course of that month, you make payments to a large extent beyond the votes of Parliament, have you no check other than that which is furnished by the audit?—The check is in the department itself. There is an audit there from day to day under the Commissioners of Audit.

2519. Suppose, for instance, you take the Navy Estimates; there is a specific vote of Parliament for a general purpose; and supposing that the expenditure upon that particular vote is more than the amount, would you take the difference from any other vote where the amount may not be required to the full extent?—We should exercise no discretion as long as there were naval monies unissued; a vote may appear to us to have been exceeded, which upon "repayments" to its credit may be found in surplusage, and a vote which may appear to us in surplusage may be found to have been exceeded when the expenditure paid out of imprests is brought to account.

2520. But the imprest is included in the amount of the vote of Parliament?—Yes; but monies are not considered expended while they remain out on imprest. We have no check on the application of the grants by the department.

2521. You take no cognisance of that?—No; as long as we had funds appertaining to the department in the Exchequer we should pay.

2522. Supposing the vote for the navy is 6,000,000 l., comprehending some 15 different items, you do not keep an account of the payments on account of each of those items, but you would pay up to the 6,000,000 l., the amount of the vote of Parliament?—We keep it under the items as directed; we are simply bankers; every order is marked with the head of service to which we are to carry it; we exercise no discretion.

2523. Without any regard whether the amount of the particular vote is exceeded or not?—Certainly.

2524. Mr. Bowyer.] Have you any official means of knowing what the amount of each vote is?—Yes.

2525. You make no use of that as to control?—Not as regards the great departments. We might call them to account for having exceeded a particular vote, vote, while a repayment for stores supplied to other departments might convert an apparent excess into a surplus.

2526. Then your knowledge of the votes of Parliament is of no use?—As regards the three great services none whatever.

2527. Sir James Graham.] The case put to you is, that the vote for the navy is 6,000,000 l.?—Yes.

2528. You are cognisant that 6,000,000 l. is the whole amount of the navy credit for the year?—Yes.

2529. Day by day they know the state of the drafts upon that naval credit in the Paymaster's office?—Yes.

2530. If at the end of six months you saw that the credits for the navy approached very nearly the whole amount for the year, the 6,000,000 l., would you not make it known, both to the department and to the Treasury, that the credit was drawing nearly to a state of exhaustion long before the end of the year?—No; we cannot say that it is drawing to a state of exhaustion, as long as there was any money in the Exchequer belonging to the navy, we should answer their calls.

2531. My question is, whether, if at the end of six months the 6,000,000 l. granted by Parliament for the year is very nearly exhausted, and you know it, you would take any step upon that?—If there were no money in the Exchequer we could not continue to pay.

2532. If at the end of six months the supply for the year ran very low, but was not exhausted, would you not think it then your duty to call the attention of the Treasury, or of the naval department, to the state of the account?—No; because Parliament has placed an auditor in the department itself, who is cognisant of all the orders, and the issues, and the whole of their transactions, which the Paymaster-general is not.

2533. Mr. Wilson.] You are aware that the Treasury keep a daily account of the issues upon every vote?—Yes, they do.

2534. And are you not aware that it would be the duty of the Treasury, in the event to which the Right honourable Baronet adverted, if at the end of the six months the money was nearly exhausted, watching the state of those issues from day to day, to call the attention of the department to the fact?—They have done so.

2535. In the last year the Treasury did so upon repeated occasions, did they not?—Yes, within my knowledge they did.

2536. You are aware that in consequence of the Treasury doing so, the departments were obliged to overhaul their expenditure and estimates, and furnish supplemental estimates to Parliament?—Yes.

2537. Therefore that is the duty of the Treasury, as the controlling financial department, and not of the Pay-office; the Paymaster has no opportunity of knowing those facts better than the Treasury itself?—No.

2538. Mr. Bowyer.] You have nothing to do but to go on paying as long as the funds last?—As long as there are funds in the Exchequer.

2539. Mr. Wilson.] You are aware that at the Treasury a strict account is kept of all the votes of Parliament and of every issue upon each of those votes?—I am; a very complete account.

2540. From day to day, when you make demands upon the Treasury for issues upon the votes, those issues are made in reference to the state of the account as it exists in the Treasury?—Yes.

2541. If anything irregular took place in any of those departments, as to its issues or any unusual expenditure in reference to the period of the year, the Treasury would have cognizance of that, and it would be their duty to rectify any irregular proceedings of that kind?—Certainly, and from them it would come with some effect.

2542. You are the agent or the banker for all the departments, and you have to draw your resources by applications to the Treasury, which is cognisant of all those transactions and has more opportunity of judging, both of the policy of the expenditure and the details of those votes in relation to the expenditure, than you have?—A great deal more.

2543. There is no information which you have which the Treasury has not?—None.

2544. Sir James Graham.] When the navy wants money, what is the course that that the naval department take; what requisition do they make to the Treasury?—They make none to the Treasury.

E. A. Hoffay, Esq.

23 June 1856.

2545. How do they get their money?—They make a monthly estimate of the monies which will probably be required, which is sent to the Paymaster-general, and by him laid before the Treasury.

2546. How is the Treasury kept informed of the daily expenditure of the department?—By credits which the Paymaster-general calls for; by the demands from day to day.

2547. Do you make a daily representation then to the Treasury of the credits demanded of you?—Yes; for the expected payments of the day.

2548. And they are posted against the department, are they not?—In the books of the Treasury, and in those of the Paymaster-general.

2549. They are posted in the books of the Treasury?—Yes.

2550. By the books, the Treasury directly day by day is informed accurately of the state of the cash account of the department?—Exactly; they are accurately informed of the gradual diminution of the votes.

2551. It is not only the theory, but it is the practice that the Treasury exercises a control upon such knowledge?—Yes, they do; and they have done it frequently of late.

2552. Mr. Wilson.] They did so very extensively last year, did they not?—Yes.

2553. Chairman.] You stated, did you not, that those credits for the navy included the expenditure for the other departments, and that having drawn a credit for the navy, it went into your paying account, and out of that you paid for anything that came in, and that you did not set it right sometimes until the end of the month?—Yes, that is so.

2554. How is that consistent with the Treasury knowing accurately what the expenditure for the navy is, if you are paying out of navy credits any other expenditure?—That credit is founded upon information received of the amount of orders actually issued.

2555. Suppose you draw 50,000*l.* for the navy, and you spend only 30,000*l.*, 20,000*l.* then remains unexpended for navy purposes, and you apply it according to your system to some other services; is not it true that while the navy has only spent during that week 30,000*l.*, the Treasury has an account stating that the expenditure for the navy is 50,000*l.*?—I do not suppose the money remains a week; a man generally comes for his money pretty quickly when he gets a bill at sight upon the Paymaster-general. I do not think that the money remains long.

2556. The Secretary of the Treasury put the supposition of your 30,000*l.* remaining uncalled for for a whole week?—Yes.

2557. That is not so, is it?—It is impossible to say what will remain uncalled for, nor how long.

2558. Mr. Wilson.] The question originally put to you was this—If the naval vote was six millions of money, and at the end of the half-year you discovered that nearly 6,000,000*l.* had been expended, that is, had been issued from the Exchequer on behalf of the navy, you considered it a part of your duty to inform the Treasury and the department. I understood you to say, that it was no part of your duty to do that, but that the Treasury, who also keep a distinct check upon the amounts issued, as against the votes of Parliament, from the Exchequer applicable to naval accounts, keep an account which would enable them to exercise that control over the department?—That is precisely so.

2559. As to the expenditure of the money in your hands, when once within the control of the navy it is impossible for any account to be actually made up of it until all the imprest accounts of foreign and home expenditure have been adjusted by the Audit-office, with regard to the actual distribution of that money?—It is quite impossible.

2560. Therefore the only thing which they can control at the time is to see that there is not a larger amount of money put at the disposal of the navy for which the naval authorities are responsible than that which Parliament has voted for the service?—Yes.

2561. When once under the control of the Admiralty, the Admiralty is responsible to the Audit Board for the use of the money, sooner or later, whether abroad or at home; by theory those accounts are closed some time after the end of the year, but it is impossible to adjust all those monies under the proper heads heads of expenditure, is it not?—It is wholly impossible; the paper I have produced, I think, most clearly proves the impossibility of the Paymaster-general having any knowledge of the exact condition of the naval monies, as to their appropriation.

2562. When you said a little time ago that you take no notice of the votes of Parliament with regard to the Navy and Army; did you not mean that you take no notice of the separate votes of which their general grant was composed; but you do take notice, do you not, of the whole grant, and you would not under any circumstances issue money to the Army or Navy beyond the entire grant of Parliament for those services?—Certainly not.

2563. Therefore you do to that extent notice the votes of Parliament?—I must do that to draw the credits.

2564. But you do not exceed the whole grant?—No; there was however an exception to this rule in the case of the Ordnance, to which I have adverted, which was made under very peculiar circumstances.

2565. What you mean to say is, that as large portions of those moneys are issued upon imprests, it is impossible to distribute that expenditure under the separate heads of the votes, that is, you do not take notice of the individual votes?—That is so.

2566. Chairman.] You have put in a paper terminating on the 31st of March 1848; is it not the fact that, as regards the Navy, for many years before this there was an excess of expenditure over the estimate?—Yes; they were pretty much in the habit of exceeding their grants. I selected the year 1847–8, because all the great services were in excess that year.

2567. Up to 1848?—Yes.

2568. Sir Henry Willoughby.] Did you not state that if the vote for the navy was exhausted you would stop payment in the Pay-office?—Yes.

2569. Positively?—Yes, if there was no naval money in the Exchequer.

2570. You would not pay from any other balance that you might happen to have at command at that moment?—Certainly not.

2571. Under what authority would you come to that conclusion?—The instructions of the Treasury not to pay beyond the amount of the grants.

2572. From whom do you obtain the precise amount of the grants?—From the Appropriation Act.

2573. That is your authority, not any orders from the Treasury?—Yes.

2574. You stated, did you not, that the Paymaster-general does not know at any given time the actual amount of the balance on the cash account?—Yes, on the cash account at the Bank of England.

2575. You stated, did you not, that you had some difficulty in knowing what amount of Exchequer credit you would want?—Yes; because the Bank book showing the moneys paid to the cash account of the Paymaster at the Bank of England arrives too late in the day to be made use of in the morning of the same day.

2576. Does the difficulty only extend to a day?—Sometimes to two days.

2577. Can you suggest any mode by which the Pay-office could be made better acquainted with the amount of that balance than under the existing mode?—No; it is made as correctly and as quickly acquainted with it as it is possible.

2578. I understood you to say that if 100,000 l. stood to the credit of the navy, and the navy only wanted 90,000 l., you without any hesitation would expend the 10,000 l. on any other service?—Yes.

2579. Can you state to what amount that variation might extend within a month?—No; I cannot state that.

2580. Might it be a very considerable amount in the course of a month?—It might.

2581. Might it extend to half a million?—No, we should ask for credits to restore the equilibrium long before that. The Navy, Army and Ordnance send daily information of their orders of payment for the following day; the Board of Works also and Civil Services generally, come upon us unexpectedly and can rarely be foreseen.

2582. Having made those payments which you have described for other purposes where there is a sudden demand, how are those entered in your account books?—They are entered as final payments against the different heads of service.

2583. Does it appear in those books that you have no credit for those services?

E. A. Hoffay, Esq.

23 June 1856.

vices?—It will appear in the separate credit accounts that are kept, but not in the service accounts; there are two accounts kept, one for the purpose of recording the credits, and the other for the purpose of recording the payments.

2584. Therefore, to a certain extent, one of the systems of account is temporary; there are two sets of account kept?—Yes; the specific credit system obliges us to keep two distinct sets, one to show how the vote is going in credits, and the other to show how it is going in expenditure.

2585. When is that finally recorded?—Day by day as the credits are drawn or the payments made.

2586. Mr. Wilson.] In no case, though you have money over on one head, would you pay it for a service which had not a credit either in the Exchequer, or in your books?—Which had not a credit in the Exchequer, or in our books.

2587. In no case would you pay that money which was over for a particular service on a particular day, for anything which had not a credit in the Exchequer?—Exactly.

2588. Which you would not be entitled to ask for till the following day?—No.

2589. You would only be prevented from asking for an issue for that money, if you had other moneys in hand, which rendered it unnecessary that you should take more money out of the Exchequer?—Yes; if I had a large sum that came in the day before. I should not ask for a credit.

2590. Mr. Cardwell.] The balance in the hands of the Comptroller-general in the Bank of England, and the balance of your cash account in the Bank of England, are both public balances, lying without interest in the Bank, are they not?—Yes, without being productive.

2591. The present practice of your office, under the instructions from the Treasury, is always to feed your drawing and your bill account from your cash account, as far as it will go, before drawing upon the Exchequer credit account?—Yes.

2592. But, in point of fact, that is only a matter of account, and not a matter of money or of interest; if you were to feed both your drawing account and your bill account exclusively from the Exchequer credit account, and let the payments go from your cash account into the Exchequer, that would not increase the total amount of the public balance, nor cause any loss of interest?—If I am correctly informed there are certain periods of the year when the Bank make advances on deficiency bills; of course, it is a great object to pay those bills off, because they bear interest, and they are paid off with the amount at the credit of the Exchequer; and it is desirable to leave as large a sum as possible for that purpose in the Exchequer.

2593. If the balance of your cash account, instead of going to feed your drawing account and your bill account, were paid as rapidly as possible to the Comptroller's account, that would produce the same effect as to the deficiency bills, would it not?—It might be paid to the Comptroller's account.

2594. To adopt that course would not be to increase the balance that the public would require to keep, nor the amount of interest that they would have to pay?—No; but it would just to that extent increase the amount drawn from the Exchequer; there would be nothing gained.

2595. Would there not be this gained, that everything you expended for the services would pass through one channel, and be subject to one Parliamentary contract?—Yes, but there is great convenience in having a little cash at command.

2596. Mr. Wilson.] The payments which are made into your cash account are altogether repayments of advances, which have been made from one department to another, but they are repayments of monies which have been advanced by departments for services, say to the East India Company, which are repaid to them; those monies, therefore, belong to the departments; they have already been drawn from the Exchequer, and they form a part of the votes for that year belonging to those departments, do they not?—Certainly; it did not occur to me that a large portion of it does not appertain to the Exchequer.

2597. If therefore the advances were paid back into the Exchequer they would, to that amount, diminish the vote which Parliament had given to that department for the year's service?—Yes; and it might prevent that department from carrying on the service for which their vote had been taken.

2598. Suppose the Navy had granted to it 6,000,000 l. for a year, and that 1,000,000 l. of that money had been advanced to services outside the public services,

services, which would be repaid to the cash account when those repayments took place, if they were repaid to the Exchequer, it would to that extent diminish the naval services of the year to 5,000,000 l. instead of 6,000,000 l.? —Yes.

2599. In all cases where receipts are paid to the cash account, which are not in the character of advances from public services, which have already come out of the Exchequer under the votes, they are paid back into the Exchequer?—Yes.

2600. Then all original receipts which do not belong to any particular department go back to the Exchequer?—Yes.

2601. The distinction is, that any repayments of monies which have already come out of the Exchequer as a part of the vote for the year for a department, and which have been advanced to other services, and are repaid from a part of the monies belonging to that service, and cannot go back into the Exchequer without diminishing the votes of that department, whereas in all cases where the original receipts form no part of the votes of that year, and shall come into the hands of the departments, they are paid into the Exchequer?—Yes.

2602. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] If a rule were laid down that the repayments of advances out of a vote were to be paid into the Exchequer, would it not be necessary to permit the department to draw an equal sum in excess of their vote, to set their vote straight?—Yes; or else to take an additional sum for that purpose.

2603. Suppose that the Army department issued 100,000 l. on account of the East India Company, and the East India Company repaid that 100,000 l. in the course of the year, if that sum were paid into the Exchequer, instead of being paid to the cash account of the Paymaster-general, the vote of the department would be short by 100,000 l. according to the present law?—Yes.

2604. If, therefore, that practice were established, would it not be necessary to allow the department to draw out of the Exchequer an equivalent sum in excess of their vote in order to adjust their account?—Yes, certainly, to enable them to carry on the service.

2605. That change would resolve itself into a different mode of keeping accounts, would it not?—Yes, altogether.

2606. Mr. Bowyer.] If the repayments were made into the Exchequer instead of to the Paymaster-general, thereby diminishing the amount of the vote for the particular service, would not that repayment be re-issued again to make up the amount of the vote?—No, not under the present law.

2607. Could not that be so?—No; when once paid into the Exchequer it would be made available as ways and means.

2608. The Secretary of the Treasury has suggested that if those repayments were paid into the Exchequer, instead of being paid to the Paymaster-general, the effect would be that the amount of the vote for the particular service to which the repayment belongs would be so far short in the books of the Paymaster-general?—Yes.

2609. Then I ask you whether that must not be remedied by a re-issue of that repayment from the Exchequer to make up the amount of the vote?—Of course that might be provided for under a new regulation.

2610. Do not you see any inconvenience in such a re-issue of the repayments from the Exchequer?—I cannot see the advantage.

2611. Would it not be more regular?—I think not. When you are entitled to have the repayment carried to the credit of your vote, why should you pay it into the Exchequer for the purpose of being taken out again.

2612. Mr. Wilson.] At the present moment, the function of the Comptroller of the Exchequer is to see that the votes of Parliament are not exceeded; but if that function were to be disturbed during a whole year by the uncertainty of the amount of the payments from different departments, there would be no distinct function, and it would not be defined, as it is now?—Precisely.

2613. Mr. Bowyer.] Do not you consider that such repayments are in point of substance, though not technically so, revenue, and therefore properly payable into the Exchequer, and not to the Paymaster-general?—I do not consider them revenue.

2614. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] On the other hand, does not it appear to you that if the repayments of advances were made into the Exchequer, such a system would falsify the statement of the annual revenue and expenditure, and make it much larger than it really was?—Certainly.

E. A. Hoffay, Esq.

23 June 1856.

2615. Supposing the advances out of the votes for a particular year were 500,000 l., and the repayments of those advances fell due in the year, would it not make it appear as if the revenue and expenditure were both half a million greater than they were?—Yes; it would increase it on both sides to that extent.

2616. For instance, if the Government made an advance of 100,000 l. on behalf of the East India Company, and received the repayment of it within the year, would that be fairly considered as the revenue and expenditure of the Government?—No.

2617. Mr. Bowyer.] Supposing under a new regulation the repayments were paid into the Exchequer instead of being made to the Paymaster-general, would it not, if the books were properly kept, appear in the books of the Exchequer that they were repayments?—It might be so noted, certainly.

2618. If so, would not the objection made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the revenue and expenditure would appear greater than they really were, be answered?—You might, of course, exhibit such transactions in such manner as to exclude them from revenue and expenditure.

2619. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] If the present system of considering payments into the Exchequer as payments towards the ways and means of the year were followed, that practice would not be consistent with the present system?—It would be quite at variance with it.

2620. In order to adjust the present practice to the plan of making the repayments into the Exchequer, it would be necessary, would it not, to introduce a special exception to meet that particular case?—Undoubtedly.

2621. Mr. Williams.] Are there instances of votes of Parliament to public departments exceeding the amount of the expenditure?—There are.

2622. Supposing, for instance, the vote for the Navy to be 6,000,000 l., and only 5½ millions expended, are there such instances?—Yes; that would be the case of a surplus surrendered and given up in aid of ways and means.

2623. To whom is it given up from your department?—It is given up to the Exchequer.

2624. In what form is the declaration made, or does it come before Parliament?—The surplus is declared on the face of the audited account laid before Parliament.

2625. How have they been dealt with; how have they been surrendered to the public; can you state the form?—The Treasury direct the Comptroller-general of the Exchequer to withdraw the amount from the naval balances in his hands, and a transfer entry is made in the Paymaster-general's books, debiting Navy services and crediting the Exchequer.

2626. Is it surrendered into the Exchequer?—It is.

2627. How is it taken out again?—It remains at the disposal of the Committee of Ways and Means.

2628. Is it accounted for to Parliament in any form?—It appears in the finance accounts.

2629. Mr. Hankey.] You stated, did you not, that the only means you had of ascertaining what the amount sanctioned by Parliament was, was from the Appropriation Act?—I did.

2630. As the Appropriation Act is not made up till the close of the session, there must be a great deal of expenditure going on which you are called upon to make before that Appropriation Act is passed?—Yes; but I should have added, that when the vote is reported, we consider the grant made.

2631. Then you would consider the votes of Parliament in the same light as an Appropriation Act?—Yes.

2632. Chairman.] Every Ways and Means Act authorises the ways and means to be applied to any sum granted by Parliament?—Yes.

2633. Mr. Bowyer.] You have been asked whether those repayments, if made into the Exchequer, would not make the Comptroller of the Exchequer a public accountant; will you state why those repayments into the Exchequer would make the Comptroller of the Exchequer a public accountant, more than the payments of the revenue departments into the Exchequer make him a public accountant?—I really cannot answer the question in what way it might affect the Comptroller of the Exchequer.

2634. There is no distinction, is there?—I cannot say that I see any distinction.

2635. Chairman.]

E. A. Hoffay, Esq.

23 June 1856.

2635. Chairman.] You were at the Audit-office, at the head of what is called the Appropriation Audit, for some time?—Yes.

2636. I observe that in some papers which were given in and published upon the Commissariat accounts, you have given an account with regard to those appropriation audits. You state, "The problem of effectually checking the proceedings of the large administrative departments is still to be solved, and as its solution involves a total change in our system of accountability and our existing institutions, I suppose we are not prepared to take the leap." Will you explain what are the imperfections in the checking of the proceedings of the large departments, and what you mean by the change that is required to carry it into effect?—One of the imperfections is, that the system of appropriation audit extends only over a portion of the supply services, it should be made to comprehend the whole of the civil services. Secondly, That the account now laid before Parliament, under the Act of the 9 & 10 Vict., c. 92, is too concise. There is a detailed account presented to the House under a Treasury Minute of January 1846, which is very much in detail; and I think that an account, something between the two, giving a little more explanation than is now given in the abstract account, and accompanied by a balance sheet, which does accompany the detailed account, and which shows the assets and liabilities of the department at the close of the year, would give the auditors a greater field for observation, and would enable them to bring before Parliament many points which at present they cannot bring forward. They are not at liberty to address a department on any subject arising out of the detailed account, that being examined on behalf of the Treasury; although they may address the Treasury, and the Treasury may address the department; but I would give them a greater freedom of action in making their observations upon a somewhat more detailed account than the account which is rendered under the 9th and 10th Vict. c. 92. To show the Committee the importance of a balance sheet such as I have described, I would request permission to read the opinion of a Committee of Inquiry into the system of Account and Audit in the Ordnance department, composed of Sir William Herries, Mr. Brooksbank, Mr. Thomas, and Mr. Anderson on this subject. In this report, which is dated the 6th of December 1845, they state, "It should be recollected that the naval and military expenditure is conducted, in every part of the world, through the agency of little short of 2,000 different sub-accountants, and that the accounts are so intermixed with those of other public departments that no statement of such extended transactions can be considered complete which is not supported by a balance sheet. A few remarks on one or two items of the army balance sheet for 1843-4 will clearly explain how essential such a document is as a corroboration of the accuracy of the balance declared on the annual account, and of the legitimate employment of the army funds. On reference to the document in question, it will be seen that the expenditure, in the year 1843-4, for land forces, amounted to 3,556,018 l. 4 s. 9 d.; of this sum the proportion defrayed in the colonies, out of advances on credit to paymasters and others, from the Commissariat Chests, amounted to 1,043,395 l. 7 s. 4 d. In the absence of any statement explanatory of the balance of the account, there would be nothing to show whether these temporary loans or advances out of other funds for army services abroad, the expenditure of which had been included in the account, had been repaid or not. The whole might remain an unliquidated debt in the War-office books, and thus facilities might be afforded of employing the balance of army monies for purposes not sanctioned by Parliament. Another item of the balances will completely exemplify this. The balance unappropriated out of the army grants for the year 1843-4, was 512,011 l. 17 s. 6 d. It might be considered that this amount, being a surplus of grants after defraying all charges for the year 1843-4, could at once be given up to the Treasury; but the explanatory statement of the balances, shows that a sum of 513,700 l. 15 s. 1 d. had been advanced out of army grants, to pay services on account of the East India Company, to 31st March 1844, and that the Company remained indebted to the army funds in a balance exceeding the surplus for which the War-office was accountable to the Treasury; and, consequently, that the unappropriated balance of the account for the year 1843-4 could not be given up to the Treasury until the East India Company had liquidated their debt to the army funds." It is such a statement as this that ought to be appended to the account laid before Parliament under the Act. I admit that the detailed account

E. A. Hoffay, Esq.

2637. What account are you alluding to, as the detailed account?—This is the one (handing in the same). It contains a balance sheet, showing the monies owing to the army, and the monies owing by the navy, and in what way their money has been employed.

2638. You say that "the problem of effectually checking the proceedings of the large administrative departments is still to be solved." You mean the Army, Navy, and Ordnance, do you not?—Yes; and it might be effected by means of an account which shall give the Audit Board an opportunity or commenting more fully on the proceedings of the departments.

2639. Whatever check the Audit Board exercise by bringing the matter under the consideration of Parliament, they have no power whatever of disallowing any item?—None whatever; you can do no more than that; you cannot check an administrative department in any other way, for you would impede its liberty of action, or you would weaken the responsibility of Government to Parliament.

2640. Do you consider that the appropriation audit is a correct audit, or is it a Parliamentary check?—It is more of a Parliamentary check.

2641. What does the officer really do?—He does not question the propriety of the expenditure; but every voucher passes through his hands, and he satisfies himself that it has undergone examination according to the rules of the department, that it has passed through the various stages, and is properly authenticated; he questions the expenditure in no way whatsoever; he then sees that it is carried to the proper head, and traces it through the various books, to its final resting-place in the general account. He would not allow a sum to be paid to a contractor on account unless for a bonâ fide service performed, or stores delivered, because it might be done with the view of absorbing a surplus.

2642. That is something more than putting it under its proper head?—Yes, because there is a special clause in the Act forbidding any of the departments to charge to their grants anything but final payments.

2643. In case the expenditure contemplated in the Estimates has been delayed over the 1st of April, the greater part of the expenditure having been incurred, would it be improper for a department to make a payment on account, equal to the work done?—No; unless it should cause an excess on the grant.

2644. But in some cases it might be, for example, the building of engines?—I remember a case where there were large instalments paid which were not due under the terms of the contract, and therefore not obligatory.

2645. In that case had not the expenditure been actually incurred, though probably the sum might have been postponed?—Yes; but it caused an excess on the grants.

2646. Is it not rather the habit of the department to postpone the payment till the next year than to pay it beforehand?—That depends upon circumstances, but then they have to get it revoted, which they do not like. As the grants are made for sums which will come in course of payment in the year, it is the duty of the auditor to see that no expenditure which should appear in the account for the year is postponed.

2647. There is no doubt great power in the department for adjusting such a matter?—Very great.

2648. Do you think that there are any means by which there could be new checks and rules laid down for the guidance of the department and Audit-office?—I think that if the accounts rendered under the Act 9 & 10 Vict. c. 92 were more detailed; the auditors would be enabled to do justice to the subject with the powers they possess; at present they cannot address the departments on points arising out of the detailed accounts.

2649. Is that account which is furnished in detail to the Treasury, accompanied with the observations of the Audit-office?—No, it is not; but I must say that, as far as I recollect, they have been unimportant.

2650. What is the advantage of publishing those observations if they are not of great importance?—They have been of sufficient importance to note to the Treasury.

2651. So far as it goes that is sufficient, you think?—Yes; but I would have a somewhat more detailed account rendered to Parliament under the Act.

2652. Their

2652. Their power is sufficient, but the account rendered to Parliament is not in sufficient detail?—Yes, I think their power is sufficient. Any greater powers might interfere with the functions of the department.

2653. You stated that it "involves a total change in our system of accountability and our existing institutions;" that contemplates very considerable alterations, does it not?—It does. If you bring the whole of the civil services under a well organised system of audit, I certainly see no use for the Exchequer check. As regards the grants for the Miscellaneous Services and Civil Contingencies, I would have the Paymaster-general relieved of the duty of checking the expenditure of the votes, which, after all, he can do but very imperfectly; he should simply furnish the Treasury with daily returns of his payments under each separate head of service, which would afford the Treasury the means of laying an audited account of the expenditure of the miscellaneous grants before Parliament.

2654. Would you have one of the audit officials in the Paymaster's office, as in the other offices?—Not in the Paymaster's office, for that would be useless, but I would have him at the Treasury, where he should check the first credit given.

2655. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Your meaning is, that there should be an audit at the Treasury for the miscellaneous services, similar to that which exists at the Admiralty for the navy services, and at the War department for the army services?—Precisely.

2656. Chairman.] How would that be, because the greater part of the miscellaneous estimates are not expended at all in connexion with the Treasury, and the order does not go out from the Treasury?—The order does not in all cases go out from the Treasury, certainly; but arrangements might be made to meet this difficulty.

2657. What would be the advantage of having the miscellaneous services audited in detail by the Treasury, rather than by the Audit-office?—They are not at present audited by the Audit-office.

2658. Suppose you had a detailed audit of those services, would that be better conducted by the Treasury than by the Audit-office?—No; but it should be conducted by the Audit-office, at the Treasury.

2659. You mean that just as at the present moment you have an audit officer at the Admiralty as to the appropriation audit, there ought to be a similar officer at the Treasury as to the miscellaneous estimates?—Yes, exactly so; at the Treasury.

2660. How would that check the expenditure of the Home-office?—It would keep it within the grant at all events.

2661. I do not understand why it should be at the Treasury; the Treasury do nothing with reference to the expenditure of the Home-office vote, except grant the credit?—No, they do not; but you would have an effectual check upon the credits at least.

2662. So far as that is concerned, it might be so, but you do not know how it is expended in any shape at the Treasury?—No, you do not; but the Treasury could procure whatever information the auditor might require.

2663. There is no possibility of transferring one expenditure to the wrong vote at the Home-office?—No; there is only one in all those offices.

2664. You might do that at the Pay-office, might you not?—No, we know nothing beyond the order to pay.

2665. But there can be no possibility of doing it at the Home-office?—No, not at the Home-office.

2666. I do not quite understand why you would put your check at the Treasury?—Because the Treasury has more or less a controlling action over much of the expenditure under the Miscellaneous votes; and we should thereby extend the audit check to the issue of all credits, which would relieve the Paymaster-general from a duty which he can only do very imperfectly.

2667. You would get rid of the Exchequer and place the whole of the expenditure under the Appropriation Audit?—Yes, the whole.

2668. From what would you relieve the Paymaster?—I would relieve him from the duty of watching the expenditure of the votes. He should keep an account of the expenditure under each vote certainly, but I would have but one cash credit given to him, and not special credits for each service.

2669. After all, that comes to what is done now, does it not?—Not exactly; we

E. A. Hoffay, Esq.

23 June 1856.

we are obliged to watch the votes as regards the credits; we should be relieved of that.

2670. You keep an account, do you not?—Yes, we keep it very strictly.

2671. You do not keep within your credits?—Yes, we do, very strictly keep within our credits.

2672. Not within your Exchequer credits?—Yes, we keep within our Exchequer credits; we never pay beyond them.

2673. Mr. Hankey.] But the whole of the expenditure on any Exchequer credit has never exceeded the total amount granted by Parliament?—No, but in some few cases, where the grant has been overdrawn, the expenditure has, of course, exceeded the credits.

2674. Chairman.] You would propose that there should be the power of drawing, and the only check upon the Paymaster would be the whole amount of the vote?—The check upon the Paymaster should be simply a check upon the expenditure of the monies placed in his hands for general purposes.

2675. You would not allow him to draw upon the whole?—No, he should lay before the Treasury a daily estimate of his wants.

2676. You are not of opinion, are you, that the Treasury does not require looking after like every other department?—Certainly not, for I propose that there should be an auditor at the Treasury.

2677. Therefore you think that this would be strict enough?—I do.

2678. With regard to the present services which are under this audit, suppose that now a misappropriation were to take place, when would Parliament become cognizant of it?—In that respect I would propose making the audit more complete. Even as it is, I am not sure whether such a case would not come before Parliament before the account was presented.

2679. But how would it come out in the regular course of business before Parliament?—Not before the account was laid before Parliament.

2680. When would that be?—The Navy Account, eight months after the termination of the year.

2681. It would not appear this year if it was done at this present moment?—No; eight months after the termination of the year.

2682. It would not appear during any part of the Session next year?—No, not till the end of the year; with regard to the army and ordnance, the term is 12 months.

2683. Suppose it were done now, when would it be laid before Parliament, Parliament being sitting?—Not till the end of the next year.

2684. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Eight months from April next?—Yes, in the case of the navy.

2685. Chairman.] If Parliament happens to be sitting no doubt it would be in eight months, but as Parliament does not sit that time it would probably be two years before last January, before it would come actually before Parliament?—Yes.

2686. Could you suggest anything to get rid of that difficulty?—Yes; that the Board of Audit should report from time to time to the Treasury, and that the Treasury should lay those reports before the House.

2687. With regard to a complaint against the Treasury itself, you would then make the Treasury themselves the judges as to whether they would lay that complaint before Parliament or not?—There would be some difficulty in arranging this point, certainly.

2688. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] You might make it imperative by Act of Parliament, might you not?—Yes, that would meet the case at once. Adverting to the suggestion I have made in regard to an audited account of the Miscellaneous Services, and to the propriety of relieving the Paymaster-general from the necessity of keeping duplicate accounts with all the votes, which the present system of Exchequer credits involves, I beg permission to hand in a letter which was addressed by the Bank of England, on the 8th of February 1849, to the Treasury (the same was delivered in) which shows how greatly the present system of special Exchequer credits interferes with the simple working of the Bank business.

Vide Appendix.

2689. Chairman.] Do you mean to say that the Pay-office is to keep no account of the credits given to it either from the Exchequer or the Treasury, or from wherever it may come upon the separate votes?—Exactly; my view is that it it should not have to keep an account of credits under each separate vote, but receive one cash credit for all the services, and that at the end of each day it should furnish a statement, showing the application of that credit under every head of service.

2690. You would have merely an issue for general purposes?—Yes.

2691. You could make up the statement at the end of the day?—Yes.

2692. At the end of the day you would send it to the Treasury?—Yes, or the following day.

2693. The account would be transferred to the Treasury, and they would keep it instead of the Pay-office?—Exactly. The Treasury would be furnished with a return of the Paymaster-general's payments for Navy, Army, and Miscellaneous Services.

2694. But the Treasury must keep account for them all if they order an issue of money for general purposes?—It does so now.

2695. The Treasury must keep some account of how the expenditure of the separate votes is going on?—Yes, and it does so now; it must be kept, but I would relieve the Paymaster-general of that duty, and have it kept and audited at the Treasury.

2696. You would have nobody but the Treasury to keep that account?—The Treasury alone should keep it.

2697. With regard to the issue of money, how would you issue it, and how would you check it?—The Paymaster-general could have a credit given to him at the Bank by the Treasury.

2698. Who is to keep the vote separate?—That would be done at the Treasury; it is done now. I think the Treasury officers would explain the machinery there better than I can.

2699. At the present moment it is the Exchequer that prevents money being issued beyond the vote; where would you place that check?—In the auditors.

2700. You would authorise the auditors to issue money, would you?—No; to check the books of the Treasury.

2701. Two years afterwards?—No, day by day; I would have an officer stationed at the Treasury to see the order, and to see the posting of it in the books, so as to watch the progress of the issues.

2702. According to the present arrangement an officer of the Audit-office has no power whatever to say no; all that he can do is to take a note?—All that he can do is to represent the facts.

2703. If any order was to go from the Treasury, the audit would be no check upon it; all that they would do would be to note anything that was wrong?—I think that that would be a considerable check.

2704. Yes, but that is an after-check; do you contemplate any previous check?—You could have an immediate report to Parliament as to any matter of importance.

2705. If Parliament was sitting; but if Parliament was not sitting, it might go on till Parliament sat again; supposing Parliament were dissolved, the question being whether money was properly, or not, issued, how would that be checked?—It might certainly be difficult to provide for this case.

2706. Mr. Bowyer.] During every six months if Parliament were sitting, where would the check be?—It would still reside in the auditors, as the parties to report the improper order, although they might not be able to bring the case before Parliament until it sat again.

2707. Putting a case, which is not a special case, of a ministry who wanted to dissolve Parliament and get a majority, having no funds at their disposal; you would, as far as I can understand, exercise the check when Parliament meets, they having got their majority and got what they wanted?—This is certainly a case which an after check would not meet; but it is perhaps the only case in which the Exchequer check can be applied in its full force.

2708. The Exchequer is inoperative?—Yes, to a great extent. I think it is generally admitted that, as regards the large services, the Exchequer is inoperative; and that it knows no more than the Paymaster-general does when the grants for a particular year have been expended.

2709. Mr. Williams.] You have expressed your opinion that the Miscellaneous Estimates should be duly audited at the Treasury; do not you think it would be much more satisfactory if the audit were to take place at the Audit-office?—It could not take place at the Audit-office, any more than it can take place at the Audit-office in respect of the Navy, Army, and Ordnance, because the documents showing showing the propriety of any charge being made against any particular grant, are not at the Audit-office, but in the Navy and the Army departments.

E. A. Hoffay, Esq.

2710. Are you aware in what manner the gentlemen belonging to the Audit-office, who audit the accounts in those different departments, make their reports to the Audit-office?—Yes; they bring in writing before the Board of Audit the various observations which they have had occasion to make, and the Board consider them, and if they see that they are based upon sufficient grounds, they call upon the department for explanation.

2711. No further explanation is given at the Audit-office than what is founded upon the report of the person who is at the department?—None other; but every entry in the journal altering an original one is submitted to the Board. Occasionally the officer superintending the appropriation audit will point out objections to entries in the primary books, which, if attended to, are not carried before the Board.

2712. There is no inquiry taking place at the Audit-office as to those accounts?—No; only upon matters brought before the Board by the superintending officer, or arising out of the examination of the journal entries adverted to.

2713. Mr. Bowyer.] Do you think that the audit at the Treasury is as safe as the audit according to the French system, by an independent department?—The audit at the Treasury would be by an independent department. I believe that the Board of Audit have always maintained their independence.

2714. Sir James Graham.] That account to which you have referred, as to the naval and military expenditure, is not one which is presented by Act of Parliament, but it is presented by motion on the part of the Government?—It is an account made out by the departments under a Treasury Minute, and the Treasury lay it before Parliament.

2715. It is not compulsory upon the Treasury to lay that account before Parliament?—No.

2717. You would not leave it optional to the Executive Government to present an account so amended, but by Act of Parliament you would compel them to present it?—Yes, together with the report of the Commissioners of Audit on that account.

2718. If it was thought fit to improve the check, it should not be optional to the Treasury to present such reports from the Board of Audit as they thought fit, but it should be compulsory to present all the reports?—The whole.

2719. And that audit extending to the Miscellaneous Estimates and Civil Contingencies, would in your opinion cover all the field?—It would.

2720. And this in addition to the audit, such as now exists in respect to the Navy, Army, and Ordnance?—Yes.

2721. Upon the whole, do you think that the audit of the Navy, Army, and Ordnance is effectual as a check upon the observance of the appropriation?—It is; from the experience of some years which I have had, I think that it is effective.

2722. You do not think that anything more stringent, consistently with the free working of the service, can be devised?—No.

2723. Chairman.] At the same time, it could be evaded by a department, by the mode of forming contracts, and by the diminution of the stores?—It might.

2724. Sir James Graham.] Have you reason to believe that it ever has been so evaded since the passing of the Act?—I believe that you may live upon your stores, and make a saving on the aggregate grants, and vice versâ, without much difficulty.

2725. What would you suggest to correct that evil, consistently with the absolute necessity of having some discretion vested in the executive department?—I would have, in addition to the general measures which I have sketched out, a somewhat closer scrutiny of the Estimates at the Treasury. The different votes might be inquired into; and returns might be called for if necessary, of the stock, probable consumption, &c.

2726. Are you not aware, that recently an order has been issued to take stock periodically in the naval department at the recurrence of every three years?—I am not.

2727. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Do you see any reason why the same powers which are now vested in the Exchequer, with regard to the issue of public public money, should not be vested in the Audit Board?—None whatever; I think the Audit Board as independent as the Comptroller of the Exchequer; their tenure is the same, I believe. E. A. Hoffay, Esq. 23 June 1856.

2728. Sir James Graham.] If that were done, would not the check, with reference to the appropriations, bearing upon the question of dissolution, be as effectual as it is now in the Exchequer office?—Yes. If the auditors were invested with sufficient powers, there is no question that you would effect by means of an independent audit all that is now effected by the Exchequer, and more.

2729. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Would not that check be more efficient if the charge that you have adverted to in the Treasury as to preliminary investigation were introduced?—Yes, it certainly would.

2730. Chairman.] What power of the Comptroller of the Exchequer would you vest in the Audit Board?—The power of absolutely stopping the issues of money.

2731. Sir James Graham.] Would it not be more safely vested in an independent Board than in an individual who takes part in politics?—His office does not connect him politically.

2732. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] His office does not exclude him from Parliament, does it?—No.

2733. Chairman.] Do you mean to say that the circumstance of a man being in Parliament, and being able to explain his own case, and to state his own views in Parliament, is not a very considerable check upon the Government?—Then the question arises whether the chairman of the Audit Board should be in Parliament. If that should be found necessary for a check, the chairman of the Board might have a seat in Parliament.

THE RIGHT HON. SIR FRANCIS T. BARING, BART., IN THE CHAIR.

The Right Honourable The Lord Monteagle of Brandon; further Examined.

2734. Chairman.] YOU gave some information in your former evidence to the Committee with regard to the amount of the Civil Contingencies in the Exchequer?—Yes. At the end of a very protracted examination, I was asked a question with respect to the expenditure of Civil Contingencies. The Committee will recollect that in the early part of my examination, at Question 751, I stated in reference to the public accounts that I thought it would be more convenient in all instances to give the account itself than to give a verbal explanation of its contents; on that occasion I had not the actual account made up, which I now hold in my hand. In giving that answer, my Right honourable Friend in the Chair, pointed to two columns in one of the printed accounts which lay upon the table, and being asked whether there were any balances left in the Exchequer, I stated that there were none, the fact being that the columns to which my attention was directed were not the columns showing the balances in the Exchequer. So far as the evidence which I gave is erroneous, I respectfully request of the Committee the opportunity to correct it. I communicated it immediately to the Chairman when I found that the mistake had so arisen, but I did not think that I should be right in using the power that is given to a witness to alter anything material without the permission of the Committee. But my mistake was not very material. The fact is, that every year during the period I referred

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon. 26 June 1856.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

26 June 1856.

I referred to, the full amount of the Civil Contingencies was withdrawn from the Exchequer, but there had been a previous balance which continued in the Exchequer of 100,000 l.; that was the sum annually voted, and the same sum was withdrawn from the Exchequer, and there was no saving declared during any portion of that time, therefore I was right except that I had neglected the fact of there being a previous balance which was carried out throughout the whole of the accounts, and remained in the Exchequer. I produce an account which has been made from records in my own department; it is perfectly accurate, and, with the permission of the Committee, I wish to substitute it for those answers in which I was led astray. (The same was delivered in).

Vide Appendix.

2735. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] There are a few points in your evidence upon which I am desirous of putting to you some questions. In the first place, I will take your answer with reference to precedents as to hereditary pensions; in answer to Question 73, I understood you to say that the mode of redeeming an hereditary pension last spring which had been adopted by the Government was not in accordance with the best precedents on the subject, and you particularly referred, as one of the precedents which ought to have guided the practice of the Treasury, to some Acts which were passed in the beginning of the century with respect to the duties of the prisage and butlerage of wines. I find that in 1803 an Act was passed to enable the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury of Great Britain to contract for the purchase of the duties of the prisage and butlerage of wines; that was the 43d of George the 3d, cap. 156, and by that Act the Treasury was empowered to contract with the Duchy of Lancaster for the purchase of the dues of the prisage and butlerage of wines in the port of Liverpool and other ports of Lancashire; they were further empowered to contract with the Duchy of Cornwall for the purchase of the same dues in the ports of Cornwall, and also in the port of Plymouth; they were empowered to contract with the Duke of Bedford for the purchase of the prisage and butlerage dues in Swansea and Chepstow; with the Marquis of Bute in the port of Cardiff, and with the Duke of Grafton in other ports of England. It was directed that they might treat for the redemption of such interests, but that all contracts made under that Act were subject to confirmation by Parliament. There appeared to be some doubt upon your Lordship's mind as to what the nature of those duties was. Let me call your Lordship's attention to the following extract from Blackstone's Commentaries: he says, "There is also another very ancient hereditary duty belonging to the Crown, called the prisage or butlerage of wines, which is taken notice of in the great Roll of the Exchequer, 8th Richard the 1st, still extant. Prisage was a right of taking two tuns of wine from every ship, English or foreign, importing into England 20 tuns or more, one before and one behind the mast, which, by charter of Edward the 1st, was exchanged into a duty of 2 s. for every tun imported by merchant strangers, and called butlerage because paid to the King's butler." From that passage of Blackstone do you entertain any doubt that the duties of prisage and butlerage were in the nature of petty customs duties levied in the ports of England, and also Ireland, upon imported wine?—I should think most probably it was so from the extract in question; but that is a legal matter, and I will take the authority of Blackstone as conclusive upon the question. It does not however affect the opinion I gave.

2736. It appears that subsequently an Act was passed, the 46th of George the 3d, chapter 79, in the year 1806, by which a contract which had been made by the Treasury for an annuity of 6,870 l., payable, out of the Consolidated Fund, to the Duke of Grafton, was confirmed, and at the same time a power was conferred upon the Treasury to fund that annuity; does not it therefore appear that the nature of that transaction was that the Treasury bought up, under the powers of the first Act, certain petty customs dues which the Duke of Grafton had the right of levying in ports of England, and made as a charge upon the Consolidated Fund an annuity to him as compensation for this right of levying dues?—There seems to be no doubt upon the facts stated; but I quoted the case as an instance illustrating the interference of Parliament, and the appeal made to the authority of the Legislature, to justify such a transaction.

2737. By the 5th of George the 4th, chapter 78, passed in 1824, the purchase of the duties of prisage and butlerage of wines from the Duke of Cornwall, that is to say, the Prince of Wales, was also authorised. There appears to have been a former Act passed in consequence of some general powers conferred upon the Treasury?—Very probably.

2738. With regard to similar Acts in Ireland to which you have referred in Answer 81; the 42d of George the 3d, chapter 94, passed in 1806, authorises the Treasury to contract with the Earl of Ormond for the sale of the duties of prisage and butlerage on wines imported into Ireland, subject to confirmation by Parliament, and the agreement of the Commissioners of the Treasury in Ireland with the Earl of Ormond was confirmed by the 50th of George the 3d, chapter 101, passed in 1810, for the gross sum of 216,000 l. This Act recites that "it would be of great public benefit that the prisage and butlerage of wines should be forthwith extinguished within and through every port in Ireland, and within and through every creek, bay, and strand thereof." Does not it appear clear from this Act, that the duties of the prisage and butlerage of wines were, up to that time, levied on behalf of the Duke of Ormond in all ports of Ireland?—I believe so.

2739. Subsequently an Act for abolishing the duties of the prisage and butlerage of wines in Ireland, namely, the 51st of Geo. 3, c. 51, was passed, and it recites the sale by the Earl of Ormond, and that the duties are vested in the Crown, and that it is expedient that they should be abolished; and it repeals all such duties or compositions in respect of such duties in the ports of Ireland within one month from the passing of the Act. Is it not clear from the Act which I have read that the nature of that transaction was, that the Crown having previously granted those rights of the prisage and butlerage of wines in the ports of Ireland to the Earls of Ormond, those rights were subsequently re-purchased by the Crown; that those petty customs duties then became vested in the Crown, and that they were leviable by the Crown, but that by a subsequent Act the duties were repealed, and thenceforth ceased to be levied?—I take it upon that statement. I cannot give a legal opinion upon Acts of Parliament cited to me at such great length. I have perfect confidence in the correctness of the recitals as given me by the Right honourable Gentleman, and I believe that the results are just as he suggests; but this is perfectly consistent with everything I have stated. I have stated that those grants were grants of rights which previously belonged to the Crown. I believe they were bought up by Parliamentary authority, having been vested in an individual by grant from the Crown.

2740. I understood you to bring forward this case as one which you consider to be parallel; does not it appear upon examination that the cases are wholly different; that this is a case of petty customs duties, similar to those that are now levied at Liverpool by the corporation; that they had been parted with by the Crown, and that they were then levied by the Earl of Ormond, and by the Duke of Grafton, and other persons, though there were no means by which they could be extinguished, except by authorising the Crown to buy them up by a charge made under an Act of Parliament?—I am not prepared to admit this, especially with respect to the law and practice of those times. If it be true that the Crown has the full right out of the gross revenue to issue any sum that can be lawfully employed in extinguishing any charge payable by the subject, I am not aware whether, according to such doctrine, this tax might not have been all bought out of the gross revenue; but at the same time there might not have been a necessity for Parliamentary interposition, for the parties selling might not, without the interposition of Parliament, have possessed the power of parting with their property. These matters were the subject of settlement, and were private property to all intents and purposes whatever, and there might have been a necessity for the interposition of Parliament to provide an enabling Act to persons desirous of selling, without which there would not have been a possibility in the Crown of buying up such rights as these out of the gross revenues; I believe such a transaction might be justifiable according to the earlier practice, but not according to the more modern practice, or according to constitutional principle.

2741. Is not there a great difference between an hereditary pension which is charged upon the gross revenue, and petty customs granted to an individual and levied upon the public, and which might continue to be levied, even after they were resumed by the Crown?—No doubt there is a difference; but one which did not weaken my argument; the analogy which I struck was, to prove that in all these instances the interposition of Parliament was invoked; I abstained carefully, as the Committee will remember, from expressing any kind of opinion with respect to the legality of what has been done with the late pensions. My opinion, such as it was, was for the purpose of expressing regret rather than disapproval that that in reference to modern practice, 213,000 l. should have been expended out of gross revenue for the purchase of these pensions, without the approval and authority of Parliament.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

2742. The case of the Duke of Richmond is mentioned under Answer 82; I find that there was an Act, the 39 Geo. 3, c. 84, passed in the year 1799, which is intituled, "An Act to enable the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury to contract with the Most noble Charles, Duke of Richmond, for the absolute purchase of the Property of the said Duke, and all others interested in a certain Duty of 12 d. per Chaldron on Coals shipped in the River Tyne, to be consumed in England, and to grant a Compensation for the same, by way of Annuity, payable out of the Consolidated Fund." This Act enabled the Treasury to treat for the Duke's right for an annuity, to be charged on the Consolidated Fund, and to redeem such annuity. It vests the duties in the Crown; it places them under the Commissioners of Customs, and makes them payable into the Exchequer. A subsequent Act of the 39 and 40 Geo. 3, c. 43, confirms the contract made by the Treasury for an annuity of 19,000 l., payable out of the Consolidated Fund. Does it appear to you that that transaction with the Duke of Richmond bears any close analogy with the mode of redemption of the hereditary pension of the Duke of Grafton?—No; there is a difference between the two cases undoubtedly. My reference to that case was again for the purpose of showing that the interposition of Parliament had been resorted to. I lamented that the same course had not been taken in 1856.

2743. Is not this another case of the purchase of petty customs levied in a particular river for an annuity charged upon the Consolidated Fund, and does not this Act, instead of abolishing those petty customs, as was the case in the Irish Act, maintain them, having vested them in the Crown, and placed them under the management of the Commissioners of Customs, and direct that the duties shall be levied and paid into the Exchequer?—Clearly.

2744. Does not the whole nature of that transaction differ in all its essential points, except that it is the redemption of an annual charge upon the public; does not it there differ from the late redemption of hereditary pensions?—It differs in points respecting which the question is put; it connects itself with the present case, I think, in the point for which alone it was cited, which was showing that it was done with the approval of Parliament, whilst in 1856 no such approval was sought for.

2745. But if the reasons for which it was done with the approval of Parliament differ from the reasons for which this might be done with the approval of Parliament, can it be said that the two cases are parallel?—But in the Acts to which reference has been made it will be found that there were further provisions authorising the redemption of the pensions which were granted as commutations, and that power was granted by Parliament; but again I remind the Committee very respectfully that I never discussed the question of the legality; I did not express any opinion about that; it was the more important question of Parliamentary responsibility which I brought under consideration.

2746. Does it not appear to you that there is an essential difference between all those cases and the redemption of hereditary pensions charged upon the gross revenue; all of which, where redemption has taken place, have been redeemed by the Treasury without an Act of Parliament?—I do not see any great difference between the pensions which the Treasury, by a Bill of the present Session, has applied for full Parliamentary authority to redeem, and the pensions which during the last Session were redeemed out of the gross revenue without the knowledge of Parliament. I think the present principle is the right one, and I think it was highly creditable to the Government to have adopted it. The Bill now passing conclusively confirms my argument, for I only contended in the evidence which I gave that the constitutional principle required a Parliamentary authorisation of the contract. I did not suggest that the Government, in making the purchase out of the gross revenue, had violated any law.

2747. Was your meaning more than this: that as a matter of prudence and propriety you preferred that Parliament should have sanctioned the redemption beforehand, rather than that it should have been done without. You approve of the course which is taken by the Bill now before Parliament rather than the course which has been hitherto acted upon?—Not merely as a matter of "prudence," but as a constitutional recognition of the principles upon which public public money ought to be expended. With respect to "propriety," that is a large word. I think it no less clear on the ground of propriety, than on the ground of prudence, and I say this the more confidently, because such was the course which I myself took when I was connected with the Treasury. I declined to redeem pensions which I might have redeemed, on the recommendation of two Committees. I preferred taking a vote upon the subject and making it part of the Appropriation Act, and thus obtaining a distinct Parliamentary authority. Therefore I think it more constitutional. I am far from taking upon myself to state that the other course is illegal. I cannot do that, though I cannot approve what has been done.

2748. Mr. Williams.] Are the Committee to understand your Lordship to disapprove the course pursued by the Treasury in the redemption of those pensions by a mere Minute of the Treasury?—I have taken an opposite course myself, which is the best proof that I can give of my considering it a more constitutional and preferable mode in all similar cases to obtain a previous sanction of Parliament.

2749. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Was not that the course that was taken in respect to the Civil List pensions, or was the course that you refer to taken as to the hereditary pensions which were charged upon the gross revenue of the Crown?—They were not Civil List pensions in the proper sense of the word; they were not Civil List pensions on the Civil List of the Crown but charges upon the hereditary revenue.

2750. When you speak of constitutional practice, is there any better guide to constitutional practice than that which has been the constant practice in parallel cases up to the present time?—I am not prepared to affirm that it has been the constant practice up to the present time; my own instance is one to the contrary.

2751. Is it not the fact, that in all the cases of hereditary pensions charged upon the gross revenue which have been redeemed up to last March, the only cases of redemption which have occurred have taken place from the gross revenue without an Act of Parliament?—I took the liberty of showing the Committee that an Act of Parliament had been passed to enable the Commissioners of the Woods, I think, to purchase even small pensions that did not exceed 10*l*. a year, I think it was; and I think that Act was wisely and properly passed. My argument, such as it was, although it was rather a reply to questions drawing out my opinion in reference to the construction of the law, and the construction of the constitution, did not depend upon denying the possibility of the prerogative power of spending 213,000*l*. out of the gross revenue; but I stated that it was a preferable system, in obedience to the constitution of this country, that the transaction should be brought under the attention of Parliament before a sum of 213,000*l*. was so expended. From this opinion I see no reason to depart.

2752. Mr. Williams.] In the case of the redemption of the pension of the Duke of Richmond, that was done by Act of Parliament?—All those were done by Act of Parliament; but, however the Right honourable Gentleman may show that the cases are distinguishable in other respects, the principle of Parliamentary responsibility seems to me to apply to them all.

2753. Mr. Wilson.] There is no question that the cases, that in 1826, and those in 1853, which were distinctly parallel, were purchased without an Act of Parliament, and upon the authority of the prerogative alone; that those transactions had been laid before Parliament, and that no objection had been taken to them in either case?—The one was Lord Melbourne's pension, in 1825, not a period of good precedents; the purchase from Earl Cowper in 1853 was not of gross revenue, but of the capital fund of the Land Revenue, and is therefore no precedent at all.

2754. And the two pensions in 1853?—No doubt; there were two cases which, subject to the observations I have made, afford some precedent for the course taken in the present instance, and so far as that precedent goes, that precedent justifies the course taken, but that does not, in my judgment, make it an eligible course, nor do I presume that that is the judgment of the Government, seeing that they have, in respect to the measure now before Parliament, adopted another and a better principle.

2755. There is no doubt at all that Parliament had in 1854 distinct information from the Chancellor of the Exchequer at that time of the transactions that had taken place in 1853, and of the contemplated bargain which been concluded cluded in those years?—To this I do not agree. So far as I can judge, Parliament on that occasion had a perfect notice given to them that it was intended that those pensions should be bought up and extinguished, but they had no notice whatever of any sort or kind that those pensions were to be paid for out of the gross revenue without direct Parliamentary authority; the whole policy of that day was adverse to such a supposition.

2756. Can it be said to have been contrary to the practice of 1854, when that statement was made, when, in the preceding year, at the commencement of those contemplated transactions, two large pensions had been purchased on that same principle, and information was given of it to Parliament?—The Honourable Gentleman is better qualified than I am to know whether, at that time, and since the declared policy of Government, by which you could judge of their future intentions, was not to endeavour to bring in the whole of the gross revenue into the Exchequer, and to pay out nothing except under Parliamentary authority.

2757. Is your Lordship not aware that in the introduction of that Bill there was a special notice given to Parliament that this would be made an exception, on the ground that arrangements were in progress for the purchase of those pensions?—Not the slightest information was given at that time that it was intended or meditated that this should be paid out of the gross revenue. Information was given of a very wise intention, which I quite approve of, of purchasing up those pensions, but whether they were to be purchased in the one way or the other is not stated or even inferred.

2758. Had not a part of those pensions already been purchased within the preceding few months upon that principle?—I forget the distance of time, but unquestionably those who prepared this matter must have been better judges of their own intentions. All I state is, so far as one can judge by the mode of learning Parliamentary intentions through the reported debates, there is no such suggestion of the intention of buying those by the mere authority of the Treasury, and paying for them out of the gross revenue.

2759. Mr. Gladstone's speech was made in May 1854, and the finance accounts of the preceding year, to January, had been just laid upon the table of the House of Commons. Those finance accounts contained the particulars of the transactions in 1853, and showed those two purchases from the gross revenue upon that principle; was not that the regular mode of intimating to Parliament the views which Government took of the mode in which those pensions should have been purchased?—I think not, particularly in relation to the affairs of those years. Besides which, as I have stated, the purchases of 1853 were not out of gross revenue, but out of capital, in which Parliament was no wise interested. The Honourable Member knows well that the mode of charging the public service, in one year, does not in the slightest degree bind the Treasury to follow the same mode of charging a particular service in another. In this year there were great departures from the better mode, and to the purchase in 1853 my objection in no way applies.

2760. Was any information given of varying the mode by which those pensions should be purchased in 1854, as compared with those which had been purchased in 1853?—Certainly not; my statement in evidence is, that no information was given of the mode which might be resorted to.

2761. There was no intention expressed of varying the mode which had been pursued in 1853?—Nothing can be clearer than my evidence upon that point; there was no notice of varying or adopting it.

2762. Mr. Williams.] Your Lordship is not aware in what form the redemption of those pensions was communicated to Parliament?—The previous redemption, I believe, was communicated solely in the finance accounts on the Land Revenue Reports.

2763. In no other form?—No; no vote was taken.

2764. How soon were those finance accounts laid before Parliament after the transaction had taken place?—That I cannot tell; but the officer of the Votes of the House of Commons would be able to inform the Committee.

2765. Are you aware whether any communication was made to Parliament, and if so, in what form, of the redemption of the pensions of Lord Melbourne, and one or two others, which took place at a distant period, about the year 1825?—I believe the memorandum appears in my former evidence. The case of 1825 was communicated, so far as I recollect, merely upon the finance accounts. That of 1853 was made known by a communication in a Report of the Woods and Forests;

Forests; but both were brought under the knowledge of Parliament after the transaction had taken place.

2766. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Will you refer to Questions 861, 862, and subsequent questions; you referred, in the answers to those questions, to a case which occurred in 1841, which you mentioned to the Committee as one of the most prominent examples of the advantages of Exchequer control, and you expressed an opinion that, by your interference, you had been able to make a correction, not of a technical but of a substantial error, which had been committed by the Treasury. Since your evidence was given, a correspondence on the subject has been laid before the Committee, and I wish to call your Lordships' attention to the opinion of the law officers which was taken in consequence of your representation by the Treasury, and which is given in the papers. The opinion is dated the 15th of November 1841, and signed by Sir Frederick Pollock and Sir William Follett: "It appears to us that the general scope and intention of the Acts of the first Session and second Session of this year (1841) was to provide for the service of the year, and that the Legislature could not have intended the distinction and separation (as insisted upon by the Comptroller) of the supplies of the two Sessions accidentally occurring in the same year. The word 'Session' has been used as importing 'the Parliamentary year' (with which in general it is practically synonymous); and we entertain no doubt, referring to these and other Acts, that the intention and meaning of the Legislature, in consequence of this mistake, has not been conveyed by the language used. But we think, as a question of law, that this mistake, however obvious, cannot be corrected, except by Parliament, and that the word 'Session' must receive its true legal construction, viz., a particular sitting of Parliament from its commencement to its close, and cannot be read as 'year.'" Does not it appear from that opinion that the law officers referred to the regulation in question as having been founded upon a mistake, and that the intention of the Legislature was different, but that they used inadvertently the word "Session," instead of the word "year"?—You have read that opinion correctly, but in speaking of my argument in applying these cases, I must first respectfully differ from you as to the way in which you have put it. You say that I put it forward as one of the most prominent cases; without undervaluing its importance, I declined to do so; I was asked to bring forward a prominent case after I had read that opinion, and I was far from stating it to be the most prominent case. But the Committee will let me say in reply to the question that the matter of law is a matter which was given to me to administer; and to appeal from the strict legal interpretation of the law to discover what might be the intentions of Parliament, would be placing in my hands the most dangerous of all instruments, and placing within the hands of the Government the power of appealing to astute and indefensible construction, rather than to the plain meaning of the law. I stated, and I repeat, that the question of time at which any issue may be directed, however unimportant it may appear, is frequently, and must sometimes be the very essence of the issue to be resolved, namely, the legality of the act. There is a case now before the Committee in which I was asked to make an issue by an instrument dated before the Act of Parliament was passed, authorising the issue; there the time was the essence of the matter; and the Treasury admitted that; and the Treasury in admitting that fact, acquiesced in my objection, withdrew the illegal warrant; and sent me back corrected the instrument to which I had objected; this instrument was a Royal warrant under the Queen's Sign Manual, and countersigned by the Lords of the Treasury, the date had been erased with a knife, and the corrected date, which made it a genuine instrument, inserted with a pen and ink. There the time was thus admitted to be the essence of the whole matter, and in these other questions the time is of the essence of the legality; in the opinion which the law officers gave, and which has just been quoted, their attention was not directed to that which appears in the subsequent correspondence; if I had adopted that construction, I should have been issuing public money in a case where no ways and means had been provided; that establishes the illegality beyond all question. This appears in my letter of 22d November 1841, now before the Committee, and in the Treasury warrant issued consequently on the 27th December.

2767. I will call your Lordship's attention to the words of your own letter, dated the 17th of November 1841. You there state, "The Crown lawyers consider that an obvious mistake has been made in the wording of the Statutes, but that it is one which cannot be corrected except by Act of Parliament, and that the word 'Session,' must receive its true legal construction, namely, a 'particular sitting of Parliament from its commencement to its close,' and cannot be read 'year.' Under this opinion I feel myself restrained from issuing the credit required by your Lordship's letter of the 15th October." In that letter, do you not treat the matter as one of mistake, and not of substance, and would not anybody, from your evidence, as given the other day, have inferred that there had been no mistake in the matter, but that it was the correction of a substantial error which was due to your interference?—I think that the Committee when they read over this letter will see that I merely recite what the opinion of the law officers was, by no means adopting it as my own opinion; but I recite it because it laid the foundation of the principle upon which I was acting, namely, adhering strictly to what was reported by the law officers to be the law of the land.*

2768. Lord Stanley.] You took the opinion of the law officers as conclusive, not expressing any opinion of your own?—Precisely; I recited that the law officers "consider that an obvious mistake has been made in the wording of the Statutes, but that it is one which cannot be corrected, except by Act of Parliament." I did not state my own opinion; I adopted theirs.

2769. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] It appears that at the beginning of the following Session, Mr. Goulburn, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, brought in a Bill to rectify the mistake which was pointed out by the Crown Lawyers, and he made these remarks in introducing this Bill on the 4th of February 1842: "There having been two Sessions of Parliament in the course of the year 1841, the ways and means for that year were voted by two separate Acts. In the titles of those Acts the sums were stated to be voted for the service of the year 1841, but in the bodies of the Acts the ways and means were applied to the public service during the particular Session in which each respective Bill was passed. There was a surplus of the vote in the first Session; but in consequence of the circumstance to which he had referred, that surplus could not be devoted to the services of the second Session. The consequence was that it became necessary to apply different sums to different parts of the same services, and this gave rise not only to great inconvenience in the public department, but some loss to the public revenue; for as those votes that were agreed to in the first Session could not be made applicable to the second Session, it was impossible that the Exchequer bills reserved for those services could be paid off with the rapidity that was desirable. With regard to the Bill which he now asked leave to introduce, he was only following the precedent which had been set in the year 1831. He therefore moved for leave to introduce a Bill for the application to the service of the year 1841, of the sums granted in either of the two last Sessions of Parliament." Mr. F. T. Baring said, "That as he understood the Right honourable Gentleman, he only intended to do now what, if it had been proposed in the last Session of Parliament, would not have given rise to the least objection; but perhaps the Right honourable Gentleman would permit him to ask a question with regard to the financial proposal of the last Session, whether, consistently with the interest of the public service, he would be able shortly to lay upon the table of the House a Return showing how that financial measure had terminated? He would not ask for the information if it would cause any difficulty to the public service." "The Chancellor of the Exchequer would take an early opportunity of giving the information required, and at any rate, would promise to produce it before he attempted to propose any new measure;" and leave was given to bring in a Bill, and no opposition was made to it. Does not it appear to you, from what has just been read, that it was in fact a mistake of the Legislature, and that as soon as it was pointed out it was corrected, and without any objection?—There can be no doubt that Mr. Goulburn's Act, which I had the honour to support in the other House of Parliament, was a very proper and just Act; but what I had to consider was, what the state of the law was before that correction; and the appeal to the interposition of Parliament to correct the previous Act shows distinctly, not upon the authority of the Crown lawyers, but upon the authority of the Legislature itself, that I should have been culpable and

* I beg, however, to refer to other passages in the letter quoted, as expressing my deliberate judgment. I add, "The opinion given is conclusive in respect to the illegality of issuing any ways and means provided under the 5 Vict. c. 8, and 5 Vict. c. 11, for services voted in the preceding Parliament, unless subject to the consent and sanction of Parliament. I cannot but hold myself bound to govern my conduct by the legal interpretation given to these statutes."

and remiss, had I of my own authority corrected the Act of Parliament, and administered it as if it had been corrected, in place of waiting until the correction was given by the Legislature itself. Mr. Goulburn, with the friendly confidence which subsisted between us, sent me the draft of his intended Bill for my consideration. I suggested several amendments, which he at once adopted. (See letters, 26 January and 6 February 1842; Appx.)

2770. There is no doubt that you were technically correct; but does it appear to you that this case can be cited with justice as an example of the substantial protection which was afforded to the public interests by the interposition of the Exchequer control?—I think it was substantially for the public interests by establishing this great principle, that no individual filling my office, and subject to its responsibility, would be justified in seeking the interpretation of a statute by the supposed or suggested meaning of Parliament and intention of Parliament, in place of looking to the legal import of the law; and further, if it had been once granted as a principle or as a precedent, that I was at liberty to apply Ways and Means voted and provided for by statute for one class of services to another, and this contrary to the words of the Act, it would have been a precedent wholly inconsistent with my duty. By avoiding that precedent, I gave to the public a protection which enabled me, when a similar case occurred under a subsequent administration, to enforce the same principle and to act upon the same ground, which was admitted at once by the succeeding Government. I therefore answer the question with confidence. A substantial protection was thus afforded to the public interests by the interposition of the Exchequer control.

2771. In answer to Questions 847 and 848, you refer to a memorandum upon the subject of the Exchequer, which was given to Mr. Gladstone some time in the course of the year 1854, which is printed in these papers; at Question 848 you were asked, "It states fully your Lordship's views, and the objection that you have to the course which you supposed to be carried on at the Pay-office?" and your answer is, "I think it states them with as much clearness as I am able to bring to the subject, and having read the papers in reply upon that subject, ably written by men of eminence in their respective positions, I see no sufficient reason to vary the judgment which I pronounced, as being a judgment which to me appears necessary to be adhered to if you wish to maintain the principle of Parliamentary appropriation. If that principle is to be abandoned, this Exchequer memorandum is absolutely good for nothing." Am I right in supposing that your Lordship adheres now to or takes in substance the same view which you took in 1853, and which you expressed in that memorandum?—I do. I do not mean that there may not be possibly words or expressions which might not be better chosen, but as to the essential principles of that memorandum, to their fullest extent, enforcing throughout the doctrine of the appropriation as obligatory upon all parties concerned with public money, I adhere.

2772. Let me call your Lordship's attention to some of the passages in this memorandum. In page 90 of my copy, in the second paragraph, you say, "It is the system itself, rather than its administration, which I consider to be dangerous and indefensible; tending to supersede the stringent provisions of the Statute Law; to defeat all Parliamentary responsibility; to strike at the integrity of the accounts rendered to both Houses and to the Auditors; and to permit application of the public revenue without due authority; and possibly to purposes wholly unsanctioned by law." Do you still adhere to that view of the present system in respect to the payment of the public monies?—I adhere to that, considering that system to be what I have described, and what I believe it to be, the exercise of a power of appropriating and issuing money for a shorter or a longer period of time at the discretion of officers holding their position at the pleasure of the Crown, and of diverting that public money from the purposes to which it was appropriated by Parliament, and employing it for other uses. I consider this contrary to law, and a violation of the constitution of England.

2773. In a subsequent paragraph you say, "These motives press on me more strongly at the present moment, when it appears by the proceedings in the House of Commons, that the functions of the Exchequer are proposed to be augmented." Do you refer there to the Act of 1854, by which certain charges were transferred from the Consolidated Fund and the gross revenue to annual votes?—I specially referred there to the proposed transfer of something like 4,000,000 l. for the collection of the revenue, by an Act not then introduced, and I thought if 4,000,000 l. were brought under the control of the Exchequer at a time when the the control of the Exchequer was day by day endeavoured to be diminished by the practical proceedings of officers of the Government, it was an absurdity to enact that it should be so paid in. I had not the slightest suspicion that the strange system for defraying the charge of collecting the revenue described in my former evidence would be resorted to, which, in point of fact, has made the payment of the revenue through the Exchequer a perfect farce and a nullity. I have shown that these issues take place after the payments have been already made, and after being issued for payments already made they are returned as revenue payments to the Exchequer.

2774. Lower down in the same paragraph you say, "The difficulties of administering the expenditure during an European war will have to be encountered, for the first time in our modern history, through the instrumentality of one single pay department in place of five. In the late war there were separate offices for paying the army, the navy, army ordnance, Chelsea, and the civil service, besides votes placed in the hands of the Treasury for army extraordinaries and civil contingencies. At present all is carried on at one single pay-office, and unless the issues for each department are accurately made and kept distinct from each other, as required by law; unless care be taken to prevent any possible misappropriation of the funds provided by Parliament from the special services for which they were granted; and unless the public accounts of the Treasury, the Pay-office, and the Bank of England are so kept as to check each other, and correspond with the legal authorities given, and with the Exchequer records, I anticipate, with indescribable alarm, the consequences to the public service which must ensue." Do you believe, from your experience of the war which has now terminated since those remarks were written, that the consequences which you anticipated have occurred?—I stated the peculiarities as in total opposition between the law and the practice, which rendered the approach of a war expenditure a very great difficulty and danger; but I stated, among other things, as a mode of escaping or at least diminishing that difficulty, that there should be a very large vote of unappropriated or extraordinary money taken. I communicated this, in writing, to the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, as the only mode by which he could at once realise the convenience of the public service, and the preservation of the principle of appropriation. I am far from claiming any merit in making that suggestion, or presumptuously suggesting that it was my recommendation that led to its adoption; but the Committee are aware that, most wisely and judiciously, Mr. Gladstone took two large unappropriated sums of 3,000,000 l., I think, in each year, to meet that contingency, and that, which was resorting, in point of fact, to the old principle of the army extraordinary vote, I think, has contributed to carry us, without difficulty, through the late war; but when I see, upon the evidence that I had the honour of giving to the Committee, that even with that sum of unappropriated money, it became necessary to transfer 1,400,000 l., at the commencement of the quarter, into the hands of the Paymaster-general, I think that the Committee will see that there was very great difficulty to be encountered. They have further, in evidence, upon the authority of Sir Charles Trevelyan himself, that the Paymaster-general and the Paymaster of Civil Services "habitually use money belonging to one head of service, in "making advances for other services, in the ordinary transactions of the daily "business of their departments." That is the danger, and that danger, I am perfectly satisfied, has not been escaped, if the Committee investigate closely into the Pay-office accounts, more especially at the close and the commencement of the quarters and the months.

2775. On the whole, do you think that the alarming consequences which you anticipated in the year 1854 have been realised by events during the late war?—I believe that the financial administration in the late war, with a view to its efficiency, deserves the highest commendation; but with respect to the strict legal application of the public money under the Appropriation Act, that is a matter which I cannot take upon myself to pass the same judgment. I have in my memorandum described specifically certain heads of account which it is open for the Committee to investigate themselves, or to call for in Parliament, and those heads of account will, if correctly given, show whether the Appropriation Act has been adhered to or departed from.

2776. Do you think that the financial administration during the late war, and the practice with respect to the issues of public money, would have been better if there had been five pay-offices instead of one?—I should be strangely inconsistent were I to condemn the principle of their consolidation if carefully administered, though I see, with some surprise, that the consolidation, of those offices has been attributed exclusively to particular parties with whom the responsibility did not rest. My Right honourable Friend in the Chair and myself were the persons who carried the consolidation of the great pay-offices into effect. I think, under a precautionary system, it might have been adhered to, though not perhaps without a large vote, like that of 6,000,000 l., wholly unappropriated, placed by the generous confidence of Parliament in the hands of the Government; the whole expenditure might have been carried on, and yet the principle of appropriation adhered to. The Committee will observe, as I find in some of the evidence most truly stated, that as to the internal management of the Pay-office, that I only inferred certain stated results from facts that came to my own knowledge. I see that it is suggested that I ought to have gone to the Pay-office to study their system; if I had done so, and if I had superintended their operations, I have no kind of doubt that I should have got the intimation very properly given by the Government that this was no business of mine; and yet I am told, as a reproach, that I have stated all these things without having gone myself to investigate the matter at the Pay-office!

2777. Do you think that the practice would have been better and more regular during the late war if the number of pay-offices had been greater than it was?—If I am asked to compare the old system with the new, when you had a Paymaster for the Army Services, when you had a Treasurer of the Navy, and a Treasurer of Ordnance, I should say that you then had, in my judgment, a complicated and objectionable system. It was on that ground I recommended Parliament to consolidate those offices; but as a protection against what I considered to be an unconstitutional and illegitimate application of the votes of those three departments, that system was perfect, because when there were three separate offices there could be no transfer between them from the Army to the Navy, or from the Navy to the Ordnance, and though you obtained a great good by the effectual application of the principle of consolidation, you have obtained that good under the system of administration which has been permitted to grow up, at the hazard, and, I fear, at the sacrifice of the principle upon which the rights of the House of Commons and the Constitution of England depend—the principle of appropriation, established at the Revolution by Lord Somers, without which the power of The House would become a delusion.

2778. Lower down you say, "The responsibility and danger to which I allude appear to me to arise from the present mode of issuing and applying the public money, which I consider to be not only a violation of the general principles of the Constitution, but contrary to express law, repugnant to the intentions of Parliament, superseding the restraints of the Appropriation Act, making the public accounts illusory and contradictory, and, as far as I can judge, throwing corresponding difficulties in the way of the final proceedings of the Auditors;" that sentence may be considered, I presume, as embodying the results of your memorandum, and I presume that that is the view which you take of the working of the present system down to the present day; is that so?—If the present practice is the practice described by Sir Charles Trevelyan in the official document prepared for the Committee on Miscellaneous Services, to which, however, it never was submitted, as well as in admissions made before this Committee, and that the Paymaster uses money belonging to one head of service in making advances for others in the ordinary transactions of the daily business of his department, I say that I will show the Committee, by a reference to the authorities which are before me, that this is in violation of the law; I presume, if I was deceived in making so bold an assertion, Her Majesty's Government would have had the goodness to have adopted my suggestion, to take the opinion of the Crown lawyers, and if such opinion justified the practice, they could not too soon have relieved a public servant like me from the painful position in which he was placed, country, in attributing an illegal practice to the finance administration of this with which he has been for so many years, and still continues to be, connected.

2779. In page 93, in illustrating the present state of the Exchequer, you quote the evidence of Mr. Ellis, which you say is quoted and adopted by the Commissioners on the Exchequer to this effect: "The Exchequer is at least coeval with the Norman Conquest, and from its earliest institution has been looked upon as a check on the Lord High Treasurer, and a protection for the King

King as well as the subject in the custody, payment, and issue of the public money." Are you not aware that in the time of Charles the Second the Lord High Treasurer, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and also an officer who was then a distinct officer, the Under Treasurer of the Exchequer, used to sit and transact their business in the office of the Exchequer?—I should rather regret to be called upon to give opinions upon the antiquarian part of the subject. I should humbly and respectfully submit that the best authorities for that are Sir Francis Palgrave and Mr. Black, above all, who is conversant with this matter, and to Mr. Hallam, the first, because the most trustworthy, of our modern historians. I give you this with the authority attached to it, and if you ask me for further authorities, I am quite ready to give them. Likewise I give you, for instance, the authority of Mr. Bedford, in 1795, the friend and the confidential deputy, and the representative of Lord Grenville, and not likely to be led astray in a matter of this description. In 1795 he states the power, the control, and the responsibility of the Government to the Exchequer in the strongest possible light. I have memorandums from a very highly historical authority which, if the Committee wish, I can lay before them on this subject; but where the Exchequer sat at that particular time, and whether it sat under the same roof with the Treasury or in a different place, I cannot say. I believe the evidence the Committee have before them is inaccurate, if the report which I have in my hand is correct; but it would be pedantry on my part, and I should shrink from giving my own opinions about the antiquity of this matter; I give the Committee Mr. Ellis's authority, and I give his opinion. I can also refer to the authority of the Commissioners on the public accounts and finances in 1782 on the same subject.

2780. Have you not quoted evidence in your memorandum bearing upon the antiquarian part of the subject, and leading to the inference that the office of Lord High Treasurer, the Chancellor, and the Under Treasurer of the Exchequer was distinct from the office of the Exchequer from an early date?—No doubt it was from an early date; but the stages, the precise times, are matters which I have not given any evidence upon.

2781. Have you ever referred to a compilation which is very accessible to a person holding a public office, called, "Notes of materials for the History of Public Departments, compiled by Mr. Thomas of the Record Office, printed in the year 1846," and have you found in the first pages of that compilation a very clear statement of the origin of the Treasury, and the ancient form of the Exchequer?—I read it some years ago; it was sent to me at the time of its being compiled, but I have had no opportunity of verifying the facts; but seeing the evidence given before this Committee, going into high antiquity, great law and historical research, by Mr. Anderson, who, with all his acquirements, was not exactly the authority that I should have sought for upon such a matter, I am not encouraged to venture beyond my depth. But only yesterday I happened accidentally to communicate with a person who I believe is the highest authority in England upon the subject; that is, Mr. Black, who was employed in the examination and superintendence of the Exchequer records under my late Noble friend, Lord Langdale, years ago, and who knows more about the matter, I believe, than any one now living. I asked him to give me from his knowledge his best view of the case. I have not yet obtained it from him, but it is from a man of that knowledge and capacity that you will get an answer, rather than from me. I can answer, I hope, clearly as to the law and practice of my own office; but with respect to the conduct of matters centuries ago, that is really a matter to which I should not wish to speak.

2782. In a later part of your memorandum you refer to the Treasury Minute of the year 1848; that Minute underwent certain amendments; and you say, "The amended Minute carefully recites and maintains the principles of Parliamentary appropriation, enforced by Exchequer control; the present system subverts both." You proceed to quote a passage from that Treasury Minute, and then you make these remarks: "Here is a most authoritative declaration and recognition of the principle of specific appropriation; my statement now is, that this principle is habitually and systematically endangered, or actually set aside." That view, I take for granted, is the view which your Lordship now entertains?—That is a wide question to put to so long a matter. What has been read to me comprehends several distinct propositions, to each of which I shall readily, in a distinct shape, give my opinion. First, as to the Minute itself: that Minute and its modification is the most important instance, I think, of the control of the Exchequer; it is also a conclusive admission on the part of the Treasury, distinctly made and communicated to Parliament, of the principle of appropriation in the public revenue. The original Minute, bearing date 22d December 1848, was drawn up, and communicated to me in a printed shape for the government of my department. It purported to have been contemporaneously communicated to the Auditors, the Admiralty, the Secretary at War, the Ordnance Office, and the Commissioners of Chelsea. No more authoritative document could appear to have been issued. I objected to it instantly, on the ground that such a Minute, as drawn, violated the principle of appropriation, and was one against which I must entirely protest; and in consequence that draft letter of mine, dated 16th January 1849, and laid before this Committee by the Government, is before the Committee, stating those facts; they have also a paper showing the alterations made in that Minute at my suggestion. To those alterations I must take the liberty of calling the attention of the Committee. The first portion is this: I put in here the original Minute, or rather extracts from it, and the amendments which at my suggestion were inserted for the purpose of preserving the principle of appropriation. In the early part of it as amended, it recites that the Exchequer Act is preserved and continued, no such recital having been contained in the original Minute; but what is most material is, that at my suggestion the following words were inserted: "While by this new arrangement the constitutional check exercised by the Comptroller-general of the Exchequer upon the issue of the public money, under the provisions of the Act 4 William 4th, chapter 15, will in all respects be maintained, the regulations which their Lordships prescribe for the government of the Paymaster-general's office will afford to this Board a further control and check over the expenditure in detail, which will enable their Lordships to insure that no payment is made upon the order of any department, under any head of service, beyond the amount of the specific grant of Parliament legally applicable thereto." This declaration was made in the year 1849, and laid before both Houses of Parliament in 1849, being dated in December 1848, yet I find in the Minute of Sir Charles Trevelyan, prepared in the year 1848, a declaration that the Paymaster habitually uses money belonging to one head of service, in the ordinary transactions of the daily business of his office. That memorandum was not submitted to the Select Committee for whose use it was intended, and was not communicated to Parliament; but the amended Minute, which affirmed the principle of appropriation in language as strong as the Appropriation Act itself, was communicated to Parliament; upon that point I quite adopt the views of that Minute, but I say that the practice is not reconcilable with that amended minute, but is more truly described in the frank avowal of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

2783. You go on to state, "The principle which from the proceedings of the Pay-office appears to me to prevail, but of which of course I cannot be quite accurately informed, is as follows." Then you make remarks which are divided under seven heads; the first paragraph is, "That the funds in the Paymaster's hands are dealt with as a consolidated balance, from which all services directed by the Treasury to be provided for, may be made good with or without the requisite legal authority." What is the course which you would recommend to be adopted in the Paymaster's office, with respect to the matter that is dealt with in that first paragraph?—My answer is simply, I propose that the law shall be obeyed, and that neither by the Paymaster nor by the Treasury itself there should be sanctioned any abandonment of the law, still less an open violation of its main principles.

2784. How do you consider that the law is at present abandoned?—I consider that the law is abandoned when monies issued from the Exchequer, and which the Paymaster is by law bound to apply to a specific purpose, are passed into his drawing account, and there applied for any services which arise. When I say that he is bound by the Exchequer Act, the Committee will allow me to refer to a passage in that Act, which is not obligatory upon myself only, but which is obligatory upon the Paymaster-general and the Treasury. It is the 4 Will. 4, and the clauses in question, which determine the appropriation, are the 10th, 11th, and 12th; and then the subsequent corresponding clauses as to the issues from the Consolidated Fund. I am precluded under these clauses from issuing any any money whatever, except for a specified head of service. But then follow the obligations imposed on the Treasury and the Paymaster in the 11th clause; when I have acted upon the Royal warrant, authorising and requiring the Comptroller "to place at the Bank of England, to the credit of the public accountant to the Crown, in the respective branch of service, the amount of the sum so granted or voted, at such times and in such proportions as the said Commissioners shall from time to time direct to be applied by such officer to such service." Such is the Legislative direction that the money so passing from me for a particular service, to the Paymaster-general, shall be applied by that officer to that service. The Appropriation Acts are equally clear; they enact annually that the aids and supplies provided shall not be issued or applied to any use, intent, or purpose other than the uses, intents, and purposes before-mentioned, or for the other payments directed to be satisfied thereout by any Act, or any clause of any Act for that purpose contained in any Act of this Session. Yet notwithstanding these stringent words, you have it in the admission of Mr. Anderson, and it is as strongly stated by Sir Charles Trevelyan as it can be, that the daily habitual practice of the Paymaster is to apply that money to the current services without reference to authority. I say that there the law is violated; the law may be wrong, and the practice may be right, but the two are irreconcilable and incompatible, and you have a system going on now which shows that by the whole of the parties concerned the law is set aside and dispensed with.

2785. What is your opinion as to the strict effect of this clause of the Exchequer Act; do you think that it is the duty of the Paymaster to keep a separate balance for each vote at the Bank, and to draw upon that separate account for that vote?—I consider that the Paymaster has one common function of dealing with the three departments; he is equally bound as the three separate Paymasters were, to apply the Army vote for Army purposes, the Navy vote for Navy purposes, and the Ordnance vote for Ordnance purposes, and, subject to the peculiar limitation that I have afterwards to mention, to apply the credits issued for the votes of Parliament to the purposes for which they were issued, and to none other.

2786. Would you have him keep a separate balance for each vote of the Miscellaneous Services?—I would have him keep a separate entry of the balance for those votes in his accounts. He need not necessarily have a separate balance as to the money which is placed at his disposal. He may have a common balance if he likes it, provided that the sums drawn from that balance are appropriated rightly. It is the misappropriation that I complain of, not the common balance. Now, I have in my hand an account I should be glad to lay before the Committee upon this subject. I stated in a former part of my evidence, that even if there was a little money lost in deficiency bills by reason of having a greater number of balances, if that be the only mode of preserving appropriation, I think that Parliament is bound to preserve the appropriation though it cost a little more money. But I hold in my hand the means of comparing the former balances with the existing balances, and I am enabled to show the Committee, that it is a delusion to imagine that you would have necessarily to incur this excess. I have here now an account of the balances kept under the system of four Paymasters, including Mr. Sargent, and I find that before the consolidation on the 4th of July 1835 and the 5th of April 1836, the balances at that time were only 533,000 l. upon the whole of those services, and in the year 1836, they were only 412,000 l. There they are. The Paymaster of Civil Services had 41 accounts in one instance, and 33 accounts in another. He had only 104,000 l. and 117,000 l. balances.

2787. Although the Paymaster keeps only one balance upon his drawing account, is it your statement that he ever misappropriates money; that he ever pays money to any vote in excess of that vote?—No, I have not the means of judging personally, not seeing his accounts, but it is admitted by Mr. Anderson (1074, 1077, 1078, 1079, 1081, 1082, 1049, 1069), and I know that he pays money without legal authority to pay it, and applies it to purposes foreign to that for which it is appropriated. Call for a return of the Paymaster's accounts for the first fortnight after every quarter day, a return that could be provided for you against your next meeting, and then investigate whether all those payments are justifiable by law; I mean the original payments, not the subsequent rectification on account.

2788. You say that you would not object to his having one balance on his drawing account?—I see no objection to his keeping it in one account, provided nothing is drawn out, except under strict responsibility, and applied exclusively to its appropriation.

2789. Is it your statement that now, under the existing system, any payment is ever made by the Paymaster-general for an illegal purpose; that he ever misappropriates money in excess of any vote given by Parliament?—"Misappropriation" requires a definition; if any Member of this Committee infers from what I have written or stated that I attribute, or have ever attributed, to any one person pecuniary corruption or misappropriation of public money for private purposes, I cannot too strongly protest against such a supposition, as contrary to my meaning; but if you ask me whether the Paymaster applies money for purposes unauthorised by law, diverting that money from the legal purposes for which it was issued, and to which he was bound by the Exchequer and the Appropriation Acts to limit the expenditure, that I say takes place every day, and such is the statement of Sir Charles Trevelyan, and the admission of Mr. Anderson (1578, 1579).

2790. Can you give any example to illustrate your meaning?—Yes. What has been done with the 25,000*l.* that was issued for the Duke of Wellington's funeral? That has been for years in the possession of the Paymaster, not lying idle, because you compel him by his rules to exhaust his balances; that money was therefore applied; it was not applied to the Duke of Wellington's funeral, for the best reason, for it was not wanting, but to other purposes.

2791. Mr. Hankey.] Do you mean by that, money or credit?—I have nothing to say to money; in Exchequer language, every credit is an issue. In law, in fact, in our accounts our credits are payments; we know no other.

2792. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Still there are 25,000*l.* standing to the credit of that vote, are there not?—Not at the Exchequer, but to the separate and independent account of the Paymaster. And has not that 25,000*l.* been in course of employment for years by the Paymaster, and is that a legal employment?

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

2793. Does not that resolve itself into what you have already stated, whether the Paymaster should or should not keep more than one balance upon his drawing account?—Certainly not. Supposing that an account is given to me appropriated for three distinct purposes, I may place the whole of that at my banker's in one account, to my single account, but that does not give me a right to apply the appropriated money of A. for the purposes of B., or the money of B. for the purposes of C. I cannot do this as Paymaster, because I am bound by an Appropriation Act, which by my official duty and responsibility precludes my issuing that money for any other purpose.

2794. Will you have the kindness to state what is the practice which you would recommend upon the assumption that there is to be only one drawing account and one balance upon that account, such practice being in conformity with the existing law, according to your construction of it?—If you ask me how to reform the Paymaster's office, that is a very large question and requires time. If am asked how my own proposition, which I have now suggested, is to be carried out, I see no difficulty whatever in it. It is merely this: supposing there is a sum of 3,000*l.*, of which a single 1,000*l.* is applicable to each of three distinct purposes, then I am precluded by law from applying the 1,000*l.* given to A. for the purposes of B., or for the purposes of C. I may have a common balance of 3,000*l.*, yet I may adhere as rigidly to the principle of appropriation as if I had three separate accounts kept for A., B., and C.

2795. Does not the present practice completely fulfil all the conditions which you have suggested?—It seems to be very certain that it does not. While mine is a strict adherence to the principle of appropriation, the present is undoubtedly an undisguised departure from that principle.

2796. Will you explain how it can be said that the principle of appropriation is not adhered to when no issue of money is ever made otherwise than for the vote sanctioned by Parliament?—In the first place, I must again repeat that I cannot speak to the Committee about the Paymaster's office without more acquaintance with it than I have; but I will give one instance which is stated in my memorandum. The salaries of the Judges are all payable and paid as soon as the quarter comes; the Treasury and the Paymaster have no legal authority to make any one single payment of that kind at the time that they make it; yet it is regularly made, and is an illegal payment as it stands.

2797. Why so?—Because the Act of Parliament prescribes that until they get the authority of the Treasury warrant and my Exchequer authority, transmitted after satisfying myself of the legality of that issue, they have no power to issue. That is a point to which I invite the attention of the law officers; and if they say that without the Treasury warrant, and without the Exchequer controlling warrant, you have the power of issuing at your own will and pleasure, then undoubtedly the present practice is right; but if the law officers negative that proposition, the practice is illegal.

2798. You consider it a misappropriation of public money to pay the salaries of the Judges, which are charged upon the Consolidated Fund, according to the present practice; you think that there ought to be an Exchequer warrant in each case; is that the extent of your objection?—An Exchequer warrant is required by law, and it is given by the law; but the Paymaster acts without it; and to show the Committee the inconvenience of that, I have had frequent occasion to stop out of those warrants demands made upon the public, in my judgment, improperly by the Treasury. This has occurred: I have had claims for dead men, which I have struck off; I have had claims for which there was no authority, which I have struck off; but if, in the absence of any Exchequer authority, you can pay without that which, as a condition precedent, is made indispensably necessary by law, how am I afterwards to satisfy the obligations of the Act which you have already acted upon in anticipation of the statutable authority, and paid that which was afterwards determined to be illegal.

2799. Are these cases of recent occurrence, the mistakes as to persons who were deceased?—That was the case of an officer belonging to a court of justice; and the Treasury continued him upon the warrant, and they wished to continue him, even for the chance of there being a successor appointed; it being a case in which the office was abolished, and in which no successor could be appointed.

2800. Do you remember the name?—Yes, quite well; his name was Mr. Mahoney, Mahoney, who was an officer of one of the courts of justice in Ireland; but there are other cases.

2801. What was the date?—It is in the paper which I have put before the Committee, and the whole of the correspondence; letter to Treasury, 8 April 1851, No. 13, page 40.

2802. Was that a mistake, or a deliberate misappropriation of the public money?—I pray to be understood that I do not attribute any deliberate misappropriation. I am to protect the law, and see it carried into effect; I do not attribute misappropriation in the sense in which the word is used sometimes. regret to be forced to repeat this protest so frequently.

2803. The effect of this memorandum seems to be, according to your view, that there is a systematic misappropriation of the public money under the existing practice: what I am desirous of learning from you is, in what you consider that system of misappropriation a departure from the law?—I consider the present practice to be a departure from the law, a trampling under foot of the Appropriation Act, by applying money voted for one thing to another. I consider it to be a systematic violation of the law in another respect, that when the law declares that, under certain conditions, and those certain conditions only, payments shall be made, payments are made without those conditions; which appear to me to be payments illegal and unauthorised, and a departure from the law.

2804. Do you think that the principle of specific appropriation in the Pay-office could be carried into effect without keeping a separate balance for every vote in the drawing account?—I know that question is disposed of by the fact: as long as there were three paymasters there was no difficulty of this description felt; for I believe it is not consistent with any fact or any suggested fact, that the Paymaster of the Army ever applied his money in aid of the Treasurer of the Navy, or the Treasurer of the Navy ever applied his money in aid of the Treasurer of the Ordnance; and I contend that the same principle of appropriation that was then practised, which was not only practical but practised under the law as it now stands, should be enforced and practised again.

2805. Do you think that the present law would be satisfied if the practice was restored to the state that it was in under separate paymasters?—I think that with the law as it now stands, the practice is better in some respects, but as to the appropriation of the public money, I think it would be most desirable for the safety of the constitution of England, and for the interests of Her Majesty's Government, whoever compose that Government, that the obligation of adhering to the law to the same appropriation with respect to the great departments, should be imperative now.

2806. Was a separate balance ever kept for each vote of the Miscellaneous Estimates?—There was a separate account kept by Mr. Sargent; the principle of appropriation upon that account was, I believe, infinitely more stringent than anything that is practised at the present time; but Mr. Sargent at the time that he was Paymaster of those votes was also the Paymaster of the civil contingencies; he was also, I believe, Paymaster of the commissariat services, which represented the Commissariat Chest in those days, and the army extraordinary accounts department. He therefore had two votes, if I recollect rightly, that were freed from special appropriation; whether those votes were used, we will say by an advance made from the civil contingencies in aid of the vote in miscellaneous services, I cannot say, but it is very probable that it was so; I think it is nearly certain that it was so; but that is nothing of which I complain. If the Treasury apply the 3,000,000 l. voted without appropriation, or the 100,000 l. voted for the civil contingencies in aid of any service whatever coming under the two heads, they are perfectly entitled to do so. Now, to speak about the practice of Mr. Sargent, I must bear in mind he had those unappropriated votes to deal with. I hope and believe that Mr. Sargent, who was an admirable public servant, is still living; he may be called.

2807. Does not the Appropriation Act make a separate appropriation of each of the votes in the Miscellaneous Estimates?—Yes; both the closing Appropriation Act and the separate Ways and Means Acts, with some deduction, however, which deserves attention.

2808. Did Mr. Sargent keep a separate balance upon each of those votes in his drawing account?—I cannot tell you with any certainty.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

2809. Do you feel any doubt that he did not keep a separate balance upon each of those votes?—I cannot say, but I know that he kept a most regular account with respect to all those services; but whether, having two other accounts to draw upon, he occasionally, under any circumstances, merged the one account into the other, or whether he applied one miscellaneous vote to another purpose, I am not able to say; all that I say is, that the whole time that I was at the Treasury I never authorised such an act, and as to indiscriminate issues of the three great services, I feel under the former system it would have been impossible.

2810. Do you believe that, in order to carry strictly into effect the intended specific appropriation in the Paymaster's office, it is necessary for the Paymaster to keep a separate balance upon each of the votes in the Miscellaneous Estimates in his drawing account?—I know that he kept an account separate; I have seen it. With respect to the balance that he kept I am unable to tell you; I believe Mr. Sargent is living.

2811. Do you think that it is the duty of the present Paymaster, under the present law, to keep a separate balance for each of the miscellaneous votes in his drawing account?—I think it is his duty to keep all the issues for those accounts separate and distinct, and to make no issue for any one of those accounts that is not out of the money appropriated specifically for it, and there is no difficulty arising out of that; I have shown you that Mr. Sargent's balances were not excessive when he kept 30 or 40 accounts at the Treasury, and that example shows you would not require those excessive balances; I have no doubt it could be managed otherwise.

2812. Is it not the practice now that the Paymaster never makes an issue in excess of each of those votes?—But he makes an issue in excess of his authority to make it; that is the complaint that I make of the violation of the law; it is the system of doing an illegal act, to be rectified by a subsequent proceeding, which endeavours to convert that which is illegal at the time it was done, into what is sought to be afterwards made legal.

2813. Mr. Bowyer.] Your Lordship says, not that he issues more money than he ought upon each vote, but he issues for one vote money that belongs to another vote?—Yes, and more than he has legal authority to issue at the time. He is called on for money for A; he has none; he pays out of money belonging to B, in expectation of repaying it out of money belonging to A when it comes in.

2814. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Inasmuch as the Exchequer does not deal with money, but with credits, how then can it be said that he issues money appropriated to another vote?—I have already referred you to the authority of the Exchequer Act itself, which in the clause I read, the 11th clause, with respect to all his means of obtaining funds from the Exchequer, states that issues are made to him to be applied by that officer to the service for which they are intended.

2815. According to one construction of that clause, the present practice entirely satisfies it, does not it?—I do not see that under any construction that can be given to the clause the law is satisfied in that respect. The clause prescribes, section 10, that in the transfer of my credits the provisions of the Appropriation Act be adhered to, and this is strictly done by me; but section 11, that when I shall have satisfied myself of the legality of the order, I shall place the sum so voted to the credit of the public accountant to the Crown in the respective branches of service, to be applied by such officer to such service. This appropriation is not satisfied by the present practice.

2816. But if the law looks to the credits, and not to the payments from the drawing account, is it not true that he always keeps a credit standing in his Exchequer credit account with regard to each vote till it is exhausted?—No; there are cases in which he pays without having any Exchequer credit at all.

2817. The second paragraph is to this effect: "That under this system, with or without an Exchequer warrant, or any special transfer or payment from the Bank to meet a particular service, issues may be made by the Paymaster, and are made for that service in anticipation of funds to be subsequently appropriated, and are thus paid in the absence of all legal authority." Does that paragraph refer to the cash account of the Paymaster as distinguished from his Exchequer credit account?—It applies to the Exchequer credit account as transferred to his drawing account; and it applies, perhaps, still more forcibly to his cash account, because he receives the money, and as long as he holds that money, pays it out of his cash account to his drawing account and uses it indiscriminately, criminately, he uses it without any legal appropriation. With respect to the Exchequer credit the case is very strong: he receives it under a special appropriation, and in place of using it for that purpose he employs it for another.

2819. The question is, whether he does set them aside, and whether the mode of transacting the business of the Paymaster's office is not, at all events, a substantial, if not a literal compliance with the Exchequer Act; do you believe that he ever can be said, when he keeps a correct credit standing against each vote, to misappropriate the money set aside for that vote?—I must again reply that misappropriation is not a word that I use in the sense in which it may be understood elsewhere. If put upon the Minutes, and I am to be charged with imputing misappropriation in the way in which it will be understood out of doors, I am doing no such thing. I mean that he applies it contrary to law, but for a branch of the public service.

2820. Is your meaning anything more than this: that the accounts of the Pay-office are kept so as not completely to satisfy the letter of the law?—It is not a question as to how the accounts are kept, but it is a question that the law is violated, and if there is any doubt upon it I respectfully entreat the Right honourable Gentleman to take a legal opinion upon that subject and lay it before Parliament.

2822. Before the Government can take the opinion of the Crown lawyers, it is very desirable to ascertain precisely the point upon which the opinion is to be taken; I am anxious to ascertain clearly what is the precise extent of the misappropriation which you conceive to be at present carried on; do you believe that at present, without going into corrupt misappropriation, that substantially money is ever misappropriated in excess of any vote, or in anticipation of any vote, or that any payment is made for any purpose not sanctioned by Parliament?—In the evidence of Mr. Anderson it is admitted that the monies are occasionally used in anticipation of the votes. To that evidence I refer in proof of the anticipation of the votes. (Anderson, 1081, 1082). I know that it is so used without Treasury and Exchequer warrants. I know that Sir C. Trevelyan admits these practices to be of daily occurrence. I believe in the case of the grant for the Duke of Wellington's funeral the purposes of that vote were exhausted when the expense of the funeral was defrayed; in that very instance there was no legal power to apply that vote to anything else, but it has been so applied from that time to the present, and it was only by accident, namely, the declaration by a Member of the Government, that he had 24,000 l. which he was prepared to apply to another purpose, that the fact came out that the purposes of the vote were already answered, and 25,000 l. kept in hand.

2823. Do you think that the Paymaster ought to have kept a separate balance for that 80,000 l.?—Not necessarily. The first error was drawing it out of the Exchequer long before it was wanted; that was the commencement of the error, but that which I consider as the Parliamentary offence was with the power exercised by the Paymaster-general of applying this or any money which he gets indiscriminately to any service to which he chooses to apply it. This is even more serious than the error of withdrawing from the Exchequer the money before it is required.

2824. Was not that the error of the Treasury, and not of the Pay-office?—I believe not, because I believe the Treasury (I speak here under correction of those who know better) receive their applications for issues from the Pay-office.

26 June 1856.

My charge is the same, whether it applies to the Treasury, to the Paymaster, or to both.

2825. Do you believe that that is an error which it is possible, in the nature of things, altogether to avoid; is it possible for the Treasury always to anticipate the precise time at which claims for payment will be made under any vote of that kind?—I believe there are some returns before the Committee which will show how this sort of practice acts. They could not, surely, have imagined that the whole sum of 80,000 l. would be demanded from them within the few days in which it was drawn out. What I suggested as a possibility, and proved it to be the fact in respect to the 25,000 l., was, that it was not drawn out for these purposes at all, but that it was drawn out to relieve the difficulties of the Paymaster's balance, and to enable the Paymaster to adjust or to rectify his balance by getting money from that vote. To show the Committee the urgency with which this issue was demanded from me, I beg to refer them to the Treasury letter of 24th March 1853, in which I was requested to make this issue forthwith, the same being stated to be required for immediate and pressing use.

2826. Do you believe that any larger sum was placed at the disposal of the Paymaster, in consequence of that step, than would have been placed at his disposal if only 60,000 l. had been drawn out originally?—Undoubtedly; because he went to his Exchequer credit account, upon which, by his mere action, he was enabled to act direct upon it by the transfer of that to his drawing account. It is not merely that he withdrew it from the Exchequer account before it was required; but no sooner had it entered into the Exchequer credit account, which is the Paymaster's account, than it was withdrawn from thence to carry it to his drawing account, upon which he could operate for any service he pleased at his discretion.

2828. You think that it ought to have been kept standing as a balance in the hands of the Paymaster?—On the contrary, I think that it ought to have been left in the Exchequer till it was wanted. The Committee are aware that applications for credits to the Exchequer come in in the afternoon of one day, and are satisfied by the transfer required; by the earliest hour of the morning my box goes to the Bank; and therefore there need be no pressing anticipation of withdrawing from the Exchequer account money which is not required; it was required, but not for legal purposes, and it has been so applied.

2829. Sir James Graham.] Your Lordship probably has read the evidence of Mr. Anderson and Mr. Hoffay, with respect to the mode of transacting the daily business of payments in the Paymaster's office?—Yes; but not attentively.

2830. It is admitted, both by Mr. Anderson and Mr. Hoffay, that in the daily transactions of that business of payment, an advance, for example, is made from the Navy surplus to meet the Army deficiencies, and that in the accounts that is rectified generally within 48 hours; always within a month; am I right in collecting from your Lordship that this which is the admitted practice is at variance with the 11th section of the Exchequer Act?—I believe that even that would be a departure from the 11th section of the Exchequer Act, but I shall disbelieve that that is a statement which the accounts of the Paymaster, if inspected by this Committee, or by competent persons, would realise; for how comes it that 24,000 l. of the sum voted for the Duke of Wellington's funeral has not been disposed of in some legal manner during two or three years? and in the paper which is before the Committee they will find monies in the hands of the Paymaster-general, some of which have been there from the year 1841, 1842, 1849, 1850, 1851, 1852, and 1853; those monies having been in his hands to apply to any purposes that he thinks fit; and that is wholly inconsistent with the supposition of a daily, or even monthly, rectification of the account.

2831. Admitting, for one moment, that the cases you have referred to are exceptional cases, will you state your opinion to the Committee as to the daily practice, which is admitted, of transferring from the surplus, under one head, to meet meet the deficiency under another, corrected, as it is alleged, in the account by adjustment, generally within 48 hours, and always within a month; am I right in collecting that, in your opinion, this, the daily course of business in the Paymaster's office, is at variance with the provision of the 11th section of the Exchequer Act, which says that the money shall be applied by such officer for such service?—I think it to be contrary to that Act, but I think it to be still more contrary to the principles introduced by Sir James Graham, under which no application even of the subordinate votes, within one single department, can place without a formal and specific Treasury authorisation.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

2832. Your Lordship will remember that when that Act of Parliament was passed, which contains the 11th section, there were several treasurers, amounting to at least seven in all, for the greater branches of the public expenditure, and your Lordship was the author of the consolidation of those branches; is it not your opinion that that consolidation of the Treasury accounts did render, at least very difficult, if not impossible, the strict application of the rule laid down by the 11th section?—I do not think that in the slightest degree it diminished the possibility of the application of the rules; it might have required, perhaps, somewhat larger balances and closer attention, but that excess of balance strikes me as being a small evil in comparison with the power of misappropriation now exercised and avowed.

2833. Are the Committee to understand, that if this practice be sanctioned, shall prevail, and be continued in the Paymaster's office, then the power, such your Lordship exercises, as Comptroller of the Exchequer, will be a farce and a nullity?—I think so, unless defined and sanctioned by law; because I cannot distinguish the violation of the law in the one case, though it may be small, from a general power of dispensing with law. I cannot admit, without sanction, the principle of extending it to other cases, by the exercise of a discretion which may be fatal to the public service. The law is precise in its precision, and therefore it ought to be precisely obeyed; that it was obeyed whilst there were three paymasters there is no reason to doubt; and I see no reason why it should not be as strictly obeyed under one responsible head as under three responsible heads; he has the same duty, but he is one person to administer three accounts.

2834. Then, in your Lordship's opinion, if the Legislature, when cognisant of this mode of payment in the Paymaster's office, shall sanction it, providing such other checks as it may be expedient to provide, the control of your Lordship, under the Exchequer Act, will be no longer effective or useful?—Pardon me; on the contrary; that assumes that Parliament, in its discretion, alters the law; and if Parliament alters that law, it is by the altered law that I must regulate myself. What I complain of now is, that the practice is not in harmony with the law; but if the law be altered, it would be just as easy to sanction the payments within the day; and if the law sanctioned that, there would be no difference between the law and the practice, but I am far from recommending this course.

2835. First of all, your Lordship would advise that the opinion of the Crown lawyers should be taken with reference to the existing practice, setting aside exceptional cases, whether the daily practice in the Paymaster-general's office is reconcilable with the law, and if they answered in the affirmative, that would put an end to the question?—It would put an end to the question as to the present construction of the law; but that goes also upon the assumption suggested by the question that those are exceptional cases, and the evidence before me makes it clear that the practices complained of are not exceptional cases.

2836. Then, if it should be declared by competent authority that the daily practice is not inconsistent with the existing law, or if it be inconsistent with the existing law, the Legislature think fit to sanction the practice, then wherein would be the efficacy of your Lordship's control?—It would be as clearly efficient, subject to that modification, as it is now. The money of one transfer which is made to a particular department would be for one day freed from appropriation, but after that day it would be subject to appropriation.

2837. But the practice is admitted to be in use, not for one day, but generally for 48 hours; and sometimes till the close of the month?—If it was taken with that extension to every deviation, it presents opportunities dangerous to the public service, and violates pro tanto not only the present Exchequer Act, but the Appropriation Act, and the power vested in the Treasury, under Sir James Graham's clause; a power still subject to that variation of issuing no money whatever but the money appropriated by Parliament. Issuing it for that purpose only would be a strict principle; if a power were given for one day, or for two days, or for one month; though those exceptions would destroy the spirit of the Appropriation Act, still that Act and the Exchequer Act might be in force, subject to that alteration; and you would require to see that the money that was used on the Monday for the Navy, being Army money, was restored to the Army on the Tuesday; but now there is no such check on the practice; it is indiscriminate.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

2838. Saving for a moment the question of appropriation as a matter of financial arrangement, there would be then the advantage of keeping the balances low, and of paying the gross service out of the gross credits, to the utmost possible extent, subject to a constitutional check?—Certainly; the lower you keep the balances, consistently with the principle of appropriation, the better it is for all parties.

2840. Mr. Bowyer.] Are the Committee to understand your Lordship to say, that the effect of this practice at the Pay-office, of which you complain, is that the Exchequer exercises no control at all?—Quite the contrary, the whole principle of appropriation is affirmed and maintained by the strictness of my special issues. I mean the warrant which makes the issue for a specified purpose and no other. This is subsequently defeated by the subordinate departments.

2841. I understand you to mean, that in point of principle, if the law is violated in one particular, it may be violated in another; that is what your Lordship means when you say that the present practice makes the control of the Exchequer a nullity?—Precisely; but that is coupled with other practices upon which I have not been questioned, but which have been of late introduction and have all the same tendency. In this paper before me, I find that in the votes of 1841-42, 1849-50, and 1850-51, the monies were placed at the entire discretion of the Paymaster, but he being bound to spend them, for if he obeys his instructions he must keep down his balances; those monies have been employed for purposes for which they were not granted by Parliament, and this for years.

2842. I believe I am right in saying, that the advantage of having one Paymaster instead of three, is that the public service is carried on with a much smaller balance under one Paymaster than if there were three?—That is one advantage, the economy is another; but these cannot outweigh the dangers of abandoning the constitutional principle of Appropriation.

2843. Then the difficulty that I feel is, how, if one Paymaster acts as if he were three Paymasters, that advantage would still be preserved to the public?—The advantage is well explained in Mr. Anderson's memorandum; I think that the pay department is a large piece of machinery, capable of doing a great deal more work than that for which it may have been originally instituted. You must have that Department perfect, to pay 5,000,000 l. a year, and you may find that that department is so perfect, that it will be able to pay 10,000,000 l. a day without augmentation; therefore you have economy in the expenditure, as well as economy in the balance.

2844. My question was this: if the Paymaster-general acts as if he were three paymasters, are there not, in substance, three paymasters instead of one; and will it not be necessary, therefore, that there should be the same large balances which there were under the old system?—Under the old system the balances were not so large; I have shown that in evidence, that previously to the consolidation, the balances had been actually less than they have been since in many instances.

2845. In point of substance, would not making the Paymaster-general act as if he were three paymasters, be reverting to the old system under which there was not one paymaster, but three paymasters?—It would not be reverting to that in substance. In the first place, you would not require an increase of your establishment to such an extent as if there were three. The single paymaster could not claim three salaries. Mr. Anderson has shown the Committee the pecuniary economy which has resulted from the measure which I introduced; and that would stand pretty much as it is now. Then all that remains is the question of having larger balances. I believe that you would have larger balances in some instances; but if you take into account the advantage of saving your principle of appropriation, I think the increased balance is, comparatively speaking, nothing.

26 June 1856.

2846. Then are the Committee to understand your Lordship's opinion to be, that the disadvantage which would arise from having larger balances, by reason of the Paymaster-general acting as if he were three paymasters-general, would be counterbalanced by the advantage of a stricter observance of the principle of appropriation?—I think that the question of economy of balances is as the dust under your feet, in comparison with preserving the principle of Parliamentary appropriation. But I refer to the comparison I have already made in proving that the necessity of larger balances is misapprehended, or greatly overrated.

2847. Mr. Williams.]. Your Lordship has stated that balances have remained in the hands of the Paymaster-general from the year 1841, and subsequent years?—Yes.

2848. Do those balances arise from the balances of the votes unappropriated?—Yes; but drawn from the Exchequer, and placed in the hands of the Paymaster, and continuing, in the first instance, for several years. It was voted in 1841, and there is a balance of 2,462 l.; the last issue working upon that account, so far as I can trace it, was in the year 1854. There you have the minimum use and diversion of the money; how much longer it has been used I know not. In the case from 1854 to 1856 it may have been as much more again, for what I know. You will see in the paper the amount that remains in the Paymaster's hands; you will see that unissued for the purpose for which Parliament intended it; you will see that the rule of the Paymaster-general's office is to exhaust this balance before he draws afresh upon the Exchequer balance; and you have a demonstration that that money has been applied to purposes other than those for which Parliament intended it, and not rectified in the course of two days or at the end of the month, but continued for years so employed. This is proved by the evidence which is now upon the table of the Committee.

2849. To what department does that balance belong?—The balance in 1841 was a vote for public walks of 10,000 l., and there is a balance now of 2,462 l. unissued and in the hands of the Paymaster to his drawing account.

2851. Is there an Act of Parliament requiring those balances to be surrendered in the way your Lordship has stated?—There is no such Act of Parliament as that which I now recommend, and as in the Report of the Commissioners on Public Accounts this recommendation is included, with the view of accomplishing a complete settlement of the annual accounts, and preventing all obscurity or mistake arising from mixing the amount of the credits for the service of one year with the amount of the credits for the service of another, "We propose that the Exchequer shall cease to give credit on the 1st of October of each year for the money voted in the year ending with the preceding December, that all credits not made use of by a day to be fixed shall be cancelled, and that the funds not applied shall revert again to the disposal of Parliament;" that is a recommendation which I venture to urge upon the consideration of the Committee. I am quite sure that nothing would contribute to greater simplicity in our accounts, and prevent the continued misapplication of money year after year for purposes for which it was never voted.

2852. What is the title of that document which you have just read?—It is the Exchequer Report, signed by Sir Henry Parnell, by Lord John Russell, by Sir James Graham, by Sir James Kempt, by Mr. Poulett Thompson, by Mr. Francis Baring, and by Mr. Edward Ellice; that report was made in 1831. There is also another recommendation in this report which has not been carried into effect, and which would produce immediate reforms in the administration of public money. It is this: after stating the necessity of making the Comptroller independent of the Treasury, so as to ensure his performance of duty, and to give him weight of authority to carry into effect the purposes of his office, it was suggested in the progress of the Bill that two officers acting conjunctively would be required for that purpose, for you could not rely upon one having sternness enough to accomplish the painful, and disagreeable, and arduous duties of resisting, and perhaps justly, the intended views of the Government. That proposal of Lord Granville Somerset's was rejected; but the Committee gave this recommendation, which it behoves the House of Commons to consider, with a view to the effective enforcement of the appropriation; they recommend that a law shall be passed constituting a commission of persons independent of the Crown, to be chosen annually by the House of Commons, to examine the Comptroller-general's accounts, and annually to report their opinion thereon to the House. If the Comptroller-general had that constant inspection upon his action on the part of Parliament itself, to which he is responsible, there would be no difficulty in carrying into effect the appropriation of any money. The present system of defeating and escaping from the Exchequer control never could have taken place, or at least never could have been persevered in with impunity. Even a simpler change would be found operative. If you compel the Comptroller-general to report annually to Parliament, I have no kind of doubt that his control would be found more efficient. Administrative departments would shrink from reports leading to inquiry if not to censure.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

2853. What is the date of that report?—It is dated in 1831, and that recommendation is signed by the high and dignified persons whose names I have already given.

2855. Is your Lordship aware whether the Queen gave her sanction to that alteration?—I know that I objected to it from its date, and I sent it over to the Treasury, and as quickly as I could get a return I got a return of the same Queen's sign manual warrant countersigned by the same Lords of the Treasury, with the date that was objectionable obliterated with a penknife, and the date that made it a legal instrument, if it had been done with the proper authority, substituted; this, too, was without any authentication of the change. I objected to act upon that, and the warrant was withdrawn, and a proper warrant was sent; the facts are contained in a paper before the House. (Letter from Comptroller-general to Secretary of the Treasury, 8 March 1855.) (See Appendix.)

2856. That is, the warrant was altered, as I understand, rather than withdrawn, making it legal by altering the date?—It was illegal because the date was altered, and by altering that date a paper that was invalid, and not worth the paper on which it was written, was converted, or attempted to be converted, into an operative document having legal force.

2857. Sir Henry Willoughby.] When was that done, in what year?—You will see it in the documents that are now printed. (See Papers, 13, p. 77.)

2858. Mr. Bowyer.] It could only have been made right by the Queen signing it after the alteration?—I do not presume to give opinions upon points of law; but every document in my office is a record; by Act of Parliament every paper that goes through it has the attributes of a record, and how a record is to be dealt with in that fashion and justified, I know not.

2859. Sir Henry Willoughby.] Can you state the year in which that occurred?—It is in the papers that are before the Committee, at page 77. It happened in 1855, in March.

2860. Mr. Williams.] Is your Lordship aware that that alteration of the date was made by the authority of the Lords of the Treasury, with or without the sanction of the Queen?—I really cannot say upon whose authority it was made, but it is a looseness of practice, to say no more; but I cite it to show to the Committee that the question of time, which was suggested as being unimportant, may in certain instances, as in this, constitute the difference between what is operative and legal, and what is inoperative and illegal. Even where commonplace alterations or interlineations are made in written documents coming to my office by a Treasury Minute passed at my request, they require an authenticating signature. This, though a sign manual, had none.

2861. This same warrant was again returned to the Exchequer, was it not, with the alteration of the date only?—No; at first it was so returned, but when I refused acting upon it as being illegal, a new warrant was sent to me in regular form form immediately. I have no doubt that this irregularity must have been committed by some subordinate person. I was perfectly satisfied that none of the honourable and distinguished persons who occupy responsible positions in the Treasury would for a moment have sanctioned such a proceeding.

2862. Mr. Wilson.] You stated, did you not, that the same warrant was returned after being altered with a penknife?—Yes; it was returned to me so altered, as I stated in a letter addressed to the Treasury, 8th March 1855. I objected to it, and then it was withdrawn, and a bonâ fide warrant, executed by Her Majesty, and countersigned by the Lords of the Treasury, was sent to me, and upon that I acted.

2863. Mr. Williams.] You stated, did you not, that this warrant was sent to the Exchequer with the Queen's signature for the issue of public money, and that your Lordship, on account of the date being anterior to the authority given by the Act of Parliament, returned it?—Yes.

2864. And that this same warrant was again sent from the Treasury to the Exchequer with the date altered, having been scratched out with a knife and a fresh date inserted?—Yes; and on that being objected to the irregular warrant was withdrawn, and a warrant in proper form sent.

2865. Mr. Wilson.] When acted upon by the Treasury, I understand your Lordship not to infer that the issue was then illegal; the time had arrived, the Act had passed, and the transaction was legal, with the exception only that the date happened to be wrong?—I will explain that: I was pressed to give instances of effective control; and it was even suggested that there were only two instances of control ever known, one in Lord Grenville's time and the other in mine; I have therefore given every case in the index I have put in; the case now before the Committee is in Paper No. 13, at page 77, and is thus described:—

PRECIS of CORRESPONDENCE on Royal Orders, dated previously to passing of Act, and their Illegal Correction.

Corr. Book 9, p. 80	6 March 1855 -	- - Comptroller-general to Mr. Wilson.	- Returns four Royal Orders and Treasury Warrants issued for excess of expenditure, Navy, &c., 1855, all dated five days before Ways and Means Act received the Royal Assent. Irregular to make issues upon them under other Ways and Means, which are applicable only to Votes of last Session; loses no time that mistake may be remedied as soon as possible.
- -	7 „ „ -	- Mr. Wilson to Comptroller-general.	- - Agrees objections are valid. Royal Warrants will be returned as soon as corrected.
- p. 81	8 „ „ -	- - Comptroller-general to Mr. Wilson.	- - Sorry to give additional trouble in any matter of financial usage. Errors in date of Royal Orders, are corrected by erasure with a knife of 27 Feb. and substitution of 6 March. By Treasury Regulations, errors, when properly corrected, require authentication by Secretary's initials; but consequences might be serious if these led to alteration of an instrument affecting its legal validity, after Sign Manual and counter-signatures have been affixed. Refers to similar case in 1841, under Sir R. Peel, consequent on opinion of law officers, when new Royal Order and Treasury Warrant were prepared, reciting the error (see Corr. Book 2, p. 325); also to same course under Lord Derby, Corr. Book 7, p. 197; advises its adoption now. (continued)

Corr. Book 9, p. 84	9 March 1855	- Mr. Wilson to Comptroller-general.	- - Understands the corrected Royal Orders should be authenticated by Secretary's initials, or new Orders obtained; former course consistent with precedent, and will be much preferable; if new Royal Orders absolutely necessary, must be obtained at some inconvenience.
- p. 85	- „ „	- - Comptroller-general to Mr. Wilson.	- - Initials of Secretary sufficient for Treasury Warrant, but as to Royal Order, strongly recommends precedents in Sir R. Peel's and Lord Derby's Government to be adhered to; as Chancellor of Exchequer, should never have ventured on possibility of altering Sign Manual Warrant after the Royal Signature had been affixed; believes the Act wholly illegal, and noticeable as such.
- p. 104	10 „ „	- - Treasury to Comptroller-general.	- - Transmitting four new Royal Orders and Treasury Warrants.

I must explain in referring to the cases in Sir Robert Peel's Government and Lord Derby's Government, that they had no relation to an act like this, altering a sign manual warrant; they were cases only similar to this, as to issuing without ways and means.

2866. When this warrant was sent the period had arrived, the Act had passed, and the Act itself then, with the exception only of the infirmity of the date, was a legal one?—Yes, I believe it was.

2867. There was no attempt to issue money before the Act had been passed?—Not in the least.

2868. Mr. Bowyer.] Does your Lordship say that the defect of the date, a wrong date being inserted, was a merely formal and technical defect, or that it was a material and substantial one?—It was essential; the instrument was wholly inoperative and illegal in the one case, and it was perfectly regular and legal in the other; but the alteration was made in the way that I have described, which vitiated it on other grounds.

2869. Mr. Hankey.] To revert to that payment respecting the Duke of Wellington's funeral, if the accounts had been kept in the way which your Lordship thinks is correct, that 24,000 l. which was not used at the time, would have remained in the hands of the Paymaster, but he could not have touched that money for any other purposes?—No; I suggested that it ought not to have been drawn from the Exchequer.

2870. But assuming it to have been withdrawn from the Exchequer, the Paymaster ought not to have used it for any other purposes than for the payments for the Duke of Wellington's funeral?—He could not use it according to law for any other purpose than that.

2871. Would not the consequence of that mode of keeping accounts have been, that a larger balance, by 24,000 l., would have remained in the Paymaster's account in the Bank from that time to this?—That only shows the error of having withdrawn it from the Exchequer; it ought to have been returned to the savings, and then to have been applied to the public service.

2872. Would not that have been the effect, that the Paymaster's balance in the Bank would have been augmented, and remained augmented, from that time to the present, by that amount?—If it remained to his account of course his balance would have augmented, but there was no necessity for its so remaining. I have suggested its return to the Exchequer as ways and means.

2873. If in the way which your Lordship would have preferred it had remained in the Exchequer, what would have become of that 24,000 l.; where would it have been?—It would have been at the Exchequer account, incapable of being used for any purpose not authorised by Parliament, but capable of being used and issued for any purpose which Parliament had authorised; and it would have lessened the amount, if Government had been paying deficiency bills, of their wants for deficiency bills; they would have had in the Consolidated Fund a sum larger, by the sum of 24,000 l., and it would have lessened the amount of deficiency deficiency bills that they required, or has been otherwise issuable for voted services.

2874. But the money would, in either case, have been left at the Bank of England?—It would have been in the Exchequer account; all the accounts are at the Bank of England.

2875. It would equally have remained, as money unused, in either case?—No; it would have remained unused until the Treasury should authorise it lawfully. If it had been at the Exchequer account, in the other case, it was applicable, and has been used, at the discretion of the Paymaster, for unauthorised purposes; that is the difference.

2876. Your Lordship was alluding to the propriety of an Act of Parliament being made, which obliged the Paymaster to repay annually, or at certain periods, all sums of money again into the Exchequer eaccount which were not used for the purposes contemplated when so drawn out?—Yes; that he should make savings as he does at present, only making them systematically, and obtaining a larger amount by so making savings upon the Consolidated Fund, which then becomes the medium of legal issues.

2877. Is there not an Act now existing, which obliges that course to be adopted with respect to money paid for dividend money; is not the money paid over for the whole amount of the dividend when drawn from your Lordship's account, and is not a certain portion of that repaid again into the Exchequer, so that at the end a larger sum than the particular fixed sum is left in the Bank of England?—Yes. As to the unclaimed dividends, it is only to apply that same salutary principle to the other branches of the service, though the enactments required would have differed.

2878. It is for the purpose of applying a similar principle to other branches of the service, that your Lordship considers that that recommendation was made?—Yes, I think so, because it is more necessary. The honourable gentleman knows full well, that if we had a balance in the Bank of England which had been issued for dividends, no operation of the Paymaster, or anybody, could apply it for any other purposes than those dividends, therefore we have applied this check where it is least requisite; but as to the other branches of the service, where it is more requisite to be brought under the control of the Exchequer, there is no such check, greatly to the prejudice of the public interests.

2879. In what way is money again drawn out of the Exchequer, after having been paid back by the Bank of England, not being considered by the Exchequer or the Treasury as being immediately required?—You mean a saving; you declare it ways and means, and then it is issuable like any other part of the Consolidated Fund, to any service that the public requires to which that money can be legally issued.

2880. I mean when it is required again for the purposes of the Bank to pay the public dividends, in what way does it come back again from the Exchequer?—We are alternate receivers and payers. At times you see in the public accounts the balance of unclaimed dividends as an addition to the ways and means of the year, and in other cases, if the demands augmented, we should issue for the dividends which had been unclaimed at a particular time, but which might be claimed again; there is no difficulty in making the issue; the Bank would be immediately in funds.

2881. Does your Lordship think that there would be no difficulty in again making an issue on any other service, the same as it is now done as to the dividends at the Bank?—I see none whatever. I think that a salutary arrangement might be made by a mere Treasury Minute.

2882. Chairman.] Supposing this money for the Duke of Wellington's funeral had been repaid into the Exchequer, it would have required a new vote, would it not, to re-issue any part of that money, even for the Duke's funeral?—No. If you make a saving, and declare it ways and means, you use it as such for any other appropriated service, though not for the service which is satisfied by the declaration of savings.

2883. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] If the 25,000*l.* of the vote for the funeral of the Duke of Wellington had been made by the Government a saving, and a claim upon that vote subsequently came in, would it not be necessary for Government to take a new vote?—The Treasury would either pay it, if the claims were small, out of civil contingencies, or if they were large they would undoubtedly edly have got from Parliament a vote, that vote being made necessary by the previous saving.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

2884. They could not have paid those additional claims out of the part which had been made a saving?—On the contrary, when the Treasury declares a saving, the Audit-office asks me whether that saving is so dealt with at the Exchequer as to prevent its being drawn upon at any future time; and I report that it is so written in my books, that it would be impossible for me to draw that money which had been saved, say upon the Navy, for any payments of the Navy services that were then claimed; but it would be ways and means for any new voted service, and you could apply it.

2885. Sir James Graham.] To illustrate that, 60,000 l. savings from the Civil Contingencies have been lately paid into the Exchequer?—Such payment is expected, but not yet made.

2886. It would be impossible to operate upon those savings for Civil Contingencies, would it not, without a fresh vote of Parliament?—Quite so. I should have satisfied the Royal order which was sent to me, and I could not have issued again except under a new Royal order; and if it recited the old vote of the House of Commons, I should find that the purposes of the old vote had been already satisfied by the issue of the saving.

2887. But the 60,000 l. lately paid back into the Exchequer are available as Ways and Means for any payments out of the Consolidated Fund, sanctioned by Parliament?—When it is paid back, it would, though it has not been paid back yet.

2888. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Am I correct in understanding the effect of this memorandum to be, that you consider the daily practice according to which the business of the Paymaster's office is transacted, to be inconsistent with any effective Exchequer control?—I consider the Exchequer Act to be consistent with the due execution of all the functions of a Pay-office. Every issue that takes place from the Exchequer I take upon myself to say, without the hazard of a doubt, now takes place in the strictest manner according to law. What I complain of is, that the money which is issued according to law is applied contrary to law; and this is therefore inconsistent, as well as illegal, unless the Committee and Parliament assume that the Exchequer Act is a mere farce regulating the issue, but not directing the future application.

2889. Supposing the existing practice of the Pay-office were legalised, is it your opinion that the Exchequer control would become nugatory?—No, I have already stated that it would not if it were legalised after a systematic manner, as suggested in the previous questions. If it was stated that there was a certain discretion given for a day, or a day or two, and that the accounts were afterwards in 48 hours to be made up according to law, if Parliament chose to make that enactment, that would be perfectly consistent with the present system of Exchequer control, but I think it would be an unwise enactment.

2890. With regard to paragraphs 3 and 4, you state, "That in cases where such unauthorised payments are made, and the Exchequer authority is subsequently received, a rectification or adjustment of account takes place, and the proper vote is charged with a payment made anteriorly, and without authority; that under this system payments are made first without authority, and at a subsequent time the authority is obtained, without which it is impossible that such payments should legally be made;" to what practice do you refer with regard to the adjustment of accounts in this paragraph?—What I mean by that is, that which I believe the practice to be, that money is applied, we will say in 1835, to purposes for which it was not intended by Parliament, and in the year 1836 a rectification takes place, or at the end of the month, and at a future period that account, which has been so drawn upon illegally, receives back from the other account possibly an equally illegal amount which had been previously taken from the first account; therefore you have two systems of account, the one right in point of time, but wrong in point of law, and the other right in point of law, but wrong in point of time. It is the essence of every account that it should contain a statement of the real transaction entered at the time when that transaction takes place; the system of advance, and subsequent rectification renders, first, double accounts, as it seems to me, absolutely necessary, and next, accounts which are contradictory either to law or fact.

2891. Is not the present system of double accounts rendered necessary by the Exchequer; is not the payment at present or the Exchequer credit a fiction?—I cannot understand a transfer carrying with it the power of drawing and using money to be a fiction; on the contrary, Parliament answers the question for me, for Parliament declares and enacts that the public accounts shall be made out according to the payments into the Exchequer, and the issues out of the Exchequer, and that there shall be an annual account, and in that account Parliament deals with all those transfers and credits as payments.

2892. Are not payments by the Paymaster, and payments out of the Exchequer, two totally different things?—I think they are; the latter are legal, and the former illegal.

2893. If we compare a legal payment by the Paymaster, and a legal payment out of the Exchequer, are they not in their nature two totally different operations; is not one a mere transfer of account; whereas in the other money actually passes?—No doubt of it; the one is an account of distribution, and the other is an account of appropriation.

2894. Do you think it objectionable that an account should be kept of that substantial operation of the Pay-office, which consists in the actual payment of money?—I certainly do. If that is kept, it ought exactly to tally and coincide with that from which it now differs, namely, the authorisation given by my credits. The one will be a check upon the other; whereas, if I am to grant credits according to the Appropriation Act, and the Paymaster is to spend according to his discretion, it is quite clear that the one account can never be a check upon the other.

2895. Did not you say that you had no objection to the Paymaster keeping a drawing account with a single balance?—I think it is very possible that such system may be perfectly realised unconnected with any abandonment of the principle of appropriation, but as, notwithstanding Mr. Anderson's invitation to me, I have not visited the Pay-office, or superintended their books and balances, I am unable to answer it with effect.

2896. Do you believe that it would be possible to reconcile such a system as that with the maintenance of the Exchequer credits, and yet to keep only one account?—I believe that it would be perfectly so. I believe, with the ability that I have at my own command in my own office, men of the highest possible character and ability, and of large experience, who were selected exclusively from their past services, I should be able, if I had access to the Paymaster's office, to answer that question more strictly.

2897. The fifth paragraph is, "That Army, Navy, and Ordnance Funds may thus be used interchangeably, contrary to the express provisions in the Appropriation Acts, trusting to a subsequent rectification of accounts which shall give a legal semblance to what had previously been an illegal Act." Is this your meaning, that it is competent to the Paymaster, under the present system, to appropriate to either of those branches of expenditure a sum in excess of the votes?—I believe if he is called upon by a Navy requisition, or an Army requisition, to pay for Navy or Army purposes, if at that time he had a balance of the vote for the Duke of Wellington's funeral, and no Army or Navy monies, it would be open to him to apply that money intended for the Duke of Wellington's funeral to the purposes of the Navy, trusting to subsequent rectification. This is admitted in the fullest manner by Mr. Anderson, Question 1096, to which I beg to refer. With regard to an assertion in Sir Charles Trevelyan's memorandum, which suggests that Lord Grenville, in the case of the Russian-Dutch Loan, had given way to the authority of the Government, I have copies of the original papers now in my possession, showing that it was to the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown that Lord Grenville deferred, abandoning his first impressions. These papers I will, with the permission of the Committee, hand in—(the same were delivered in.) I also beg leave to hand in a paper, showing the original Treasury Minute of the 22d of December 1848, with regard to the issue of Exchequer credits; and also showing the Minute, as amended, in consequence of my letter of the 16th of January 1849.

MINUTE,

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

26 June 1856.

MINUTE, 22 December 1848, and Amendments made thereon, in consequence of the Letters from the Exchequer.

ORIGINAL MINUTE.

§ 4. THE course to be followed preparatory to the issue of credits on the Exchequer in favour of the Paymaster-general is pointed out in their Lordships' Minute of the 26th September 1834, for the regulation of the Office of the Receipt of Her Majesty's Exchequer.

§ 6. The Exchequer credits to the Paymaster-general will be granted on special applications, to be made by him to their Lordships.

§ 7. By the 11th section of the Act 4 Will. 4, cap. 15, Royal Orders are required to empower the Lords of the Treasury to direct the Comptroller-general of the Exchequer to grant credits for the various services voted by Parliament, upon which Treasury Warrants and Letters are founded, as required by the 12th section of the same Act. Issues charged on the Consolidated Fund are made upon Treasury Warrants, without Royal Orders, as authorised by the 13th section of the Act.

§ 8. These regulations will continue to be strictly observed; and no other alteration appears to their Lordships to be necessary in the Orders heretofore issued than to grant to the Paymaster-general the credits which have hitherto been granted to the Paymaster of Civil Services, and to the Paymasters of Exchequer Bills.

Papers, P. 90.

Compare Trevelyan's Minute, 1848, P. 60, p. 12, 13.

MINUTE Amended in consequence of Lord Monteagle's Letter of the 16th January 1849.

§ 4. THE course to be followed preparatory to the issue of credits on the Exchequer in favour of the Paymaster-general is pointed out by the 4th Will. 4, cap. 15, for the regulation of the Exchequer, and in their Lordships' Minute of the 26th September 1834, issued in pursuance thereof.

§ 6. The directions for Exchequer credits to the Paymaster-general will be founded on special applications, to be made by him to their Lordships.

§ 7. By the 11th section of the Act 4 Will. 4, cap. 15, Royal Orders are required to empower the Lords of the Treasury to direct the Comptroller-general of the Exchequer to grant credits for the various services voted by Parliament, upon which Treasury Warrants and Letters are founded, as required by the 12th section of the same Act. Issues charged on the Consolidated Fund are made by credits given upon Treasury Warrants, but without Royal Orders, as authorised by the 13th section of the Act.

§ 8. These regulations will continue to be strictly observed; and the only alteration which appears to their Lordships to be necessary in the Orders heretofore in force is, that the credits which have hitherto been granted to the Paymaster of Civil Services, and to the Paymasters of Exchequer Bills, shall for the future be granted to the Paymaster-general.

FURTHER Addition made in consequence of Lord Monteagle's Letter.

" WHILE by these arrangements the con" stitutional check exercised by the Comp" troller-general of the Exchequer on the " issue of the public money under the 4th
" & 5th Will. 4, cap. 15, will in all respects
" be maintained, the regulations which their " Lordships prescribe for the Paymaster-
" general's Office will afford this Board a
" FURTHER control over the expenditure in " detail, which will enable their Lordships to " ensure that no payment is made on the " order of any Department beyond the " amount of the specific grant of Parlia" ment legally applicable hereto."

THE RIGHT HON. SIR FRANCIS T. BARING, BART., IN THE CHAIR.

The Right Honourable the Lord Monteagle of Brandon, further Examined.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

2898. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] AT the close of your last day's evidence your Lordship was proceeding to explain your meaning in reference to the fifth paragraph in page 96 of the memorandum, respecting the power of using, interchangeably, the funds of the Army, Navy, and Ordnance; will you now complete your explanation?—My explanation is that such a practice of using those funds, interchangeably, seems to be avowed, but I can at once explain what I meant by that by referring to the evidence which is already before the Committee. I think it is stated clearly by Sir Charles Trevelyan, by Mr. Anderson, and also, though in a more qualified manner, but coming to the same result, by Mr. Hoffay, that the money which is passed into the drawing account is used for any services which may require an advance. I have already referred to a statement of Sir Charles Trevelyan, in which he speaks of that as being the ordinary and daily practice. "The Paymaster habitually uses money belonging to one head of service in making advances for another head of service in the ordinary transaction of the daily business." I refer also to Mr. Anderson's Answer to Question 1074, in which he says, "The money issued for one service may, as a matter of necessity, be paid for another; therefore," he says, "the check is not with the Comptroller, but really with the Paymaster." He says in answer to Question 1077, that they issue from the drawing account monies for any service for which they have not Exchequer credits. But then, at 1079, when this question was put still more pointedly, "Supposing there are miscellaneous votes unprovided for, would you, if called on, and having a credit only for Army, Navy, and Ordnance, from those services issue for miscellaneous services?" The answer is, "There is no distinction in the cash at the Bank." In Question 1081, the statement is carried further; he is asked, "Did it ever accidentally happen to you to issue in cases where there was no vote of Parliament?" The answer is, "The anticipation of votes of Parliament is a great question." Finally, comes the conclusive question, "I ask you the fact?" and the answer is, "It no doubt has happened, and does happen every year, when Parliament fails to make provision in due time for the public services." In dealing with a supposed case of excess of Navy Votes, Mr. Hoffay is asked, "You could not return it into the Exchequer?" and he replies, "No; but I might apply it to other services." (2489.)

2899. Leaving out of view, at present, the anticipation of votes which is admitted to be an irregularity, and taking the ordinary daily practice of the Pay-office, is it your opinion that the appropriation to the several purposes of the Army and Navy, out of the common balance in the drawing account, is a departure from the existing law?—Unquestionably, as in this case.

2900. Do you think that there ought to be a separate drawing account kept for each of the great services?—I stated that there were two questions which required required to be kept separate. There may be, by law, as I have taken the liberty of suggesting, a general account equivalent to the drawing account, provided that the monies paid into that drawing account are kept as they ought to be kept, under the head of the separate services, and provided the amount which stands to that drawing account and legally applicable to the particular service requiring an issue, be not exceeded, I see no difficulty whatever in this, or at least no difficulty but one that might be surmounted by half a day's consideration, and the law be maintained.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

2901. According to that plan of keeping the accounts, you think that the public would have the benefit of a single drawing account?—I think that the public may have that benefit; but I have already stated that I cannot deny that such benefit would be purchased by somewhat of an increase of the balances, but I again repeat that such increase of balance is as nothing in comparison with the maintenance of the principle of appropriation, on which depends the preservation of the dearest privileges of the Commons of England, and the liberties of the people.

2902. How would you deal with the question of imprest accounts; take the case of the late war, in which there was a necessity for keeping a large commissariat chest at Constantinople for the army and navy, how would you deal with that case?—I would deal with that case in this way; In the first place, the Committee will recollect that I have told them with respect to the interior mechanism of the Paymaster's office, I am perfectly ignorant; I only know it from inferences drawn; but I would say that the case put would be dealt with with peculiar facility in the case of the late war, seeing that two large sums of 3,000,000 l. each were voted without appropriation, to enable the Government to get through the difficulties before them. A further unappropriated sum of two or four millions is likely to be granted in the present Session. If you ask me further, I should say that it might be met as well as in the Duke of Wellington's wars, when there were three separate Paymasters, and there could be no such proceedings between Somerset House, Whitehall, and the Ordnance, as there are now under the present system, with its unauthorised advances and its rectifications or adjustments of account.

2903. During the Duke of Wellington's wars, was the navy drawing upon the commissariat chest as well as the army?—I presume for certain purposes, the navy might have drawn, but the Right honourable Member will know that I cannot be conversant with the proceedings in that war. At the present time, I presume, navy services are occasionally paid out of the commissariat chest fund. But that is a fund for extraordinary payments.

2904. Was not the system of army extraordinaries at that time carried very far, so as practically to defeat any system of separate appropriation?—The system of army extraordinaries, I believe, was never carried further than it was carried wisely and judiciously at the suggestion of Mr. Gladstone, when the three millions voted during each of two successive years, and the whole commissariat chest was available then as the Army Extraordinary Account had been available previously during the wars of the Duke.

2905. Generally, do you believe that your principles of a strict and specific appropriation in the Pay-office can be carried into effect in all the commissariat chests on all foreign stations all over the world, either during peace or during war?—I think it very possible that, in respect to foreign stations, there may be a necessity for obtaining advances from the military chests upon those stations, and which advances are limited and justifiable only from the necessity of the case, and which, even if admitted to the utmost extent as relating to the peculiar services on foreign stations, offers no justification whatever for a violation of the law, and which I contend takes place now habitually from day to day, at home as well as abroad. Besides, advances from the commissariat chest prove but little, it being an extraordinary fund of the nature of that for civil contingencies.

2906. Do you believe that the present Exchequer Act was ever strictly carried into effect from the time of its passing, with regard to the Army and Navy Services, according to the principles which you recommend?—In the first place, I can state that from the passing of the Exchequer Act up to the time that I resigned the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer, I never received from the Exchequer any one intimation of a violation of that Act. I say further, that I never directly or indirectly gave countenance to the possible application of the Army Vote going to navy purposes, or the Navy Vote going to ordnance purposes, during the whole of that time, nor do I believe that ever such a transaction was sanctioned; but if I am asked whether, if on a foreign station, a ship required repairs, or some accidental circumstance of that description took place, it was not carried into effect at that foreign station out of the military chest, or whatever resources were available, I am sure that it did take place, and it ought to take place, it is impossible that that can be provided for absolutely; and if that advance was made from the military chest it would at once appear upon the drafts of the Commissaries, and it would be repaid from the service that had received the benefit of what was done.

2907. You are aware that according to the present system of managing the Pay-office, the Paymaster-general is required to issue from one balance, but never to issue money for any purpose which is not sanctioned by a vote of Parliament with reference to the army and navy?—If that be the order it is disobeyed.

2908. Can you show without reference to the technical mode of keeping the accounts, but in substance, according to the present practice, that money is ever appropriated to the army and navy in excess of the vote of Parliament?—I have no means of showing that, nor do I apprehend that that is ultimately the case; but I have stated that what I object to, is doing an illegal act to be remedied by subsequent rectification; I have no doubt before it comes to an end that that which has been illegal may be made legal by rectification; but that is not the law of the land.

2909. The question is whether your construction of one clause in the Exchequer Act is correct; if it be, there may be a doubt as to the practice of the Pay-office; but the object of my question was to ascertain whether, according to your view, there is any thing in the practice of the Pay-office which would sanction the application of the public monies to any purpose for the service of the army and navy in excess of the vote of Parliament?—I conceive that the practice of the Pay-office, as it has been stated, does show that there prevails a system of applying money without a vote of Parliament, which is the strongest case of excess that can be put. It shows also that the practice of the Pay-office allows the payment of money without the authorisation which Parliament itself has established as a condition precedent for those payments. It shows also that this system of illegal payments is presumed to be set right by subsequent adjustment. When a system prevails which has allowed the application of 25,000*l.* of the vote for the Duke of Wellington's funeral to other purposes than those voted by Parliament, this misapplication continuing for years, and being at length only discovered in debate, I cannot help thinking that this is a system which admits of payment and appropriation of public money without Parliamentary authority or in excess of the Parliamentary vote.

2910. Assuming that this sum was appropriated from the Miscellaneous Estimates, can you show that that 25,000*l.* or any other 25,000*l.*, or any sum whatever can, according to the present system, be appropriated in excess of the vote of Parliament to the Army or Navy Estimates?—I have no doubt that the system admits (which is not denied) of the application of the army money to purposes, and of navy money to army purposes; and that practice is justified by the suggestion of having at the time no army or navy grant to apply to those specially appropriated purposes. In every one of those cases I consider that there is an application in excess of the authorised sum, because the Right Honourable Gentleman will see that a vote of the House of Commons, however efficient and powerful it is in one sense, does not justify the application of one farthing until a Royal order has been obtained, a Treasury warrant issued, the legality of the one and the other ascertained, and an Exchequer warrant issued ordering that expenditure. Without those conditions, all payments are illegal, and therefore an excess, if not of the Parliamentary vote, yet of the Parliamentary authority, but it may also be, at least for a time, in excess of the vote. Such was Seymour's case; he was impeached, not for having given, but having lent navy funds to army purposes. Even if that had ultimately been adjusted or rectified, the offence would have been the same.

2911. Your Lordship's doctrine is, that money in the Paymaster's office, on the drawing account, has its earmark, and that it must be appropriated to the purpose purpose for which it is designated in the Exchequer credit; but can you show that, according to the present system, if the vote for the army is, for example, 6,000,000 l., that practice permits the appropriation of the monies voted for the navy, to the extent of six millions and a-half or seven millions?—It gives facilities for such a practice; and if the Paymaster-general's accounts are well inspected, with a view to tracing the transactions from day to day, and above all, at the commencement of every quarter, the Committee and the House of Commons will then have the means of discovering whether irregularities of that character, and to that extent, prevail.*

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

30 June 1856.

2912. You state that it gives facilities for such a practice: are you prepared to state that if the present instructions are strictly carried into effect, such a practice can possibly exist?—If the question is confined to the state of the army and navy account every day in the year, I have no doubt that such instances occur; but if you select your own point of comparison, and select the time when the previous errors have been rectified by the adjustment of accounts, then I believe you will find that everything is ultimately brought straight. Mr. Hoffay, the Acting Paymaster-general, only states (Question 2451), that as a rule, this is never done.

2913. Can you give any proof whatever of your suspicion, that at certain times these irregularities do occur, that is to say, that money is appropriated by the Paymaster-general in excess of the vote for the army or navy, without reference to the origin of the issue, but simply looking to its destination?—Most assuredly I cannot give an account of the Paymaster's office in his issues of 50,000,000 l. in any one year, when I have never had recourse to his department at all.

2914. When you state your belief or suspicion, can you lay before the Committee any grounds upon which that suspicion rests?—I lay the ground upon this principle, that it is admitted that the navy money is appropriated for army purposes, and army money is appropriated for navy purposes, without any legal warrant for so doing, and admitted that issues are habitually made in an unauthorised manner; I rest on the statements and arguments contained in my memorandum, and still more on the evidence taken before this Committee.

2915. In paragraph 6, you state, "That in like manner the civil services may be made interchangeable within themselves, or may be made applicable to the three great services, or to the payment of charges on the Consolidated Fund, before the payment for such charges have received a legal sanction." Is your Lordship's meaning in this paragraph similar to your meaning in the previous one?—I wished to describe what I believe will take place to-morrow morning, that long before there has been any authorisation to pay charges upon the Consolidated Fund out of other funds, at the command of the Paymaster-general, those payments will be made without authority and without law.

2916. What is your meaning in these words, "Before the payment for such charges have received a legal sanction;" what do you consider to be a legal sanction for the payment of charges upon the Consolidated Fund made by Act of Parliament?—There is first the Act of Parliament which I presume to exist, but no payment can be made solely by force of that, unless the law be in all respects complied with. There must be ministerial responsibility expressed by a Treasury warrant, and that Treasury warrant must be submitted to the Comptroller of the Exchequer, and he must ascertain its legality, and do as he had not unfrequently to do, exclude charges to which he objects on the ground of their illegality. He must then grant a credit, and upon that credit the issue may be legally made, but not otherwise, and the consequence of a want of prudent adherence to this has been, that I have known instances of payments made of sums to which I took exception on legal grounds. I have myself known payments made by the Paymaster in anticipation.

2917. What is the present practice to which you object, with respect to payments out of the Consolidated Fund?—I will tell you in one word: it is to payments made without lawful authority. In endeavouring to accomplish a rightful rightful object, one that was perfectly legitimate, to save the trouble to the Treasury of copying out twice over very long accounts, a most unfortunate mistake was made. It is the duty of the Treasury, if they wish to get a prompt payment, to lay before the Comptroller-general the documents upon which alone he is entitled to issue his credit. That was done by transmitting to me, a day or two before the quarter-day, the draft account of charge. It was then considered, its accuracy ascertained, and the payments were ready to be made on receipt of the issuing warrants; not as described by one of the witnesses, but as described in the correspondence between the Treasury and the Exchequer, which is now before the Committee. By laying these warrants in time before the Comptroller-general you obtain your credit upon the quarter-day, and you are put in funds consequently to make your payment legally after its legality has been ascertained; that is not done; the original warrant is altogether withheld; the issuing warrants are not furnished in time for the inspection, and the payment is made without any authority whatever, and is made out of funds which are in nowise by law appropriated for such service.

* The army vote of 6,000,000 l. would not be taken in one sum, nor on one night; and with one-half of that sum voted, it might be of great convenience to a Government to have a power of applying it to purposes not then voted. Mr. Hoffay refers to a case in which this was done (Question 2451), which the witness accounts for in consequence of the peculiarity of the occasion.

2918. But there is a general Treasury warrant for all those Consolidated Fund charges, is there not?—There was, but that has been suppressed; and then there comes the special warrants, and there is no objection to the suppression of the general warrant if the special issuing warrants, which are the effective warrants, were sent in time, but those are not sent in time; the Treasury nevertheless make payments as if the warrants had been submitted to the Exchequer, and sanctioned, as if they had been put forward legally, and as if the Exchequer credit had been granted; all those issues are made in anticipation of the legal authorities, and are made contrary to law.

2919. You stated that there ought to be a general warrant before a special warrant, did you not?—No, on the contrary. I have just stated the reverse; it was an old habit, and the Treasury complained of it as a matter of burthen and trouble to themselves, though its omission was putting an end to a practice which had been invariably known from the year 1817, on the establishment of the deficiency bill system; it was discontinued in 1854, and for the first time, I think, and the Treasury did right if they had then substituted the real issuing warrants, but they did not send them; they did not come in time to be inspected and controlled; they are never delayed a day with me, unless there is any fault or irregularity to be repressed; by not furnishing those warrants, yet in making the payments which the credits issued under these warrants can alone legalise, they act in anticipation of the lawful authority, and they pay money out of money not appropriated for the purpose.

2920. Your complaint is, that the Treasury give authority for charges upon the Consolidated Fund before the issuing warrants have been examined at the Exchequer?—Yes, before the credit upon which alone such payments can take place legally has been issued.

2921. How do you propose that that practice should be amended?—I took the liberty of laying down, at the request of the Treasury itself, a mode of doing it which is as simple as the most common operation of Treasury practice; it is, that the issuing warrant should be submitted for examination and approval, and the credit issued before the actual payments take place; that could be done quickly and without the slightest difficulty, and I had every reason to expect it would be done, but it is not adopted, and the illegal practice is persevered in.

2922. You referred before to the case of Mr. Mahoney, and stated that money had been issued for a deceased officer, and that you had corrected the error; will you refer to the correspondence in which that case is explained, at page 40, No. 13; does not it appear from that correspondence that the practice of the Treasury was correct in issuing the money for this person until that department had received a proof of his death, which was not given until the 30th of May 1850?—I take this willingly as a test as to how far the practice is correct or not. In the month of January the Treasury returned upon their warrant a statement that Mr. Mahoney was dead; therefore there was no doubt about the fact, or that it was anterior to that date, yet in the month of April the same Board of Treasury returned their warrant, reporting that Mr. Mahoney was alive, and directing me to pay a quarter's salary for a gentleman who, three months before, they had informed me was dead. I declined doing so, as that was not the regular practice.

2923. How does that appear?—It appears in the very evidence before you.

30 June 1856.

2924. Mr. Williams.] Was Mr. Mahoney alive?—No, he was dead.

2925. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] The practice of the Treasury is, that a person is kept on the schedule of salaries until he is legally proved to be dead, but the Paymaster does not issue the money until an application is made by the persons legally authorised to receive the salary. Can you show that any inconvenience arises from the present system, or that it is desirable that the Treasury should act upon mere rumour in striking persons off the schedule?—Not on mere rumour; but that cannot be considered to be the case in this instance. There are other cases, but there is a case in which the Treasury placed a charge on the Consolidated Fund for the late Lord Shannon and Lord Manners, whom I knew to be dead; but I could not act upon my own knowledge. I reported to the Treasury that Lord Shannon's death was a matter, not of newspaper notoriety, but of proof, because his son, the present Earl, had applied to the House of Lords, and had established his right of voting, thereby proving that his father was dead; and the Treasury, notwithstanding this, put the charge upon the Consolidated Fund. The cases of the late Lord Manners, of Chief Baron Alexander, and of Judge Littledale may also be referred to. Nevertheless I admit that there are difficulties as to this part of the case, but I suggested a remedy to the Treasury, which the Treasury adopted; and I believe, if the Treasury adhere to it, that it will be a sufficient remedy. Although in the case of persons of high rank and consideration the Treasury may be aware of their death, there are many cases in which, if you take salaries or retired allowance as examples, deaths may not be known, and the check can only come in subsequently; but inasmuch as all those cases, if put on the Consolidated Fund, may create the power of paying a larger sum than that which may eventually become payable, I ventured to recommend to the Treasury that there should be a quarterly return made to the Exchequer of all sums not issued by reason of the death of the parties, between quarter-day and quarter-day, and that those sums should be returned to the Exchequer. If this is adhered to it affords a clear remedy, and that suggestion of my own was adopted and ordered to be carried into effect by a former Board at the Treasury.

2926. With regard to the case of Mr. Mahoney, it appears from the Report of Mr. Chalmers, the Deputy Paymaster of Civil Services in Dublin, that it was not till the 30th of April that the precise date of the late Mr. Mahoney's death was ascertained, namely, the 21st of July 1850, when the widow, his administratrix, was authorised to draw a bill for 32 l. 2 s. 4 d. for the salary of the deceased; would it have been possible for the Treasury, before they knew the precise date of Mr. Mahoney's death, to authorise the Paymaster to issue any definite sum to him?—It would have been quite open to the department, when they themselves had been so well aware of Mr. Mahoney's death in January as to have struck him off the list, and then declared him not entitled to any portion of the January quarter, to be aware that in the April quarter the same Mr. Mahoney could not by any possibility be alive and entitled to any pay whatever.

2927. At all events this was no error on the part of the Treasury, but it was done in accordance with their habitual rule, the established rule being to keep every name upon the schedule until there is legal evidence of the death tendered; under these circumstances, does it appear to you that it can be stated with correctness that this case of Mr. Mahoney was owing to an oversight?—I know not from what it arose, but the department knew of his death in January, and yet they directed me to pay him a quarter's salary in the subsequent April quarter.

2928. Would that direction have enabled any person to obtain Mr. Mahoney's salary without due authority?—Clearly not.

2929. Is not the material question the payments in the Paymaster's office; is not that the transaction in which the money really passes?—That question has been put to me more than once. I should not be called on to make a transfer, unless there could have been legally a consequent payment. I am at a loss to conceive how, with any reference to our mode of keeping public accounts, separation can be made between the transfer and the payment; every transfer on credit is a payment in the sense of the public service of the Exchequer.

2930. In this case was not a correct payment made to Mr. Mahoney's representatives?—I have no reason to doubt or affirm; but I know the charge was put upon the Consolidated Fund on behalf of the dead man.

2931. Does not Mr. Chalmers, the Deputy Paymaster of Civil Services in Dublin,

Dublin, state in his official report, that when the precise date of Mr. Mahoney's death was ascertained, the widow was authorised to draw a bill for 32 l. 2 s. 4 d. for the salary of the deceased up to that date, and have you any reason to believe that that was not the correct balance of the salary?—I have every certainty that it was not paid out of that fund, unless paid illegally; it was put upon the Consolidated Fund for April; it could not by any possibility have been applied to any arrear due before a death anterior to January; this would be the application of an irregular argument to defend an irregular payment. The sums put upon the Consolidated Fund in April would not have been applicable by law to the payment of the salary of a man who died before January; it might have been paid out of some previous balance which might be due to Mr. Mahoney, and rightly paid. But the Committee will recollect that I only alluded to this case to show the exercise of the control of the Exchequer; it is not as attributing blame to Mr. Chalmers, who is a most excellent officer.

2932. Is it your meaning that the error consisted in this: that the right sum was paid to the right person out of the wrong balance?—No; what I attribute as an error is, that in that warrant upon the Consolidated Fund, the charge was put to pay the salary of the dead man who was not entitled to receive it. I refer to this to show that this branch of the service requires control.

2933. Did the representatives of the dead man receive any sum which they were not entitled to receive?—I reported the case, and stopped the money, and they could not receive it consequently out of that money.

2934. If you had not reported the case, would the representatives have received anything which they were not entitled to receive?—I cannot say what might have happened under such circumstances.

2935. Does it not appear from the report of the Paymaster of Civil Services in Dublin, that he was perfectly cognisant of the case, and that he was only waiting for legal evidence of the exact day upon which Mr. Mahoney died?—I cannot comprehend how his death could be so present to all the authorities in January, that they struck him out absolutely off the list as dead, and in the month of April put on the same charge again on the ground of his being alive.

2936. Are there any other cases of irregular payments for charges upon the Consolidated Fund that you wish to mention?—There are many charges inserted in the Consolidated Fund which I have struck off, and in many cases I have suspended payment. One of those warrants is a warrant of many pages, filled up with a great number of names, and the sums directed to be paid subjoined to each. The Committee might wish to see one. Where I object to a single payment I suspend that payment until I am satisfied of its legality; the Treasury have been at issue with me on that subject of late, and they have denied my right to suspend the payment of any one of those charges that are put upon any of those warrants, however doubtful I may be of its legality; they have distinctly denied that right, and I distinctly affirm it; I act on that conviction, on the ground that without that power I should have no power of exercising my functions.

2937. Under paragraph 7 you state, "That issues to defray charges on the Consolidated Fund may be misapplied in the same manner." That paragraph has probably been illustrated by your Lordship's previous answers?—Yes, and by the examples given in the memorandum.

2938. Is there anything further that you wish to state upon that?—I think nothing more. I refer to the memorandum, by which I abide.

2939. The latter part refers, I presume, to the whole case, "That in this manner payments may be made: first, for services not voted by Parliament or sanctioned by statute." Will you have the kindness to state how it is possible, under the present system, that payments can be made for services not voted by Parliament and not sanctioned by statute?—It is stated by witnesses, officially cognisant of the transaction, that payments are so made in anticipation of votes; that is, payments without the sanction of Parliament.

2940. It is admitted that payments in anticipation of the vote is an irregularity which nothing but the necessity of the case can justify, but that is not a part of the habitual practice of Government, or of the Paymaster-general's office; can you point out that it is a part of the ordinary practice of the Paymaster's Office or of the Treasury, to make payments "for services not voted by Parliament or sanctioned by statute"?—I have no doubt that there are; and I have the greater confidence in believing that cases of that kind exist, from the answers which have been given; I refer to the evidence of Mr. Anderson and Mr. Hoffay. I took the liberty of proposing very respectfully to the Treasury in that memorandum, that a return should be called for of all those cases; that return I do not believe has been called for, but if it is called for, it is the Paymaster-general that would give you the information.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

2941. This is a positive statement made in your memorandum; but is it made without any evidence accessible to your Lordship to support the statement that payments may, according to the present practice, be made "for services not voted by Parliament or sanctioned by statute"?—Yes, I make it again, and it is supported by the evidence given before this Committee. Mr. Anderson states (1081), "the anticipation of votes is a great question;" and when pressed further (1082) in the words, "I ask you the fact," he replies conclusively, "It no doubt has happened, and does happen every year, when Parliament fails to make provision for the public service. I am convinced that that is the case, and I appeal to the accounts of the Paymaster to set me right if I am wrong; but the admission as to paying in anticipation of votes proves the fact in certain cases; how far those cases go depends upon facts which are not known to me, namely the cases to which the observation applies. It could not take place under any circumstances, if the provisions of the Exchequer Act were adhered to, or indeed if the provisions of the Appropriation Act itself were adhered to, but both are set aside.

2942. Are the Committee to understand that at present you are not prepared to produce any evidence in support of that assertion in the memorandum, that under the present system payments may be made "for services not voted by Parliament or sanctioned by statute"?—I produce distinctly and unequivocally the following evidence: Mr. Hoffay is asked, at Question 2445, whether payments are made "for services not voted by Parliament, or sanctioned by statute;" and his answer is, "If you mean those accounts that we hold, those monies which appertain to the departments, of course payments are made that are not voted by Parliament; otherwise my answer would be in the negative." I do not attach much importance to that answer, for I do not quite understand the meaning of the words, but he goes on further.

2943. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Does not Mr. Hoffay in that answer refer to such a case, for example, as the money that was advanced to the Turkish Government to be appropriated to certain purposes for the benefit of that Government, and therefore to monies not the property of the Government, but which were held as a matter of convenience by certain departments to make payments out of them?—I do not think that it would come under the definition of monies which appertained to the department. At Question 2447, Mr. Hoffay is asked, "Do you never advance for a service before a vote is taken?" and his answer is, "No; because I do not think that it has ever been necessary, so far as I recollect; of course, if Parliament were late, I do not know what would be done. I am not aware of any instance." At Question 2451, a more pressing question is put. "Has it not been done?" and his answer is, "As a rule it is not done; if the Committee wish me to recollect a case in which that has been done with regard to other departments, there is one case in which I believe the Ordnance ran short, and though a Supplemental Estimate was before the House, I think before that was passed we were obliged to carry on the Ordnance services with the Army grants." "That was a great service?—Yes; but in that particular year there was such an intermixture; it was the year in which they were blended with the Army department services." That is a case in which money was advanced without a Parliamentary vote, and when that was done it was out of monies appropriated to another service.

2944. With regard to payments made in anticipation of votes, the very term implies that it is a payment made without the authority of Parliament; and whenever any such advance has been made, it would clearly be an irregularity and an excess of power on the part of the Executive; but my question referred to this, whether in the ordinary course of business at the Paymaster's office, and when he conforms to the rules laid down for his guidance by the Treasury, it ever happens that payments are made "for services not voted by Parliament or sanctioned by statute"?—As to conformity to those rules, I can say nothing. Mr. Anderson says that the paymaster must receive the orders of the department to which the money belongs (Q. 1043).

2945. In this memorandum are you not describing the ordinary practice of the the Government, and do not you describe that the ordinary practice is contrary to the law?—I was describing the errors of the practice, but, much as I condemn that practice, I am far from suggesting that that which I ventured to state came under the definition given by the House of Commons itself, in Seymour's case, of an impeachable offence, could be the ordinary practice of the department. Mr. Hoffay seems to admit this distinction; he says it is not the rule to do this, thereby admitting that it is done, though not according to the rule. But again, the Committee and Parliament have it within their own power to follow up this investigation by investigating the actual purposes and authorities of the paymaster's issues.

2946. Does not Mr. Hoffay state, in the very answer that you read, that it is not done, and that it never has been done, except in a case that he thinks is a doubtful one, namely, in the year of transition from separate Ordnance Estimates to combined Ordnance Estimates, when he says, "he thinks it may have been done on account of the confusion and intermixture of accounts when a supplemental estimate was before Parliament;" and he gives an explanation of one case which, he thinks, may have occurred, but which, he states, is a case very rare, and almost a single exception?—Mr. Anderson states it more generally, without such modifications; he says "that it does happen every year when Parliament fails to make provision at due time for the public service." The Committee will have the goodness to recollect, that to meet the cases of anticipations of votes, the civil contingency vote, upon which 100,000 l. stood in credit, was capable of being applied, and that, in the days of the war, to which this applies, two votes, of 3,000,000 l. each, without appropriation, were granted for the express purpose of meeting such cases when coming within the scope of the vote, and this without breaking down the principle of Parliamentary appropriation.

2947. Is it your Lordship's statement, that with regard to the ordinary practice of the Paymaster's-office payments are made "for services not voted by Parliament or sanctioned by statute?"—I do not mean to say that in the ordinary every-day business that occurs; I have no means of affirming or denying that, but I prove that it occurs in certain instances, and I show that the system is open to its existence in others. But I find a stronger statement upon this subject in Mr. Anderson's evidence. At Question 1096 he is asked "Anticipating the demand on the army services a write off having been obtained from the Exchequer, an intermediate payment being required for the navy services, would you not consider yourselves justified in making such payment out of money which had been written off from the Exchequer for army services?" And the answer is, "Certainly."

2948. Does that imply that any payment is made in excess of the vote?—This is paid in anticipation of the vote.

2949. Is there anything to show that that payment is not made within the legal limits of the vote?—It says, "Anticipating the demand upon the army services."

2950. That is with regard to the balance?—Then this is a clear circumstance, as showing the misapplication of navy money for army services.

2951. Then at No. 2 you say that payments may be made "for services for which no ways and means have been provided, and which cannot, therefore, legally be defrayed." Will you show how it is that under the present system payments of that nature can be made, or are made?—Such payments have been demanded repeatedly to be made, and have been only stopped by the direct action of the Exchequer; I refer specially to the cases of 15 October 1841, 19 June 1852, 6 March 1855; but they are liable to occur in any case in which a payment is made without an Exchequer credit, for the Exchequer credit is the Parliamentary evidence to the Paymaster that ways and means have been provided for that vote, and all payments made consequently without that Exchequer credit are made without evidence of such fact, and that many such have been attempted, without ways and means at all, I have already shown the Committee.

2952. Is this your meaning, that those payments are made for services for which no Ways and Means Acts have passed?—Certainly. I have had demands made upon me for making payments for services for which no Ways and Means Acts were passed, and they were stopped by my own interposition. I can furnish a return of such cases, some of which occurred in Sir Robert Peel's Government, payments which I stopped, and I afterwards objected to in Lord Derby's Government,

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

30 June 1856.

Government, and of a series of payments that I objected to in the succeeding Governments.

2953. You refer to a case about the construction of the word "session" and the word "year," and the division of ways and means into two accounts instead of into one account?—That only applied to one of those cases, and however conclusive it is in matter of law upon that, in the other case there was no distinction, because there were no two sessions; in Lord Derby's Government there was an entire exhaustion of ways and means for the great services, and they then applied to me to issue some half a million for other services and there were no ways and means. I stopped that, and no paymaster could have stopped it, as I conceive. I also stopped issues on the same ground, under the present Government in 1855.

2954. Is there any correspondence on that subject?—Yes; it will be found in the papers before you.

2955. Is it your Lordship's statement that the Treasury then attempted to issue half a million of money without any Ways and Means Act?—It was a mistake made by them, by a departure from usage; the ways and means had been previously exhausted on the great services; application was made for an issue of miscellaneous votes, but no ways and means had been granted. There was a mistake made by the then Treasury; it is never usual to exhaust all the ways and means upon the great services; but in that case they went upon the unusual plan of exhausting all the ways and means upon the great services, and they applied then for issues upon the small services. There were no ways and means, and we were obliged to wait for an Act.

2956. Was it a technical error, or a substantial error?—It was a substantial error, the Treasury, though perhaps unconsciously, yet positively asking me to do that which was contrary to law. I stated that to the Government of the day, and they thanked me for it.

2957. Now the third manner in which you state that payments may be made is, "For services respecting which no Royal order, Treasury warrant, and issuing letter have ever issued, or if issued, have never been sanctioned by the Exchequer, as regular and conformable to law:" what class of cases do you refer to in that paragraph?—Every case that has been a payment without an Exchequer credit comes within that category; because the issue of an Exchequer credit, being founded upon the Royal order and the Treasury warrant, and being addressed to the Department, is an evidence that these, not forms as they have been somewhat hastily called, but legal and indispensable realities, have been carried into effect. But the Right Honourable Gentleman will have the goodness to perceive that in these questions he refers to my statement in the Exchequer memorandum, but he varies its terms in essentials, and assumes me to have stated absolutely what I stated as a possibility. I stated that under the system which I denounced as illegal, four classes of unauthorised payments may be made. This I repeat as describing the abuse of the system; I am showing that the abuse of the system may lead to those consequences; and I am now, with my present knowledge, able to say, that that which I described hypothetically as an evil possibly arising, is an evil actually existing, and that it has arisen, and that so far as it has been checked, it has been checked by the power of the Exchequer.

2958. What are the cases to which you refer, of payments made without credit standing at the Exchequer?—Every payment that goes out of the drawing account of the Paymaster for services not authorised by an Exchequer credit.

2959. Can you give an example of such a case?—I should again refer to the facts given in evidence; I cannot explain the Paymaster's account, to which I am not given access. Let the Committee call for a proper return and they will get possession of the fact. In the Exchequer memorandum, I suggested to the Treasury the accounts that might be called for.

2960. Can you give the Committee an example of your meaning when you wrote this paragraph as to the services to which you referred, when you said that payments might be made for services of that kind?—Yes, it may be done unquestionably, and I will prove that by what I have already stated, that if the Paymaster feels himself warranted, upon a demand from a department, to pay monies without an Exchequer credit, he does that without a Royal order, or without a Treasury warrant, or without an issuing letter, because every one of those documents is in my possession, and no such payment can be made; therefore the admission which has been made by Sir Charles Trevelyan, and by Mr.

Mr. Anderson (Questions 1578, 1579. 1077; Hoffay, 2437. 2439) in a still stronger manner, that payments are made every day without an Exchequer credit, proves that those payments are made without those legal instruments upon which an Exchequer credit issues, and of which it is the only evidence. No Royal order goes to the Bank of England or to the Paymaster; my authority goes, and upon that alone he is justified in paying.

2961. Can you give the Committee some example of a case in which payment is made without a Royal order, or a Treasury warrant, or an issuing letter?—I will supply that. I refer to every case in which he issues without an Exchequer credit, for that is the instrument can alone lawfully give authority to the order, warrant, or letters of issue. All these three documents remain in my hands, and are never sent forward to the Paymaster. He can only learn their completion by the Exchequer credit.

2963. You cannot mention any hypothetical case, or a class of cases?—I gave the Committee distinctly to understand that every payment that is made without an Exchequer warrant comes under this class; every one of them are paid without a Royal order and without a Treasury warrant, because the Royal order and the Treasury warrants are of none effect under the Act of Parliament until they have been sanctioned, and are legally established, by the Comptroller-general of the Exchequer, and the instant that they are so established my credit goes, and those payments are said to be duly made.

2964. With regard to the fourth head, you state that payments may be made "for services for which no Exchequer warrant to the Bank of England has issued, directing a credit to the Paymaster for this particular service, or head of service"?—Yes.

2965. How will you exemplify that?—I think I can exemplify that by the statement of Mr. Anderson; he was asked, at Question 1069, "You mean that you pay money to the department, which has a credit with the Exchequer, although the Comptroller of the Exchequer has not given his sanction to any money passing into your hands?" His answer is, "Precisely; there is no other course that can be adopted. It is a visionary scheme to suppose that the system of the Exchequer credits could be carried out as laid down in that Act." Other parts of the evidence go much farther.

2966. Sir Henry Willoughby.] Do not you state in your memorandum that those four classes of cases to which you allude may occur; not that they are general rules of action, but that such cases may occur?—The words are as clear to that effect as possible. "In this manner payments may be made: 1. For services not voted by Parliament or sanctioned by statute. 2. For services for which no ways and means have been provided, and which cannot therefore legally be defrayed. 3. For services respecting which no Royal order, Treasury warrant, and issuing letter have ever issued; or if issued have never been sanctioned by the Exchequer as regular and conformable to law. 4. For services for which no Exchequer warrant to the Bank of England has issued, directing a credit to the Paymaster for this particular service or head of service." I never dreamt of saying that it was the general principle, but I stated that it was a vicious system under which such payments may be made.

2967. Do not those words, "that such payments may be made," immediately precede the four classes of cases to which you allude?—Those words precede evidently and govern them, and nothing but the greatest misapprehension could give any meaning to my memorandum larger than that which those words imply.

2968. Mr. Cardwell.] So long as the drawing account and the bill account are fed from any other source than the Exchequer, so long the objections to which you have pointed will continue to exist?—Precisely so; it was to that feeding from those sources that I objected as one of the great sources of irregularity.

2969. Your objection amounts to this, that there is always a liability to a departure by the Executive Government from the appropriation ordered by Parliament?—That liability must exist as long as that system continues, and will be increased in proportion as the number of those payments to the cash accounts are augmented, and above all in proportion to the length of time in which monies paid into the drawing account are kept in the hands of the Paymaster in place of being appropriated strictly according to the law.

 2970. Without

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

30 June 1856.

2970. Without attributing blame to any particular Government, it is your Lordship's opinion that there should be Parliamentary control, and not merely ministerial responsibility?—That is the whole effect of my observations; my observations are, I hope the Committee feel, not directed against any particular Government; my course has been the same with all.

2971. Mr. Williams.] Your Lordship has made reference to a vote of credit, to the amount of 3,000,000 l. on two occasions: how is that expenditure brought to the cognizance of Parliament?—I cannot take upon myself to say how the expenditure of that sum is brought before Parliament other than in the finance accounts, or by special motion. It will be brought under the cognizance of the auditors, and in the new reports of the auditors, for which we are indebted to Sir James Graham's clause, it may, and I think must be noticed in that way; but those two votes took place during two years of war, and I am not sufficiently conversant with House of Commons' proceedings to say how far any special account of that distribution has yet taken place.

2972. Did that pass at all through the Exchequer like other votes?—The money passed of course into the Exchequer, and I had to issue it, but I had to issue in the absence of any appropriation except that which Parliament had itself introduced into the Appropriation Act. It was applicable generally to the war, and intended to be so applicable, and the war could not have been carried on efficiently if a fund of that kind, free and detached from the ordinary rules of appropriation, had not been placed in the hands of the Government.

2973. Was the appropriation stated in the orders that were issued for its expenditure through your department?—In my department I cannot move except upon a statement of the exact vote of Parliament. I issue for the purpose of that vote in the same terms that the vote is given; in those terms do I make my issue, and under the Exchequer Act the parties receiving that money are bound to apply that money to such services; that is the proceeding, and that is the distinct provision of the law.

2974. In the case of a vote of credit no particulars as to the application of that vote are given to your department?—No, not as to the issue of it; but that does not free the Government from the necessity which I am sure is regularly observed of accounting for it; an extraordinary vote is not to allow the Government to issue that money without responsibility; they are responsible for it, and I am sure they can give a right account of it.

2975. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Was not that vote appropriated to the service of the war, and could it have been legally applied by Government to any of the miscellaneous civil services?—I conceive not; the civil contingencies are specially applicable to the latter purposes.

2976. Was not it in fact this, a vote in aid of the Army and Navy Estimates?—The words of the Appropriation Act are, "Out of all or any the aids or supplies aforesaid there shall and may be issued and applied any sum or sums of money, not exceeding 3,000,000 l., to enable Her Majesty to provide for any additional expense which may arise in consequence of the war in which Her Majesty is now engaged against the Emperor of all the Russias;" therefore I do not consider that simply in aid of the Army or Navy Estimates. I think that the discretion is wider, and I think that so it ought to be; there is no knowing for what service it may have been required in the Crimea; and I think any man, or set of men, would have been over fastidious if they had argued that it was confined to the army and navy estimates.

2977. Sir James Graham.] Are those the words of the Appropriation Act?—Yes, they are.

2978. Under those words, if the Government had thought fit to give 300,000 l. for the relief of Kars, it would have been quite open to them to have done it?—Yes; or to pay any foreign contingent which had never been voted, if it was in furtherance of the great contest that we were engaged in; it was not only abroad, but at home, that, I think, the vote was applicable, provided it was in furtherance of the war; to the Government were generously confided 6,000,000 l. sterling to expend as they thought fit for these purposes.

2979. Mr. Williams.] Then in point of fact, I understand your Lordship's opinion to be, that the two sums of 3,000,000 l. might be appropriated by Government to any purpose they thought proper?—Yes, they might be appropriated by Government to any purpose they thought proper, in consequence of the war.

2980. Sir Henry Willoughby.] When will the account of the expenditure of that that money appear?—I do not know, except that it appears from the evidence of those who have referred, as I do with great respect, to the proceedings of the Audit-office, that probably the returns will not be made for a year and eight months.

2981. Will it appear in the finance accounts of the year?—The issues will appear, no doubt, as money issued in my Exchequer account, and in the finance accounts it will appear likewise.

2982. The finance accounts for the present year have not yet been issued to the Members?—No.

2983. On the 10th of June they were ordered to be printed, were they not?—Yes.

2984. And they have not yet been issued to Members?—No.

2985. Mr. Williams.] Your Lordship has stated that there have been instances of money being issued for the payment of the salaries of deceased persons; is there any account furnished to your Lordship of the amount of the salaries of the various officers, so that you can exercise a check to see that a larger amount is not paid than is assigned to them?—There is such an account furnished to me. By the invariable usage of the Treasury and of the Exchequer, it was the invariable practice, without exception, and until the last year, I think, or the year before, that whenever an appointment took place creating a charge upon the Consolidated Fund, the instrument of appointment was sent to the Comptroller-general of the Exchequer, in order that he might judge of its legality before it was inserted as a charge upon the Consolidated Fund. The instrument was entered and recorded with me. In the correspondence laid before the Committee, it will appear that at the time I have named for the first time the Treasury withheld that information, and not only withheld that information, but stated distinctly that the Comptroller of the Exchequer had no right to require it. My answer was, that it was impossible for me to judge of the legality of the charge without having before me the instrument of appointment; and this became a matter of contest during a long and painful correspondence, but at length, I have found that the Treasury adopted my construction, but not until I had told them distinctly that upon that construction I was determined to act; and I accordingly withheld the salaries from the want of the instruments of appointment, and I invited the Treasury to take what measures they pleased in case that act was illegal. At the present time I rejoice to think that the better and more legal practice is again resorted to, and that the original instrument of appointment is now, as it was accustomed to be, laid before me.

2986. Were those instances of appointment furnished to your Lordship during the period when the question was in dispute between you and the Treasury?—I stopped the payments; I suspended them, and I have suspended the payments even of judicial salaries on the ground, that I was not furnished with the instruments of appointment. The Committee must consider that these instruments of appointment are absolutely required, because it is not competent to me judge whether a certain payment is rightly directed, without knowing that such a person is appointed, and has obtained a legal right to the salary in question. This is carried so far, and has been uniformly acted on, that even in respect to Royal annuities to His Royal Highness Prince Albert, to the Duke of Cambridge and other members of the Royal Family, in respect to all judicial salaries, the instruments of appointment have been always laid before me. The necessity of the case is obvious, because though not applicable to all those instances, in many instances the Act of Parliament gives to the Crown only the qualified power of acting within prescribed limits, and the right of the recipient depends upon the limits within which the Crown has acted; therefore without those instruments of appointment I have no means of judging what is legally payable. A case occurred with respect to the annuity of the late Queen Dowager, in which the instrument of appointment and the interposition of the Exchequer formed grounds of inquiry in a court of law as to the rights of the executors of the Queen Dowager. I was made a party to that suit, and it was on the construction of the patent recorded with me that the legality of either making or refusing an issue depended; a sum of 25,000*l.* depended on this point, and became a saving to the public. But this controversy appears upon the face of the correspondence; it is there manifest that the copy and registration of the patent was required. I am happy to say that a better practice is now resumed, and these instruments, without which my office could not perform its functions, are no longer withheld, but are given.

2987. Does the Treasury furnish your Lordship with information whenever a change takes place?—Yes; it is bound to do so. In respect to pensions on the Civil List, the Treasury furnished me with the amount of every new pension imposed upon that list, and they furnished it to me with a minute, stating that it was necessary; they furnished it to enable me to perform the functions of the Comptroller-general, and yet with that minute still in existence, similar information with respect to other officers they have withheld.

2988. I understood you to say that formerly the Treasury communicated to your department every instance of a death taking place, and that that practice has of late been discontinued?—No, not quite so. I gave an instance of the practice in the case of Mr. Mahoney, examples of which can be shown in other cases; the case of Lord Shannon I mentioned, the case of Lord Manners, of two or three judges who held retired allowances, Sir William Alexander, Judge Littledale, and others, and their names were put upon the Consolidated Fund Warrant. I am, however, quite satisfied with the arrangement assented to by the Treasury, that where the charges are paid short of the whole amount, there should be a quarterly report made to me of the amount not issued at the time, and that should be paid back to the Exchequer. That is the rule now established at my suggestion, and it has been since acted upon by the Treasury.

2989. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] You referred to a question between the Exchequer office and the Treasury with respect to the registration of the patents of public officers, whose salaries are charged upon the Consolidated Funds; did you particularly advert to the case of Scotch judges whose salaries were transferred from the Excise Revenue to the Consolidated Fund?—I think cases of that description arose in relation to those transfers, but in other cases likewise.

2990. Previously to the transfer, the salaries of the Scotch judges had been regularly paid out of the gross revenue, had they not?—Yes.

2991. When the new Act passed, the Treasury were called upon to furnish the patents of all the existing Scotch judges to the Exchequer?—Yes.

2992. And the answer which the Treasury made, I believe, was that they were not in possession of the patents of the Scotch judges, and all they could give was a certified list of the persons to whom payments had been made out of the gross revenue?—That was not precisely the case to which I alluded.

2993. Did not that case arise?—Yes.

2994. Does it appear to you of importance that the patents of all judicial officers should be registered and kept at some office, if not in the Exchequer?—I hold it to be absolutely necessary, and I will show you why. The Act of Parliament with respect to the payments of the judges does not always accurately describe the payments which they are to receive. In several cases, above all of late years, the salary to be received by the judge has been less than that which appeared upon the face of the Act of Parliament; besides which, the time at which it commences, and other conditions, can only be shown by the instrument itself. In the case of the Queen Dowager, which was analogous to that of a judge, the whole case of the payment of one quarter's income, namely, 25,000 l., depended upon the production of the original instrument; and that original instrument being produced and recorded with me, which is not the cause of any delay or any cost to the parties, enabled me to check the exact amount which was payable; and in that way there was 25,000 l. less paid than a different construction of the instrument would have given. In the case of the present Lord Chancellor and Lord Campbell, the judges themselves have never found the slightest difficulty or objection in complying with the law, and cases arose respecting the salaries, which are set forth on the correspondence I have put in.

2995. Are you not aware, with regard to all appointments made by patent, that the present form of law requires that several copies of the patent of appointment should be made, and deposited in the different public offices through which the patent passes?—I am not aware what the law is upon that subject; but it was so stated to me, in a communication from the Treasury. But wherever elsewhere the deposit should be made, it ought to be made in that department which is to judge of the legality of the payment.

2996. Is there not a copy of all judicial patents preserved in the Treasury?—There may be.

2997. Do you think it material that there should be a complete set of copies kept at the Exchequer?—Yes, because they are indispensable, and it can be done without increased expense or inconvenience.

2998. Did you not stop the salary of the Chief Commissioner of the Audit Board?—The case of Mr. Romilly, my excellent and valued friend, was this: he was originally a Commissioner of Audit, and he was afterwards promoted to be chief of that Board, and, by Act of Parliament, he was to receive a larger salary than he had as a commissioner. I had lodged with me a copy of his appointment as commissioner, with a salary of 1,200*l.* a year. When appointed chairman, he became entitled to receive 1,500 l. On his obtaining that appointment at 1,500 l. I asked for the instrument of appointment, in order to justify me in making the increased payment; the Treasury refused to furnish this, and I persisted. This was the origin of the new construction put by the Treasury upon the practice. I was at first informed that that instrument lay at the Treasury, and would be sent to me; it never was sent, and I was constrained to refuse the larger sum, because I had no authority to pay a larger sum than was authorised by the instrument before me. After a long contest, this was set right, under the authority of the present Board of Treasury, and the instrument appointing Mr. Romilly as chairman was at length communicated to me. The principle at stake was no less than this: whether, in placing a charge on the Consolidated Fund, I was bound to have legal evidence of the appointment, or a mere letter of direction from the Secretary of the Treasury. If I had yielded, my control would in this case, and in all similar ones, have been annihilated.

2999. Was not the increase of salary in consequence of his becoming chairman, and not in consequence of his becoming a commissioner?—It was in consequence of his becoming chairman; but no instrument, showing to me that he had so become, was forwarded to me for a considerable time after; but the moment it was forwarded, cadit questio; payment was made; but without proof of Mr. Romilly's appointment, I had no means of knowing whether the appointment was legal or illegal, or with what salary, or upon what condition he was appointed. Upon that point the Treasury at length determined my rule to be right, and instructed Mr. Romilly to furnish me with that instrument which had been so long withheld.

3000. In the case of Mr. Romilly, was there any doubt as to his legal right to receive an additional salary?—I am not to act upon legal doubts, I must act according to law; I know that Prince Albert is entitled to a certain annuity, but until it has pleased Her Majesty to grant that annuity, and until the instrument granting it is left with me, I have no power by law to issue the money; that is the construction which I now consider to be acquiesced in by the present Board of Treasury.

3001. You have referred, have you not, to some answers of Mr. Anderson, with respect to the issue of deficiency bills?—Yes; it was No. 948: Mr. Anderson is asked, "According to the existing state of the law, has the interest upon the debt a prior claim upon all other charges at the moment it becomes due?" and his answer is, "It is a prior charge upon the whole balance of the Consolidated Fund; on making up the account of income and charge upon the Consolidated Fund, at the close of each quarter, the whole balance which remains is set aside, and properly; it does not exceed the amount of the charge for the payment of the debt; so that we always commence the quarter without a sixpence in the Exchequer." That is followed by a still more startling announcement. At Question 252, he is asked: "Therefore it becomes absolutely necessary, at the time when the quarter's account is made up, to make a provision which shall be sufficient to carry on the supply services for a reasonable time after the close of the quarter, till the revenue of the succeeding quarter may be adequate to meet those occurring expenses?" and his answer is, "Unless that provision was made, we should stop payment in the early part of the quarter, or be compelled to borrow from the Bank on ways and means bills." What I wish to lay before the Committee is this, that so far from that being correct, I hold in my hand a statement of the surplus balances of the Consolidated Fund; and there are 13 instances in which you not only have not been in the condition of commencing the quarter without a sixpence to meet all the charges; but there is a large surplus due, after making provision for all the charges of the Consolidated Fund.

3002. Does the first case occur in the January quarter of 1847?—Yes.

3003. Are you aware that from the year 1817, when the Deficiency Act was passed, to 1847, not an instance occurs in which deficiency bills were not issued every quarter?—It may be so, but I cannot answer that without reference to the accounts.

3004. For the 30 years in question there was a deficiency upon every quarter, and deficiency bills were issued; and from the year 1847 to 1853 there were certain quarters in which deficiency bills were not issued?—There were those 13 quarters in which there was a surplus in the Exchequer, contrary to Mr. Anderson's statement.

3005. Since that time there have been deficiency bills issued every quarter; is not that the case?—Yes, whenever the Treasury have exhausted our Exchequer account, then there must be an issue of deficiency bills.

3006. In comparing the quarters since the commencement of the Deficiency Act, it appears that in 143 quarters deficiency bills had been issued, and that in 13 quarters they had not been issued?—Yes; but that negatives Mr. Anderson; that does not make out the statement that we always commenced the quarters without a sixpence.

3007. The facts are, that in 13 quarters since 1817 deficiency bills have not been issued?—Yes, exactly.

3008. Mr. Anderson's statement was too unqualified?—Yes: it is contradicted by the account I have produced.

3009. Is not it the fact that deficiency bills have been issued in every quarter since Mr. Anderson has been in office?—He has been only two years in office; I believe that his statement would involve the practice of those two years; but it is distinctly contradicted, if you take it in the words in which he made the statement, which I think is exceedingly alarming.

3010. In what way would the statement be alarming?—If you enabled any one who chose to exaggerate or misrepresent, and you gave him the authority of a gentleman of high eminence, who bears in his instrument of appointment the new title of being the confidential adviser to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to say that we always commenced the quarter without a sixpence, I should be liable to stop payment.

3011. Mr. Hankey.] Have the Committee any evidence that Mr. Anderson holds the position of confidential adviser to the Chancellor of the Exchequer?—There is a minute on the table of Parliament, which gives him that very title.

3012. Mr. Wilson.] In the first place, will your Lordship refer to your evidence given on the 2d of June, Question 636, upon the subject of the payment into the Exchequer, of the premium upon the Exchequer bills issued in the last quarter of 1853?—Yes.

3013. I wish to give your Lordship an opportunity of correcting what is obviously an error in the whole tenor of this evidence; I will call your Lordship's attention to Question 636; you were asked this question, "Has there ever been a question, question, or was there ever a question raised in the case to which you refer, as to whether the excess of premium received upon those Exchequer bills should be repaid to the Consolidated Fund?" Your answer is, "I wish that correspondence to be distinctly before the Committee. I will put in the return, and they will see that the original point was an objection altogether to say one word about this premium." The next question is "Was it ever disputed on the part of the Treasury, that the sum of the premium obtained upon those Exchequer bills should be accounted for to the Consolidated Fund?" and your answer is, "It never was stated, directly or indirectly, that it was to be so accounted for to the Consolidated Fund, because that was what I contended for; that it could not be accounted for to the Consolidated Fund without paying it into the Exchequer; and it was that, that the Treasury never would assent to." Then in Question 639, you were asked: "If you will refer to the original paper, I think you will find in the last paragraph of that letter, a distinct statement that the Treasury never disputed that point, but distinctly admitted that the premium must be paid into the Consolidated Fund?" The answer is, "The case originated in December 1853. The letter to which the Honourable Member refers was in April 1855. In January 1853, the Treasury authorised a receipt, placing to the Exchequer account the money arising from premium and interest on the supply bills issued in the previous quarter, but in a subsequent letter they stated, that they never doubted but that the amount of premium should be accounted for and paid to the Exchequer; but they maintain that this was a question between them and Parliament, and not between them and the Exchequer. I said that it was binding on me in the issues; that I should not issue for a certain service more than the amount voted by Parliament; for that I contended, and I could not get it admitted." Then you were asked, "Am I to understand you still to state that the Treasury ever contended that the premium upon those bills should not be accounted for to the Exchequer?" and your answer is, "They did surely: they never stated that it was to be accounted for to the Exchequer; on the contrary, when I requested them to account for it to the Exchequer, they stated that it was to be accounted for, I know not how, to Parliament; but they withdrew it from the control of my office." Then in Question 642, you were asked, "Are you aware that they were issued through the Bank of England, and accounted for by the Bank of England at the end of the quarter to the Treasury?" and your answer is, "No; my recollection is, that the bills in question were sent to the Paymaster and sold by him." Then in Question 644, "Have you not already stated that that amount of premium was paid into the Exchequer, and accounted for in the month of January 1854?—Yes, but after that paying back, there was a re-assertion of the principle, that it was no portion of the Exchequer duty to enforce this responsibility for the amount of premium." Your Lordship will observe that you have there stated that this admission was not made till the month of April, after your Lordship had frequently called the attention of the Treasury to it, and insisted upon its being paid. Your Lordship has laid before the Committee a copy of the correspondence which took place on that occasion. In the month of December, your Lordship wrote to the Treasury, calling their attention to the transactions as to those Exchequer Bills, and requiring, or rather suggesting, that the premiums should be accounted for to the Exchequer?—I did so write on 13th December (see Papers, No. 16, p. 1), calling the attention of the Treasury to the facts, that if the Exchequer bills issued were sold at a premium, the surplus produced by that premium might be employed free from the check of the Exchequer, and the restraints provided against unauthorised appropriation.

3014. At the end of the same month a Treasury minute was passed, and a letter was written upon that Treasury minute, dated the 11th of January, which was the first letter on the subject from the Treasury, and the concluding words of that letter are these: "In reference to that portion of your Lordship's letter which refers to the rate at which the Exchequer bills may be negociated, and to any premium or discount which may arise therefrom, my Lords would remark that the function of the Exchequer-office is confined in this respect to the exact amount of the votes of Parliament, as detailed in the Appropriation Act, and therefore, as in the grant of Exchequer bills for the supply services of the year they are computed at par. My Lords are distinctly of opinion that the Comptroller-general of the Exchequer 'can only deal with them as at par, and that any consideration of premium or discount is a question between this Board and Parliament, and to be accounted for in the same manner as other profits or deficiencies, deficiencies, as the case may be.'" How are all the other profits accounted for? Your Lordship has already stated that all the profits, so far as you are aware, and all the income, of whatever nature, is paid into the Exchequer?—I am far from having said or from saying that; I do not go that length; I do not know that it may be true.

3015. Your Lordship has stated your belief that all income and profits from from old stores, rents, and so on, are paid into the Exchequer; and though your Lordship has called in question the precise mode by which that has been done, your Lordship has always admitted throughout that you had no doubt that it was done?—I have said with respect to the old stores, because I have distinct evidence upon that point; the Treasury Minute, which I have no reason to suspect is disobeyed. With reference to revenues of customs, inland duties, and post-office, I know how it is; but if I am asked in general terms if all profits, rents, and so on come into the Exchequer, whilst I am not prepared to deny it, I know nothing about it that will enable me to affirm it. I am not informed on the fact.

3016. Will your Lordship refer to the letter of the 13th of January; towards the end of it your Lordship states, that in your opinion the profit on Exchequer bills cannot "be legally appropriated for such a purpose, and ought, according to what, I believe, was the precedent in earlier times, to be repaid back to the credit of the Exchequer." Then on the next page, page 6, your Lordship refers to the particular cases of Mr. Hill and Mr. Lushington, in which they paid sums of money which stood to their names for a certain time in the Bank of England as profits upon Exchequer bills?—Yes.

3017. Then at page 9, at the conclusion of the Treasury letter, it is stated: "Your Lordship enters into a long argument to show that it is inconsistent with principle and practice, that the amount of such premiums should be accounted for and paid into the Exchequer; that is a point which was never doubted by my Lords, but which, on the contrary, was fully admitted in their said Minute, when they stated that such premiums would be accounted for in the same manner as other profits which might arise; but what their Lordships contended for, and still continue to maintain was, that this accounting is a matter between their Lordships and Parliament, and not with your Lordship's office." Does not that letter give distinct intimation, if there was any doubt as to the meaning of the words in the letter of the 11th of January, "to be accounted for in the same manner as other profits" usually are; and what the Treasury meant by that was, that it was to be paid into the Exchequer?—I do not even now so understand it; the principle that I contended for was a principle established on former occasions, and established after some experience of the disadvantage of taking another course; the Parliamentary annals will show the risks of giving to persons in the public service a power of disposing of Exchequer bills, and realising out of the profits of the sale a reward to themselves; you will find that marked in the Parliamentary Debates in former times. In the Minute of 1810 a principle was laid down which guarded against such a possibility; there was a separate account directed to be kept in the names of the two secretaries of the Treasury for all the amount of the profits either from premiums or interest, with a view that that profit should be returned to the Exchequer; that was a wise course to take, but it was not proposed to be taken on the occasion before the Committee; in this instance I was called upon to issue those bills to a public department to be sold, and to issue them in satisfaction of certain votes. I was required to issue them at the par value of the Exchequer bills; it was clear therefore that if the bills were issued by me at the par value, and sold at a premium, and that the department had kept that premium, I was issuing more than the Act of Parliament justified me in issuing for that vote; I therefore called upon them not to account to the Exchequer, but to pay back to the Exchequer the amount of the premiums, such as it was. If it was the intention of the Treasury so to pay back to the Exchequer, nothing was simpler than to say, "We so intend;" but in place of their saying that they so intended, they state that they would be dealt with after a different fashion, and by analogy to another thing neither clearly nor definitely expressed, but offered as a substitute for that which I required, and consequently differing from it. It was only at the close of a somewhat protracted correspondence on 5th April, that they were good enough to explain to me that we entirely agreed upon the subject.

3018. At all events, whether you misunderstood the letter, or did not sufficiently understand the letter of the 11th of April, when it was stated that they were were to be accounted for as all other profits, you admit that before the correspondence was concluded you did understand that those profits were intended to be accounted for in that way?—I might so have understood it, except that in the last letter the Treasury again repeated the same words pretty nearly as they had formerly stated it, that they refused to acquiesce in my doctrine, which was, that this money was brought under the jurisdiction of the Exchequer, and should be paid in to me. The Lords of the Treasury asserted still that it was a question to be settled between themselves and Parliament, that the Exchequer had nothing to say to it, and that it was not my duty to enforce its appropriation.

3019. In the last letter which your Lordship wrote upon the subject, on the 7th of April, your Lordship says: "It is true that your Lordships state that the propriety of the payments of the amount of premium received on these Exchequer bills into the Exchequer was never doubted by your Lordships; but your Lordships conclude by stating, that you continued, and still continue, to contend, that this accounting is a matter between your Lordships and Parliament, and not with the office of the Exchequer"?—Yes. The concession was limited by a denial of my right to call for and enforce this appropriation.

3020. Therefore your Lordship was then perfectly aware that the Treasury did not contend as if there had been any mistake, but, as you say, they had come to a common understanding that those premiums ought to be paid into the Exchequer?—But still they emphatically repeated, that they thought it was no question of Exchequer business, and if I had submitted to this claim, I lost all power of performing my duty to Parliament, by confining the issue within the limits of the vote.

3021. That being the case, is this answer, which you gave to Question 637, correct. The question is, "Was it ever disputed on the part of the Treasury that the sum of the premium obtained upon those Exchequer bills should be accounted for to the Consolidated Fund?" And your answer is, "It never was stated directly or indirectly that it was to be so accounted for to the Consolidated Fund, because that was what I contended for, as it could not be accounted for to the Consolidated Fund without paying it into the Exchequer; and it was that that the Treasury never would assent to"?—Precisely; I hold that to be the answer now. I think that the Treasury never once assented to the proposition that this money was to be paid back into the Exchequer, at the desire of the Comptroller-general; they limit even their communication of the 5th April to an unintelligible reference to some account between them and Parliament, and that their responsibility was Parliamentary. It was only as a Parliamentary officer that I called for this repayment, and for the purpose of preventing an undue issue, in excess of the vote of Parliament. It was to the exercise of this right that the Treasury demurred.

3022. You were told on the 5th of April, that that was a point that was never doubted by the Lords of the Treasury, but fully admitted?—It was fully admitted in one sense, but at the same time denying at that time and subsequently the authority of the Exchequer in such a matter.

3023. Is your Lordship aware that at the time that you wrote that letter to the Treasury, in the month of December, the transactions were then current, and that the time when that account could be made up was the close of the quarter?—I did not know when that account could be made up, but if the Treasury intended to pay these premiums, they had only to say so. This they showed a determination not to do.

3024. Is your Lordship aware that that premium was actually paid in to your Lordship's account in the month of January?—It was paid in the month of January, that is, six weeks after I took the objection; but no information was given to me that it would be so paid by them, as I understood it.

3025. When this correspondence took place in the month of April, had that money not actually been paid into the Exchequer three months before?—Certainly; but that was nearly at the close of the correspondence, and even then the Treasury denied to me the right of enforcing the appropriation of Parliament.

3026. What could be the meaning of your Lordship's answer, which would lead any one to infer that the money never had been paid into the Exchequer?—My answer was not intended nor calculated to lead to such a conclusion. I produced the whole correspondence stating the facts as they occurred, in order to lay all the facts before the Committee; but up to the last the power of the Exchequer was denied, and a vague and unintelligible responsibility to Parliament was assumed in substitution for it.

 3027. Suppose

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

30 June 1856.

3027. Suppose that the Treasury were to dispose of property that belonged to the Crown; I will take, for example, an Ordnance barrack to be sold, which would yield 8,000 l., it would be for the Treasury, would it not, to return that 8,000 l. into the Exchequer?—I presume so, under our present system.

3028. Would it be any part of the duty of the Comptroller of the Exchequer, in that case, to inquire into the sale of the barrack, or the circumstances attending it, or to take any cognisance of the transaction, except to receive the 8,000 l. upon the responsibility of the Treasury?—It would be the duty of the Comptroller-general to do more, if Parliament had done anything so extraordinary as to put that barrack at the value of 8,000 l. into his hands, to be applied as ways and means. If I had issued that barrack as 8,000 l., and found that it produced 10,000 l., it would equally have been my duty to have called for the re-payment of the 2,000 l. in excess. That is a case exactly parallel to the case before the Committee.

3029. Had your Lordship any power of knowing, or controlling in any way, the operations of the sale of those Exchequer bills, or was your Lordship obliged to take the account rendered by the Treasury of the result of the transactions when they paid the profit in?—I should have had no ground to doubt for one second the amount that was paid in. If the Treasury had said, We intend to pay it you, I should not have doubted the fact, or the truth of what was returned, under your signature. But this the Treasury avoided saying.

3030. Is the whole difference then this, that the Treasury said, These Exchequer bills are sold upon the responsibility of the Treasury; the amount having been issued from the Exchequer we will account for the premium, but it is not the duty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to inquire into the question as to that premium?—But the Treasury said no such thing; that is not the correct representation of the case; the point at issue was the assertion that it was a matter between them and Parliament, and not between them and the Exchequer. I did not ask them to account, but to pay.

3031. All public receipts of money on the part of the Treasury are kept as between them and Parliament?—Yes, I presume they are, and I was the humble organ of Parliament to see that no more money was applied to the public service than was voted; and it was to the performance of this duty the Treasury objected.

3032. With regard to the case that your Lordship has adverted to in the Minute of 1810, do I not describe the purport of it correctly when I say that Exchequer bills were issued, and that a separate account was ordered to be kept in the Bank of England of the profit derived from those Exchequer bills in the names of the two secretaries of the Treasury, and that at the close of the quarter those two secretaries of the Treasury were directed by the Minute to pay those profits into the Exchequer?—Certainly.

3033. And that they did at the end of the quarter pay certain sums into the Exchequer, which had stood in their names in the Bank of England during the currency of the quarter?—Yes.

3034. Was the practice in any way varied in 1853; would not the Bank of England dispose of the Exchequer bills in the same way, and was not an account rendered at the close of the quarter of the profits upon those Exchequer bills, and were they not by the Bank of England paid into the Exchequer?—There was this great difference between the two cases, that in the last case in 1853 there was a direct denial of all Exchequer authority to see that this payment was made, and a reference to some vague Parliamentary authority and means of enforcing which I was not cognisant of. In 1810, on the contrary, the Treasury took the very course I insisted on in 1853.

3035. Will your Lordship, having this Minute of 1810 fresh in your recollection, refer to any words in that minute which in the slightest degree indicate that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had any control or cognisance of the transactions alluded to before that money was paid into his hands?—There is nothing in that minute or in the transactions of the day to show that the Treasury had refused to admit the authority of the Exchequer, or had expressed any intimation of their desire upon the subject; on the contrary, they seem to have paid in the regular practice of things, and paid in the full amount which they had received.

3036. Was it not purely a Treasury transaction of Exchequer bills, disposed of by orders from the Treasury, by the Bank of England, the profits remaining entirely entirely in the control of the Treasury until the close of the quarter, when they were paid into the Exchequer?—A separate account was directed to be kept in the names of the Secretaries of the Treasury, who were made trustees for holding and repaying the premiums on the bills. No such step was taken in 1853; there was an interference on the part of the auditors on one occasion, but there was no denial, to my knowledge, at any time previous of the obligation and necessity of paying back any premiums into the Exchequer; there was in my case, and I was referred to some unintelligible and unexplained responsibility to Parliament.

3037. Is there anything to lead your Lordship to conclude that, during the currency of those transactions, the Exchequer thought it their duty to call upon the Treasury to account for those premiums?—I do not know what occurred; but if there was at the Treasury at that time no desire to refuse the payment, or to depart from the system of paying back, there could be no such controversy.

3038. Was not your Lordship's application made to the Treasury during the currency of the quarter, and before it expired?—Yes; and it would have been answered by saying, "We intend to pay the money in as you suggest."

3039. Had you not been told in your subsequent correspondence, whether you understood the first letter or not to mean it, that that was really what the Treasury did intend?—That was not shown in the manner of stating the Treasury intention; you must couple that with the denial of the Treasury of any authority to call for that money which was in excess of the vote.

3040. Is there any doubt that the Bank of England did account for those profits, and that they were paid into the Exchequer in precisely the same manner as they are directed to be paid under that Minute of 1810?—That proves distinctly that my view of the question was the right one; I only asked that to be done at the outset which the Right Honourable gentleman refers to after as having been done at a later period, six weeks after my demand.

3041. Mr. Hankey.] Supposing those Exchequer bills had been sold at a discount, would your Lordship have considered yourself justified in issuing any further amount from the Exchequer to make up the difference?—That question has been put already, and I have answered it fully. I will refer the Honourable Member, with his experience, to the words of the Appropriation Act itself, which establishes at once the legitimate way of meeting those questions, and providing for the satisfaction of the vote without embarrassment, either as a question of discount or of premium, as the case might be. The clause I am about to refer to is the ordinary clause in the Appropriation Act; the Committee will have the kindness to consider the importance of these words: "It shall be lawful for the said Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to issue and apply from time to time all such sums of money as shall be raised by Exchequer bills, to be made out under and in pursuance of this Act, to such services as shall then have been voted." Therefore what this Act and all Ways and Means Acts contemplate is the sale of Exchequer bills, the application of the money; and in the Act for Exchequer bonds the words go even further than the Appropriation Act, for it directs distinctly the sale of those bonds, the money realised by the sale to be paid into the Exchequer, and the money amount of each vote to be paid out in money to the accountant entitled to claim it; in that way all difficulty is escaped either from the question of discount or of premium. The issues become simple and self-adjusting. That is the latest construction I can give you of the better system of practice.

3342. Mr. Wilson.] Suppose larger ways and means, which are exhausted under the Appropriation Act, and there was still 500,000 l. required to make up the loss in Exchequer bills; after all those monies had been paid into the Exchequer, would your Lordship feel authorised to issue 500,000 l. beyond the whole ways and means under the Appropriation Act for the purpose of supplying such deficiency?—The law has not left us without the means of meeting such a contingency; you would be entitled, in that case, to go upon the Consolidated Fund if you there had unexhausted ways and means.

3043. I was referring to ways and means exhausted by deficiencies in the means of satisfying the services for the quarter. Supposing the whole ways and means for the year are 58,000,000 l., and the whole of the ways and means on the 28th of March are exhausted, and the Treasury were to say, But those 58,000,000 l. of ways and means have only produced us 57,500,000 l., and that they had lost 500,000 l. by the sale of Exchequer bills, would your Lordship feel authorised to issue 500,000 l. more than the whole of the ways and means contained contained in the Appropriation Act, because the Treasury had lost 500,000 l.?—No; I could mean nothing so extravagant; my answer is (I think the Honourable Member is putting a suppositious case) that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has a way of guarding against that result; he will not lose 500,000 l.; he can raise the interest upon those Exchequer bills; if he were to put them into the market and sold them at a loss in the way described, he would have managed his affairs very ill. Supposing that the Consolidated Fund fell short by failure of revenue, the Chancellor of the Exchequer may still have recourse to Parliament.

3044. I am speaking of the power of the Comptroller-general in the construction of the Appropriation Act, not of the conduct of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. What I asked was this: Supposing the Chancellor of the Exchequer had suffered that loss in the sale of those Exchequer bills, what would have been done?—My answer is, that the Appropriation Act contemplates the payment of the money to be raised by Exchequer bills, and not the issue of Exchequer bills, themselves, for a given service; the one presupposes that you must always deal with the Exchequer bills as issues at par, which I think there is nothing in the Appropriation Act to justify.

3045. Will your Lordship have the goodness to turn to the Exchequer Act of 1854, the 11th clause of that Act?—Yes; but it does not alter my opinion in the least.

3046. I understand your Lordship to maintain, not only in the Paper placed before the Committee, but in your evidence also, that you regard the existing practice in the Pay-office, in their mode of transacting their business, as strictly illegal, and contrary to this Act?—Yes; I so consider it. If I was wrong I should have been set right by the opinion of the law officers, which, acting officially, I had entreated the Treasury to take.

3047. You have already stated that the words of the Act, upon which you rely as to the duty of the Pay-office, and for the strict appropriation of specific votes, is to be found in these words, "to be applied by such officer to such service"?—Yes; but as the Exchequer memorandum shows, not on these words only.

3048. Was not it the case, when this Act was passed, that there were four distinct general services, with separate accountants?—Yes.

3049. That is, the navy, army, ordnance, and the civil service?—Yes.

3050. Will you follow me while I call your attention to these words: "Be it further enacted, that from and after the commencement of this Act, whenever any sum or sums of money shall have been granted to his Majesty by any Act of Parliament, or vote of the House of Commons, for any specified branch of the public service, and ways and means shall likewise have been granted for satisfying and making good the same, it shall be lawful for his Majesty, by his Royal order, under the Royal sign manual, to be countersigned by the Commissioners of the Treasury, to authorise and require the said Comptroller to place at the Bank of England, to the credit of the public accountant to the Crown, in the respective branch of service, the amount of the sum so granted or voted, at such times and in such proportions as the said Commissioners shall from time to time direct to be applied by such officer to such service." Does your Lordship not conceive that this Act had reference to the great services which then existed?—Certainly.

3051. Would it be any breach of this clause if the Comptroller of the Exchequer had made issues, always keeping within the Appropriation Act, to any particular branches of the service; and would it be a breach of this clause, if those sums, so issued for a particular branch of the service, were not strictly appropriated to the service for each special vote, provided each special vote were not ultimately exceeded?—I understand the question to be put in respect of the three great services, and not a question as to the separate votes.

3052. The four great services?—If the Honourable gentleman means by the question that the consolidation of the offices put a total end to the question of appropriation when placed in the hands of a single officer, rather than in the hands of four paymasters, that is not the construction that I give to the consolidation. The appropriation remained the same.

3053. Do you consider that it would be inconsistent with this clause of the Act of Parliament, for the Comptroller of the Exchequer to issue sums of money within the Appropriation Act to any of those branches of the service, and not strictly to apply them to the separate votes, provided those were not exceeded in the whole course of the year?—As I understand, this refers to the point on which which I had occasion to take the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, having doubts upon the construction of the Act itself, in conjunction with the Board of Treasury then existing. That opinion justified the Comptroller-general in issuing upon the whole sums voted for each of the great services, as each consisted of one vote only. The question was submitted to the law officers of the Crown, and their opinion is on record; the matter is therefore completed; but I should explain that there are two states of the law existing as to the issues of public money; the one before the enactment of the Appropriation Act, and the other after. Before the enactment of the Appropriation Act, by the words of the Ways and Means Acts, you are authorised to pay upon specific votes of Parliament. In the Appropriation Act the amount of the separate resolutions is consolidated into three distinct votes, one for the whole of the army, one vote for the whole of the navy, and one vote for the whole of the ordnance; separate amounts corresponding to the resolutions are, it is true, afterwards recited, but in every instance there was one vote for the gross amount of the navy, army, and ordnance respectively. Under a strict interpretation of the Ways and Means Act before the Appropriation Act, I felt some apprehension that I might be considered bound to introduce a new practice; requiring a separate Royal order for every separate vote that was taken for the great services, as was the usage in the miscellaneous, and that this change might have been productive of very great inconvenience, and also have been contrary to the invariable usage. But I stated my doubts to the Treasury of that day; it was Sir Robert Peel's Treasury; the subject was found to be of such importance as to require a legal solution, and the case was referred to the Attorney and Solicitor-general of that day. This was in April 1844. (Papers, No. 13, p. 31.) They gave their opinion that I was warranted in persevering in the previous system of issuing to the Army indiscriminately, to the Navy indiscriminately, and to the Ordnance indiscriminately, and having obtained that legal opinion, I thought that I was right in acting upon it, because it not only stood upon the authority of the Crown lawyers, and was supported by the invariable usage of the department, and was also confirmed by the words of the Appropriation Act, which consolidated the Army votes, the Navy votes, and the Ordnance votes in three aggregate sums. In doing that I perhaps may be considered to have released the Treasury from some degree of control, but I did it upon the grounds I have stated, which appeared to me to be sufficient to justify my decision.

3054. It appears that the legal construction of this clause of the Act did not require a specific appropriation of the separate votes for those three great services?—Not of the sub-votes, but it affirmed distinctly what was always the law after the passing of the Appropriation Act, and what had been not only always the practice, but the invariable usage under the Ways and Means Acts preliminary to the last financial proceeding of the Session, the Appropriation Act.

3055. In point of fact, it simply affirmed that the Comptroller of the Exchequer should see that he did not issue more than the gross vote of Parliament for each of those services?—It did that; but it restrained him from issuing one farthing of the Navy money for the Army purposes, or vice versâ, and it left the case of the miscellaneous votes unaltered.

3056. In that opinion, was any question raised as to the branch of the civil services, which was then a separate and distinct branch?—No, it could not have been raised as to the civil services, because the issues on the civil services have always been kept distinct in the Exchequer; I think it was stated by a high authority in the House of Commons this year, that no confusion of votes could arise upon the civil service votes, as they were uniformly kept distinct. This is perfectly true as affecting the Exchequer, though contradicted so far as the Paymaster is concerned by the admissions of official witnesses before this Committee.

3057. Does your Lordship conceive that this amalgamation of the four Paymasters necessarily entailed a change in the practice with regard to the specific appropriation of the monies in his hands?—No, I think it continued the previous practice.

3058. It made no difference?—I think it produced no change; it confirmed the old modes of paying, as they had previously existed.

3059. Your Lordship holds it as a rule, in point of distinct law, that the Paymaster is bound to pay for every specific service and for every specific vote in the Miscellaneous Estimates from the monies issued to him specifically for those purposes, and for no other?—I think, as a general principle, he is; but the

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

30 June 1856.

the question put omits all notice of the unappropriated votes or monies. This, if left without notice, would seem to lead to a conclusion distinctly contrary to my previous evidence, and at variance with the fact. There are votes placed at the disposal of Government, out of which they have the means of meeting occasional services, namely, the civil contingencies vote, and the funds of the commissariat chest, calculated for home and for foreign purposes.

3060. The civil contingencies vote is for the purpose of meeting charges unforeseen, and for which no vote has been taken. Is it not possible that a course may have been adopted, and justly and constitutionally adopted, of anticipating a vote not yet taken, and, as it has been stated, for purposes for which votes of Parliament had not been taken at the time?—Yes, if paid for out of civil contingencies. The advance is repayable out of the vote when taken.

3061. Does your Lordship hold it to be distinct law that the Paymaster has no power to pay a sum of money upon any vote, for any purpose that has been voted, excepting from the monies which have been issued to him specifically for that object?—I mean unless he has monies in his hands, and authority to use them for a specific vote, he has no legal power of applying monies other than the unappropriated or contingent funds I have just referred to for that purpose.

3062. Unless he has monies in his hands that have been specifically issued for that vote?—I consider that to be the strict law, subject to the exception stated.

3063. The Paymaster can pay nothing, excepting from monies which have been issued to him for that express purpose?—Yes, except out of the civil contingencies or the commissariat chest account.

3064. If that practice was followed, what would become of those monies which are paid into the cash account, and which, as your Lordship is aware, both by Minutes made in your Lordship's time, and since, the Paymaster is bound to exhaust before he applies the Exchequer credits; what could he do with those monies?—I think it is stated in some part of the official Evidence, that the monies that come into the cash account are of two kinds, monies appropriated and legally repayable to certain specific services, and monies in transitu to be paid or returned to the Exchequer, and which without delay ought to go back to the Exchequer, and ought not to be employed by the Paymaster for any other purposes. If used for other purposes, I hold it illegal. The balances of votes of Parliament, as the 25,000 l. balance of the Duke of Wellington's funeral, applied to other purposes, I consider to be contrary to law. Any payment that you get now to the Paymaster's cash account, by the late extended practice of making the Paymaster a great officer of receipt as well as of payment of monies, he now receives all these; either these monies are to be used for the purposes for which they are legally appropriated, or they ought to be paid back to the Exchequer, and become part of the Consolidated Fund. These sums in the Paymaster's hands expose the public to the danger of undue and unauthorised appropriation.

3065. If they are monies, original receipts, in the form of income, they are to be paid back into the Exchequer, and are so paid; but if they are sums not original receipts, but are repayments, belonging to some branch of the service, heretofore advanced, they must remain on the cash account to be used by the Paymaster. I ask you if you would leave those monies on the cash account not used, and at the same time draw Exchequer credits for services required at the time that those monies stood to the cash account?—I do not admit the unqualified statement that these sums are so paid back to the Exchequer. They are habitually used for other purposes, and only repaid at an indefinite time. The balances of votes remaining with the Paymaster for years exemplify this. I can with difficulty state how the cash account, as I have told the Honourable Member, is to be managed, because I am not acquainted with the Paymaster's practices; but my own way of dealing with the matter as a matter of principle is, that public monies that come into the cash account without especial appropriation upon them ought to be paid back into the Exchequer, and that such repayments must be included in the direction as to the exhausting of that account. The present order is applied as giving the Paymaster not only the power, but giving him absolute directions as to applying monies which are without appropriation; it is to that practice that my evidence and my objection is applied. I therefore object to the use of 25,000 l. in the Wellington funeral case.

3066. The practice which your Lordship recommends would render it necessary for the Paymaster to keep a sufficient balance upon every single vote to conduct his payments from day to day, and a separate account for each vote, would would it not?—It would, undoubtedly, render it necessary to have larger balances. But, considering that credits can be obtained within less than 24 hours, it is an utter exaggeration to state that balances must be kept on every separate vote. We must also bear in mind the aid derived from the commissariat chest and from the use that might be made of the civil contingencies fund. I know that an order reaching the Exchequer after office hours, between five and six, puts the Paymaster in funds for any voted service at nine o'clock in the morning of the day following; there is, therefore, no such weighty obligation thrown upon the Paymaster as to enable him justly to dispense with the law, if he can ever be justified in so doing.

3067. Still, whether or not, it would require that he should have a separate account for each vote?—Certainly, if he is to appropriate the money according to the principle of the Act of Parliament, subject to the explanation I have given.

3068. As it is impossible for the Paymaster, as he has stated it to be, and it is obviously impossible on the day before to estimate the precise sum that will be required, it would be necessary that he should have a balance to each of those accounts, either small or large?—I am not sure about that; as I have already shown, you must be aware that where payments of the public service come in so uncertainly, it is not likely he should not be aware of the probable demands upon him the following morning before he leaves the Treasury at five o'clock in the evening; and if new demands come in the following morning, they can without difficulty be supplied in a few hours.

3069. What would your Lordship recommend the Treasury to do in that case as to bills coming from abroad, which are paid from the bill account, and for which no previous provision could have been made, from the fact that no knowledge existed as to what separate vote they were drawn against, or in what proportions?—I have seen statements about the bill account which have surprised me. I have seen a statement in which it is represented that bills come in for payment apparently without advice, and without notice, payable at sight; the practice of the Treasury has very much changed from what it was in my time, if there are many such stringent demands upon them. With respect to bills drawn from abroad, they are chiefly drawn, I believe, by the commissariat establishments abroad; they are the parties authorised for the most part to draw; the commissariat abroad in every instance has its own chest, and the commissariat chest account at home would appear to be the primary fund against which bills are properly drawn; the resettlement of those bills amongst the separate departments may possibly at times be unavoidably postponed, and may at times be uncertain and difficult. But the commissariat chest account is similar to the army extraordinary account; in principle it is similar to the civil contingencies account; the first claim upon the commissariat account would be under these circumstances, the bills that were drawn by the commissaries, and subsequently, there would be a just principle of adjustment by repayments from the voted services; and to this they would be driven from the necessity of meeting bills abroad, but which, being payable in the first instance out of an unappropriated fund, would not involve any apparent violation of the law. I cannot help thinking, however, that this inconvenience may be lessened if the drawers are bound, whenever it is possible, to draw specifically for army, navy, and ordnance purposes, and distinguishing the separate services in their letters of advice. Such would be, I believe, the mercantile mode of proceeding.

3070. Supposing the commissariat chest fund is overdrawn, then your Lordship admits that there would be no possibility of the Paymaster having Exchequer credits for the purpose of meeting bills drawn from abroad, for services the nature and character of which it was impossible he could tell?—If the commissariat chest account, which exceeds a million sterling, is overdrawn, such a result must necessarily occur in the same way as if the expense was incurred abroad exceeding the vote. There is a departmental difficulty which the Treasury would have to solve, but I see no insuperable difficulty. You have had a very large commissariat chest account even in time of peace, and there have been 3,000,000*l.* for each of the two last years which have been cases of exception referring to the war.

3071. Leaving out of consideration the extraordinary circumstances of the two last years, but taking the ordinary state of the service, when that commissariat chest fund is lying in all the commissariat chests in the world, when the account here is continually or practically always overdrawn, when very large sums of money money for the navy and army, and many of them for civil purposes and for contingent purposes are constantly been drawn by bills from abroad, I take it that your lordship admits that it would be impossible in that case for the Pay-master to receive issues from the Exchequer to meet those specific payments?—I cannot understand the commissariat chest account being overdrawn, without its being overdrawn by advances for different departments, repayable out of the ordinaries of those departments. The Treasury have always found that they have means within their own power, which they have wisely exercised by calling on those departments which are in funds, if indebted to the commissariat, and making them pay up more rapidly the amount of the debt; by a transfer to the Bank of England, they can recruit their commissariat chest account, which would enable them to meet the demand upon them for bills.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

3072. Those repayments are made upon mere speculation, leaving a margin as to what the demand upon the department ultimately will be, but in this there is no possibility of specific appropriation, is there?—If the army owed a debt to the commissariat chest which "upon mere speculation" (to repeat the words of the question) amounts to 600,000 l., and the commissariat chest is low, there can be no great difficulty in the army repaying to the commissariat chest 400,000 l. out of 600,000 l.; there is an unascertained balance which must remain an unascertained balance till the commissariat accounts and vouchers come home.

3073. Therefore there can be no specific appropriation for the payment of their bills?—There would be no difficulty whatever if those bills were drawn upon the commissariat chest account, if the commissariat chest is short of cash by 300,000 l., but has debts owing to it of half a million, if it gets 300,000 l. out of half a million repaid. I am now, however, examined on what is no matter of Exchequer practice at all, but which relates to the repayment of the debt of other services to the commissariat chest. Assuming that military chests abroad were required to pay monies for various services in credit at home; if that was so, the departments, owing their debt to the commissariat chest, would pay that debt to the commissariat chest; the commissariat chest, on whom the bills were drawn, having made these advance out of unappropriated monies, would pay the bills without a violation of the law.

3074. There is no possibility of distinguishing that advances have been made by the commissariat chest, until the close of the year, when the Board of Audit have analysed those accounts and audited them, and directed repayments to be made, and the accounts adjusted?—That may be quite true as to the final close of the debt, but it would seem to be modified by answers to questions which have been already put with respect to the mode of receiving from the indebted department; it is admitted that there is a debt subsisting, not as an amount settled as a matter of account, but admitting of repayments, repaying to the commissariat chest a sum unquestionably due, and sufficient to put it in funds. That is the wise course taken by the Treasury, as I understand, in calling for a more rapid mode of repayment, and having thus prevented a large accumulation of debt.

3075. What I want to know is this: as long as it is impossible to know for what purposes those bills are drawn, if there be any balance in the commissariat chest account from which they can be paid, whether it is possible for the Pay-master in that case to take Exchequer credits for the specific appropriation of those services for which the bills are drawn?—If there is a debt owing from the army to the commissariat chest, there is no difficulty in getting it paid by the army. But the question of payment on account of debt from the Army, Navy, or Ordnance to the commissariat chest, is totally different from the ultimate settlement of the account between the departments; that must frequently be delayed; but in the meanwhile a repayment of a sum which is known to be less than the sum advanced, is perfectly justifiable in my view of the commissariat chest transactions. But all this has been settled and put upon a new footing since I resigned the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer, which took place 17 years ago. The account has also been put on a new footing since my resignation. I have already stated my want of knowledge of the internal management of the Pay-office. I therefore feel no confidence in my opinion on this subject, which is not connected with the Exchequer.

3076. Are the Committee to understand you to say, that the system of the Pay-office, of which complaint is now made, could not have taken place under the

the old system of separate Paymasters?—I do not apprehend that the system against which my evidence and the Exchequer memorandum are pointed could have taken place. Whether there may have been irregularity, I cannot say; but the system of applying money for purposes for which it was not voted, I do not think could have taken place in the way it now takes place. I doubt its taking place at all interchangeably between the Army, Navy, and Ordnance departments; as long as there were three Paymasters, and no attempt to make specific appropriations, but only to issue according to the general vote, there could be no complaint such as is now made. My complaint is now of the appropriation between department and department, and I say that that could not have taken place when there were separate departments and separate Paymasters. From that I must exclude the possibility of bills drawn from abroad in the same way; that I do not think that a matter of misappropriation now, if met by a due regulation of the Commissariat Chest Fund.

3077. With regard to the civil services, you think that there was the same check while there was a separate civil services paymaster, which office was abolished in 1848, I think; and from that date you state that great irregularities have arisen in consequence of doing away with Mr. Sargent's office?—No; pardon me, there are two assumptions there, both of which I negative. I do not assume that the existing irregularities are traceable exclusively to 1848, or necessarily consequent upon the abolition of Mr. Sargent's office. I think that irregularities are shown to have previously existed (see Printed Papers, No. 9, 10, 13), in reference both to the Exchequer Act and the Appropriation Acts; but the systematic attempt to escape from the control of these Acts has been exhibited since 1852-53 mainly.

3078. Will you state what change in practice took place in 1852-53, which has led you to that conclusion?—I will state several; the discontinuance of the deficiency bills warrant, which has deprived me of a check upon the issue of deficiency bills, and deprived me of the means I formerly possessed of checking the charges made upon the Consolidated Fund.

3079. Will you confine yourself to the votes of Parliament?—The withdrawal altogether, and the refusal by the ultimate variation of practice, to give me the means of knowing whether the money demanded from me was justly payable or not, by showing the instruments of appointment to the parties.

3080. I am speaking exclusively of votes of Parliament, and I understood you to say that the fault in the Pay-office of which you complain, as to the votes of Parliament, and the appropriation of them, did not take place since 1848, but since 1852-53; will you inform the Committee what change took place in 1852-53 with regard to the payment of monies on votes of Parliament, which has led to this irregularity?—The way in which money has been withdrawn from the Exchequer; the way in which I know it to be applied to purposes other than those for which it was intended, is a practice which is a growing practice, and is mainly found to have occurred since 1852.

3081. Is there any change in the mode of issuing Exchequer credits?—There is no change whatever, and no deviation; that depends wholly on myself; I challenge inquiry into the fact to show one single instance of deviation from the principles of issuing Exchequer credit, except, I believe, in the one instance, of paying votes, in which the Treasury sent us over a number of Royal orders, and four of them were passed before the error was discovered. I refer to the case in June 1852. I laid that case specifically before the Committee; they will find it No. 9, p. 123; but that is the only instance in which I am conscious that there was a deviation.

3082. Is there any change whatever in the Treasury practice with regard to those issues?—Yes, there is a very great change; there is the system of exhausting a great number of votes that stood at the Exchequer, duly created by Exchequer credits, and they are at once carried out to the Paymaster's accounts as working accounts, without there being a demand for paying the services represented by those votes.

3083. The demand is upon the other services, is it not?—I presume it is; it is wanted for other services, and it is withdrawn from the Exchequer, and immediately after from the Exchequer credit account, to meet, as I apprehend, adjustments and rectifications of account.

3084. As

30 June 1856.

3084. As to those issues, the Exchequer Act of 1834 and the Appropriation Act are strictly complied with?—Certainly, so far as relating to the issues from the Exchequer.

3085. Did your Lordship ever inquire into the result of the separate pay-office, the Civil Services Pay-office, under Mr. Sargent, as to those so-termed regularities?—Is that a question applied to my relation with the department since I have been Comptroller-general, or before that?

3086. It applies before that; before the abolition of Mr. Sargent's office?—I recollect perfectly that I considered Mr. Sargent's accounts to be kept very distinctly; I never heard of any complaint with respect to the mode in which those accounts were kept by Mr. Sargent, and undoubtedly I had every confidence in the mode in which he performed his functions; I never had any evidence in my transactions with him, nor do I think it would have been possible, that the miscellaneous votes payable to him should be withdrawn in order to be applied to army, navy, or ordnance. That is the practice which exists now. The application, we will say, of the vote for the Duke of Wellington's funeral, as an example, never could have taken place under Mr. Sargent's system; it took place under the present system.

3087. Your Lordship is not aware that Mr. Sargent pursued the same system which the Paymaster does now of exhausting the whole of the cash that he had in his hands, or keeping his balances as low as possible, without regard to the specific appropriation of the monies that he paid?—I was not aware of that. I have already stated that he held an account as Paymaster of Civil Services and of Army Extraordinaries; how far those were managed I know not*.

3088. I hold in my hand the account of the financial year 1842-43. It appears to have been the practice for Mr. Sargent to make up his accounts and balance them every fortnight, according to the rule of the office. In each of those accounts there is the result of the Exchequer credits which were standing to his credit at each time. Then there are three cash accounts; one shows the sub-accounts in credit; that is an account of each put in credit. The next is the sub-accounts over-drawn; that is the accounts which he had paid without having any issue from the Exchequer for them. The next is the net amount at the Bank. The next is the total balances in his hand at the end of each of those fortnights. I find that those sub-accounts were overdrawn, which must have been services paid for, for which no Exchequer credit had been received and paid for from monies in his hand, which had been issued for other Exchequer credits. In every one of those cases there is a large amount, varying from 46,000 l. to 59,000 l.; and it appears that the practice of Mr. Sargent was exactly what the practice of the Pay-office now is, that he used the cash in hand and did not draw from the Exchequer when he was in cash, although he had a payment to make for a service for which he had no Exchequer credit standing in his books; your Lordship is not aware that that was his practice?—No; I am not in the least aware whether the question put rightly describes his practice; I consider that practice more authoritatively described in the Treasury Minute already referred to, but under any circumstances it would still guard the public against the possible application of those miscellaneous monies for the purposes of the great services; not one farthing could be so applied.

3089. Mr. Cardwell.] Supposing that it was his practice, do you think it was illegal?—Taking it to be as is represented to me now, if the effect of Mr. Sargent's mode of transacting his business was to enable him to pay money without a legal authority to pay that money, with funds out of which it could be paid legally, of course the same objection would apply to Mr. Sargent that applies at the

* In the Papers laid before this Committee by Sir Charles Trevelyan, there is contained in the Treasury Minute, 22 December 1848 (Papers, p. 88), the most authentic account of Mr. Sargent's system. It is as follows: "In this office separate bank accounts have been kept for every head of service under which he has been called on to make payments out of Exchequer credits. The consequence has been an unavoidable accumulation of credits at the Bank, as it has been necessary to keep every separate service in funds to meet the demands upon it. The care and attention required in paying from a multitude of funds, and in keeping numerous accounts of the transactions between the office and the Bank, have also occasioned great labour to guard against error." I refer also to the close of the same Minute, p. 90, in which the Treasury state their intention that "the departments of expenditure are to be restrained from any part of one specific grant in aid of any other specific grant."

the present moment to Mr. Anderson, with the exception that I have stated, that under no circumstances could the civil votes be applied for Army, Navy, or Ordnance purposes. It should be remembered that I have never before seen or considered the account now produced, and my answer is given hypothetically.

3090. Mr. Wilson.] Then, in that case, a return to the old system of separate Paymasters would not meet the objection which you have to the present practice in the Pay-office?—I must guard against the supposition, that I should even recommend a recurrence to the separate Paymaster system. I have not done so; on the contrary, I thought the consolidation a good thing, and I continue to think so, but it must be done with great earnestness and good faith on the part of both parties; the Treasury must co-operate with the Exchequer, and the Exchequer must co-operate with the Treasury, for the purpose of jointly carrying the law into effect, and preventing the occurrence of any misappropriation of public money.

3091. Did not you complain of the abolition of Mr. Sargent's office as leading necessarily to those irregularities?—No such thing whatever; quite the contrary, nor am I now prepared to admit that it has been proved that they existed at that time.

3092. If you have one paymaster you must, in order to carry out the views which your Lordship has with regard to the separation and specific appropriation of votes, keep them distinct accounts in the same way, though under one paymaster, as if you had three paymasters?—You must keep separate accounts; I presume that it is not doubted or denied that the gentlemen in the Pay Office do not keep those accounts in a proper manner, but the payments ought to be consistent with the accounts, that is what I contend; there need be no more accounts kept under that system than there are now, but a greater number of account books.

3094. Does not your Lordship perceive that no such adjustment could possibly take place if the issue had been made in excess of any of the votes of Parliament?—It could be adjusted if there was a saving upon another vote; the vote upon which there had been a saving might be applied to adjust the other account, but the system of adjustment and rectification is one against which I protest altogether; I deny its legality, and I see its pressing danger.

3095. The essential point is this, whether it is possible for the vote of Parliament to be exceeded in the year; now if that vote of Parliament had been exceeded, would it not be seen, at the close of the year, that that vote of Parliament had been exceeded, from whatever source the money had been received?—There would be a correct statement made at the close of the year upon that account, as I presume; but there are two accounts, and my complaint is that there are two systems of account kept, one is the real account and the other is the adjusted account, and I think we have experience enough to know that accounts so kept are capable of being adjusted at the end of the year.†

3096. Your Lordship stated that you had read Mr. Hoffay's evidence; did your Lordship observe that he was asked whether he would pay a sum of money demanded by any department, the navy for example, if there was not an unexpended balance to their vote; and he stated that if he had no monies in his hands, and there was none in the Exchequer, he should refuse?—He states that; but

* Such is my belief as to the consequence of unauthorised payments set right by subsequent rectifications. If, as I presume, the Paymaster's account for the auditors shows the rectified or adjusted account, that I conceive will differ, especially in dates, from the account of original payments.

† Take the Duke of Wellington's funeral; that account, I presume, is now adjusted, showing a balance unexpended of 25,000 l. But for a considerable time, when that balance was employed in other services, the funeral account must have been deficient by 25,000 l., and other services on which that sum was spent must have been 25,000 l. in excess of their authorised issues.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

30 June 1856.

but that is met by very contradictory evidence by other witnesses. Under the same circumstances, Mr. Anderson stated that he would and did pay it.*

3097. No such excess of the vote could take place without the excess upon the whole vote being seen in the accounts of the year?—It would not perhaps be possible, if the accounts that were laid before the Audit Board represented the real payments and not the adjusted accounts.

3098. Mr. Bowyer.] Supposing there was a saving upon one vote and an excess upon another, and the saving from one vote were applied to the excess upon the other vote, would that appear necessarily at the end of the year in the account?—I do not know how those accounts are kept. It is a mystery how they can be kept at all. But when I have before me an account which requires adjustment, carrying it into a new account, altering dates and mode of payment to come within the principle of adjustment, I cannot for the life of me understand how those accounts are kept with accuracy and correctness.

3099. In that case the total amount voted by Parliament for all the services would not be exceeded, but there would be a saving in the one case, which would be compensated by the excess upon the other?—Under any circumstances, there must be a column of misapplication for the service of each year to be set right when the adjustment is carried on.

3100. In point of fact the system prevents its appearing, at the end of the year, in the accounts, though there had been an excess?—I have great reliance in the Audit-office carrying into effect all its objects, if it is strengthened for the purpose of enabling it to do so. How far it can prevent this matter I cannot say. Mr. Anderson (Question 1092) seems to doubt this. He says, "There is no power under Sir J. Graham's system of audit to prevent excess beyond the votes, if the departments choose to exceed their grants. They have no discretion."

3101. Chairman.] Was it the habit of the Treasury to advance, in case it was required, from the civil contingencies, for any civil expense?—I have no doubt that it was; I should not hesitate for one moment in making any advance from the civil contingencies for current expenses that came, within my judgment, within the scope of that credit.

3102. In case there was an expense beyond the Exchequer credit, had not Mr. Sargent the power of advancing, from the civil contingencies, to meet the expense, and of setting it right afterwards?—I think perfectly so, because it would come before Parliament the next year, in his account of civil contingencies expenditure.

3103. I mean from time to time, taking any particular period: on June the 18th, supposing Mr. Sargent had monies on the civil contingencies in his hands, might it not have been in his power to have advanced, from the civil contingencies, to any of those votes, and, when drawing credits afterwards, to have repaid it to the civil contingencies?—Certainly, I should look upon that as a matter of ordinary and legitimate practice. Mr. Sargent had also a command over the Army Extraordinary Account, now called the Commissariat Chest.

3104. Mr. Wilson.] The funds of the civil contingencies is not used for purposes for which there are votes of Parliament and credits in the Exchequer, but for which there have been no votes of Parliament, or for which there is no Exchequer credit?—It might also be used in making up a deficiency of the Parliamentary vote when the vote has been entirely expended, and for a great variety of purposes, as will appear from the accounts laid before Parliament.

3105. I said for which there had been no Exchequer credits remaining?—I should look upon that as an irregularity.

* I refer to Question 1074: "The money issued for one service may, as a matter of necessity," he observes, "be applied to another." And being asked (1096), If anticipating demand for army services, a write-off having been obtained, and an immediate payment being required for navy, whether he would feel himself justified in making such payment out of money written off for army purposes, his answer is, "Certainly."

3106. Chairman.] WHAT paper does your Lordship hold in your hand?—I observe that in Question 1209, this statement is made by Mr. Anderson: "I should say that any one of those large offices kept a much larger balance than the aggregate balance at the present time kept by the Paymaster for the whole of the public service." This account shows these are the earlier balances from the year 1835, prior to the consolidation, marking what the balances are that are held by those great offices to which Mr. Anderson alludes; which paper I beg to hand in.

In the documents which are before the Committee, or which they can obtain, they will see what the balances are now.

3107. Mr. Wilson.] Those balances which you have put in, have reference only to the closing days of the quarters of each year?—Yes, it was at the close of them; not the closing days of the quarter under the new system. I was asked upon the previous day in relation to the acquittances, or the substitution of a new system for the acquittance. I wish to put in for explanation the form of the acquittance which was that given by the Exchequer before the change. The Committee will observe that it is not a mere form of acquittance for the payment of one gross sum; sometimes the Bank give it now, though I am informed they did not begin by giving it at first; there was some difficulty and impediment thrown in the way of their giving it; but my acquittance contained what, in point of fact, was an acquittance upon all the heads of account which are given. The accountant had to pay in to my account a series of payments, and the acquittance that he got from me, contained a full acquittance of all the facts, and was to him, (if he had to pass accounts with other parties,) a discharge not only of the gross sum, but it was an explanatory discharge of all the items of which that gross sum consisted. If the Committee will take any of these, they will explain the fact.

As to the Customs, Excise, Stamps, Taxes, and Post Office, there is no difficulty; the present system of Bank receipt is perfectly good for the revenue, but it ought to have been confined to these Government payments. I think it will so far work well. If you carry it beyond that, I think you will find great inconveniences, even if I am not wrong in point of law. I wish to call the attention of the Government to the fact, whether I am not still compellable by law to give those acquittances, if they are required. The Report states that "each party paying should have a legal right to demand from the Exchequer a receipt, in common language and figures, and according to a prescribed form, which should be admitted by the auditors of public accounts, and by all other persons, as a legal discharge for the payment so made to the Bank." That is the Report; and the Act of Parliament says that "the acquittance for all payments shall be made out in such forms as shall be decided upon by the Commissioners of the Treasury." I doubt whether the power which is reserved to the Treasury, in that and in a similar clause, allowing them to make regulations, we will say, for the form and manner, gives the Treasury the power of dispensing with the documents altogether. I believe that a just construction is, and I speak under the highest advice in stating this, that if an Act of Parliament gives the Treasury the power of making regulations by minute, it is to carry out that statute, but not to repeal any portion of it. I believe that is the case. Therefore I seriously recommend the Treasury to revise that question of specifications and acquittances. I am quite sure that their object is quite right, and can be accomplished without any violation of practice or of law; I think that, at the present time, both are very doubtful.

3108. Chairman.] Your acquittances state the dates of the payments in detail; the dates of the separate payments?—They state the period up to which they are paid, and in the body they state the exact periods of the payments.

3109. Then you have, in the acquittance of the Bank, only the sum total of the issues?—Only the sum total, not the particulars.

3110. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Will you point out to the Committee what is the provision of the Act of Parliament which you say the Treasury have attempted to repeal?—In the first clause of the Exchequer Act it states that acquittances for payment "shall be made out, signed, and delivered to the party making the payment, which shall be to such party a legal and sufficient discharge with the auditors of the public accounts and all other persons whomsoever." The form is afterwards prescribed under the Treasury Minute.

3111. Is this it: "And the other of such duplicates, vouched and signed by the said cashier or other officer as aforesaid, shall be returned by him to the person making the payment, who shall deposit the same with the said Comptroller of the Exchequer, by whom an acquittance shall be made out, signed, and delivered to the party making the payment, which shall be to such party a legal and sufficient discharge discharge with the auditors of the public accounts and all other persons whomsoever." That merely says, that he shall make an acquittance; it does not define it?—No, but I do not make one now. It is in the 11th clause: "and one of the said duplicates having been vouched and signed by the said cashier or officer as aforesaid, shall be returned to the party making the payment, in order to his thereupon obtaining from the Comptroller an acquittance in the manner hereinbefore directed, with respect to payments made by the tellers." I declined acting on the first suggestion made to me by the present Board of Treasury, considering the direction ultra vires. In this the Treasury acquiesced. You have taken the power by law to do that since.

* The example given is, however, of an Irish acquittance, which continues unchanged; but the principle applies to English acquittances also.

3112. You state that the Treasury have virtually repealed this?—Yes, but they got an Act of Parliament giving them more power to do it. I think the Act is the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 96. So that I am not stating that the Treasury have done anything contrary to law, but I state as a general principle that in taking powers under the Act of Parliament to make rules, those rules should be made within the limits of the statute. The question had been conceded by a former Board of Treasury, and in that instance Mr. Goulburn had the case before him to decide whether under the general rules he could get rid of the specification; he never dreamt of getting rid of the acquittances, but he took, I believe, the opinion of the law officers, who said, You have the power of making regulations, but it does not enable you, by a minute, to alter an Act of Parliament. Then there came afterwards a new law, giving you the power of varying acquittances and specifications, and you have acted under the new law. There is no doubt that you have the power at present. But it seems to me that parties are still entitled to demand my acquittances, and that I cannot legally refuse them. I only state that it is, as I think, an inconvenient matter for the public service that those special acquittances should have been dispensed with; so far as the revenue departments are concerned you save a great deal of trouble.

3113. Mr. Wilson.] You do not raise the question whether the regulation that has been made has, in point of fact, had the effect of repealing the Act of Parliament?—Not at all; I stated distinctly that I believe you have Parliamentary power for doing it, but I think you have misused that Parliamentary power as a matter of judgment; I mean mistaken it.

3114. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] You think that the original enactment is a more convenient practice than the practice which has been substituted?—On the contrary, I think that your new practice is very much better in its main respect; you were right in dispensing with all those things as affecting your own revenues; you had the control of them, but with respect to such payments of sub-accountants, London Bridge, corporations, and public bodies, as well as private parties, I think the Bank receipt is defective; and in relation to those kind of payments, I think you were wrong. The parties are now applying to me for acquittances under the old system, and I do not see how I can, in point of law, refuse them.

3115. Though we are wrong you do not say that it is contrary to law?—No; but I think it is very inconvenient in practice. The trouble of making out these acquittances falls on me; but I should strongly recommend, in justice to others, that the practice be resumed. The distinction between public and private parties in this respect is laid down by the Commissioners' Exchequer Report, and should be adhered to. (Report, p. 9.)

3116. Chairman.] As it at present stands the party making payment has no acquittance, showing the dates when the several payments were made?—No; they do not show the dates of the payments, nor those several payments at all.

3117. Mr. Wilson.] Do not the receipts at the Bank bear the date of payment?—Yes; of the total payment, but I am informed that the Chamberlain of London cannot get his accounts settled in the Chamber of London for a part of that account, which was no acquittance, and which the Bank of England cannot give.

3118. Does the Bank of England not give him a separate receipt for every sum paid in on each day?—For the whole sum on the day's payment, but it is on all those separate payments; and the Bank of England will, I presume to say, never keep that account for you.

3119. They do not cut the monies up?—No; I know in the account to the Exchequer they do not. I should add that in relation to the Bank of England itself, I always give the full acquittances, and so in respect to Irish payments. Our practice, therefore, is inconsistent.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

3 July 1856.

3120. Sir Henry Willoughby.] I understood your Lordship to say, assuming the Legislature is of opinion that the office of Comptroller-general is of importance, it would be more convenient to you to state in writing how that office can be made more effectual than at present, than by examination?—I could tell the Committee the general principles upon which I think it ought to be regulated, but it would be very jejune and unsatisfactory; it is a very large principle that is to be examined and applied and I should rather have the power of giving it in a written than in an oral shape, to be re-examined in respect to such statement, if necessary, by the Committee, or by any other authority.

3121. It has been stated that the chief check, or the only one, on the public expenditure, is by concurrent audit; is that your opinion?—I do not know so much how the concurrent audit, as it at present exists, really works. I see many defects connected with the audit system, as a single check. In the first place, from the delay which takes place under the audit, it would only bring such a transaction under the cognizance of Parliament, if anything went wrong, some 18 months after its occurrence, and however much I respect both Houses of Legislature, I know that the attention paid to a matter which has recently occurred or to one that occurred 18 months ago, is quite a different thing with respect to a remedy; besides which it acts after the payment complained of has taken place. The principle is to avoid the misapplication of the public money, not to correct it when it has taken place. By the evidence I see it stated that the auditor has no power of stopping anything that is wrong. The power in my office altogether consists in my having the immediate power of saying No. It is a very disagreeable monosyllable to pronounce, and still more disagreeable for public departments to hear; but that is the sole duty and control that is vested in me. If I do not perform it firmly and undeviatingly, to Parliament I am responsible.

3122. Has it ever occurred to your Lordship that the power of the Comptroller-general and the power of the Board of Audit could be in any way combined, so as to render the two powers more effectual?—I think they could, that, I presume, was the intention of Parliament, when it enacted, in the Exchequer Act, that I should quarterly transmit to the auditors my detailed accounts. I have felt it to be, as a matter of inference, the intention of Parliament in calling for those accounts that they should be made useful to the public, which they might be; and I have lately added to them one particular branch of information, which they formerly had not. I was directed to give them the amount of the Exchequer warrants, I have added to that the dates which were formerly wanting; therefore if the auditors had authority to inquire whether there had been payments made without three Exchequer warrants, or before their dates, upon the account of those services, they would at once be able to detect whether there was any unauthorised transaction going on in the Paymaster's department; but I do not believe that that function is imposed upon them. I believe they say that they have nothing to say to the appropriation whatever, excepting a qualified power applicable to the three great services there.

3123. Is it not one of the great defects of the position of the Comptroller-general that he is in ignorance of what takes place from time to time in the progress of the public expenditure?—No doubt that is so; but the great point as to which I can speak with sincerity, after a practice of many years, is, great public security will be allowed if the two departments, the Treasury, on the one hand, giving the direction, and the Exchequer, on the other, having to decide upon the legality of that payment, should act cordially and earnestly together, neither viewing the other antagonistically, but knowing that they ought to have but one object, which is, seeing that the law is obeyed, and the public service is carried on as Parliament intended it to be. I had the benefit of that co-operation for a great many years, and I believe very excellent consequences resulted from it. What is really wanting is, that the same system of appropriation now enforced to regulate the issue of public money should be strictly adhered to by the Paymaster in its distribution, and that the law should be reverentially obeyed.

3124. Has your Lordship no official knowledge of all that passes through the Bank of England?—I have only a knowledge of what relates to my own department; I know nothing else. The moment that money is paid from the Exchequer credit account to the Paymaster, I know nothing more about it, and whilst the money is in the hands of the Receiver-general of the revenue, I know nothing of it either; I only know that I am placed there to control it in its passage through the Exchequer.

3125. Would there be any difficulty in furnishing your Lordship with information mation of all that passes through the Bank of England: all the stated accounts?—That is a question rather for the Bank to answer better, I think, than I can. There are certain accounts at the Bank that would be, I presume, of very little service to me. I do get daily accounts and weekly periodical accounts from the Bank that keep me in possession of all that the Bank is doing in relation to my own functions; I have nothing but those accounts furnished to me by the Bank; the Bank returns are complete, if they are adhered to strictly; but you will see in the evidence that on one occasion the Bank endeavoured to adopt the plan of the Paymaster, and to consolidate, or as the phrase has it, to double up a good number of accounts. I objected at once to that proceeding; you will see it reported in the printed papers. The Bank admitted the force of my objection, and thus corrected a system which deprived me of all power of checking the particular payments, and they reverted to the older and better system; that was done cordially by the Bank the moment the objection was made. See Letters from Exchequer to Bank of England, 24th and 28th August 1846 (Papers, Appendix, p. 102).

3126. Practically you have no information now of what passes in the Pay-office?—None whatever, except as relating to the immediate concerns of my own department; as to what they do with the money, when carried to their drawing accounts, I know nothing; they may have in their hands money to any extent on the cash account, or employed for unauthorised purposes, which is practically speaking received by them for the Exchequer. I know nothing about it; I have not the power of calling it up; but as I have stated, I do know that this money is delayed much longer in its progress to the Exchequer under the present than under the old system, and during that time those monies are at the absolute control of the Paymaster. This evidently requires correction.

3127. Would there be any objection to your having weekly information of all that passes through the drawing account?—I do not see any objection to that; it may be possible, because I am so uninformed about the proceedings of the Paymaster, that I cannot speak with any authority. But if the Pay-office is to continue an office of receipt in its cash account, for sums not supplied from Exchequer credits, I should obtain information of the sums so received, and of the dates of all such receipts in order that I may see them transferred without delay; this will avert much misappropriation; I should thus know all that is received. I think this ought to be furnished from day to day, or at least three times a week by the Paymaster, showing the payments made to him on account of the Exchequer, which he is bound to hand over to me, and which ought to be returned to me without delay; the payments are of two kinds, one of monies which he receives in transitu for the Exchequer, and which ought to come to the Exchequer as soon as they are paid to the Paymaster; the others are monies payable to separate departments, and those ought to be handed over to those departments forthwith, but there ought to be no balance of unaccounted for monies left habitually in the hands of the Paymaster to his cash account.

3128. Mr. Williams.] Your Lordship has been good enough to promise that you will furnish the Committee with your opinion in writing as to the best means of protecting the payment of public monies in all the departments?—There is no direction that the Committee can give me that I shall not endeavour faithfully to fulfil, because I consider myself as a Parliamentary officer, and responsible to Parliament; and therefore I feel that I am not setting aside the authority of the Crown in any degree by endeavouring to make out for this Committee, or for either House of Parliament, any statement they may require me to prepare.

3129. Mr. Bowyer.] Are the Committee to understand that it is your Lordship's opinion that the Exchequer should be furnished with an account, from time to time, of the payments made by the Paymaster from his drawing account?—That was not my statement; I stated that I should think it was right if the Paymaster was to furnish me from day to day, or three times a week at the least, with an account of all sums which had been received by him to his cash account, and which he was bound to pay over to the Exchequer; that I think is essential.

3130. Those sums consisting of repayments for stores?—By no means limited to repayments; on the contrary, there may be some sums which are repayable to the Exchequer with others, like payments from the Board of Works, and other payments of that description, which are payments in which the Paymaster acts as banker for other departments, as to which it is essential that the Exchequer and the Treasury should see that he complies with the terms of his trust by by paying into the Exchequer, without delay, all that he has received for the use of the Exchequer. I hold in my hand a paper which shows the delays which had taken place in consequence of transferring to the Pay-office payments which were formerly paid direct by the accountants. This is all made out from the Exchequer books, and if the Committee wish to have it I will put it in.

3131. Does not your Lordship think it would be convenient that payments should be made directly into the Exchequer, with notice to the departments to which they appertain?—The old system was in this respect infinitely better than the new; I think that when payments were made direct by the Board of Works, it was better than directing the Board of Works to pay direct to the Paymaster's-office, and that he should pay to the Exchequer; there was as much facility in the Board of Works paying to me as paying to the Paymaster, the double operation was avoided, and the possibility of misappropriation in the pay office checked.

3132. With regard to repayments, such as of the produce of the sale of stores, does not your Lordship think that in substance those repayments should be treated as revenue paid into the Exchequer, and not to the Paymaster?—The produce of old stores is paid to the Paymaster, and by the Paymaster repaid to the Exchequer; I observe this, because evidently it must be a mistake in Mr. Anderson's evidence, from which persons would conclude, as the Honourable Member has who puts the question, that it was paid to me by the accountant of the navy; it is paid by the Paymaster.

3133. I understood Mr. Anderson to state that the produce of the sale of stores does go back into the Exchequer; I want to know whether your Lordship's opinion is not that the produce of the sale of stores should be repaid into the Exchequer, and not through any department?—I should doubt very much whether old stores do not constitute repayments of a particular character; I formerly received direct repayments from London Bridge; and in similar cases I could undertake that duty; but if I, as the Comptroller of the Exchequer, were to take upon myself to pass any judgment whether the sums for old stores were right or wrong, I could not do it; it is not a fixed sum, nor have I any knowledge whatever that would enable me to ascertain whether the sum was the right sum or not. I believe the proceeds of the sale of old stores, so far as I can ascertain, is very correctly paid; that is to say, it is very regularly paid into the Exchequer at the time fixed on the part of the Paymaster; I believe it is very well done. If the amount of the old stores to be paid in, were first to be checked by parties conversant with such transactions, it would be better it should be paid directly to me than circuitously.

3134. With regard to the repayments between the departments, is it your Lordship's opinion that those repayments should be made direct into the Exchequer?—If my notions of right and wrong with respect to Exchequer administration were enforced, the repayments to departments would be very much limited; as long as you have a system by which one department assists another, that there is borrowing on the one side and lending on the other, you will have a complicated system of repayments going on affording facility for irregularity; but if that is put an end to by the enforcement of what I consider the legal regulations upon the subject, you will still have repayments in the way of drafts from foreign stations; those are to be dealt with through the Commissariat Chest account.

3135. Is your Lordship of opinion that there should be any, and what control upon the drawing account of the Paymaster-general?—I should prefer giving no answer upon that, on the grounds I have already stated. I really do not know the details of the Paymaster-general's office, but I should think, as long as it consists of a drawing account fed indiscriminately from two funds, the one the Exchequer credit account and the other the cash account, and that into that cash account a variety of miscellaneous payments enters, there should be a very strict check put upon the drawing account and the cash account both; whether that is administered so strictly now, the evidence is so conflicting, that I can hardly myself know.

3136. I mean especially whether there should be any control, or could be any control, for the purpose of preventing that which your Lordship has described as misappropriation by the Paymaster-general?—That would raise the question of a concurrent audit with respect to the drawing account, and I should like to know more, and to have before me the evidence of the auditors in respect to the effectiveness of their check over the three great services, before I can express an

an opinion whether the mere extension of that system to the Civil Votes would be very effective or not. I doubt its being so effective as one could wish in the present state of the functions of the Audit Board.

3137. Your Lordship is not prepared to make any suggestions as to any control over the drawing account of the Paymaster-general?—I should rather reserve that until I see the evidence completed.

3138. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Supposing the cash account at the Paymaster's-office were got rid of altogether, partly by provisions of an Act of Parliament, and partly by regulations of the Treasury, and the regulations as to the drawing account remained as they are at present, and if the Paymaster appropriated no sums of money from the drawing account for which there was not an Exchequer credit standing, would a plan of that sort fulfil your Lordship's views as to specific appropriation in the Paymaster's-office?—It seems to me that that would fulfil them perfectly; but I think one must see what arrangements would be made concurrently with that for the payments of the Commissariat Chest accounts which must come without an Exchequer credit.

3139. The Commissariat Chest account has always stood as a separate account, has it not?—Certainly.

3140. Confining yourself at present to the four accounts in the Paymaster's-office, if three accounts stood, the Exchequer credit account, the drawing account, and the bill account, and if proper arrangements were made by which the cash accounts were extinguished and the system were conducted upon that principle, would your views as to the specific appropriation of the issues of the public money be satisfied?—It would be a great step in advance. In that way the Paymaster would have no monies in his hands except the Commissariat Chest monies, the contingent fund and the Exchequer credit fund; but I think it would require a great deal of consideration to see in what manner it could be realised.

3141. Do you believe that a plan of that sort would lead to an increase in the amount of the balances in the Pay-office?—Not in that step of the chain, but in the steps that might be consequent upon that it perhaps might.

3142. Mr. Anderson stated, did he not, that he believed that the cash account fund might in a year of peace be taken at about 2,300,000 l.; and he said that of that sum 2,000,000 l. consisted of repayments, and 300,000 l. of revenue?—Yes.

3143. With regard to repayments it is clear, is it not, that according to the present law the departments cannot venture to repay to the Exchequer, because they would diminish their vote by an equal amount?—Yes; if they paid it back to the Exchequer simply, to the general Exchequer account. But perhaps it might be paid over to a secondary Exchequer account for repayment or transfer of advances, or lodgments on account of specific departments, to insure its application to those uses and to no other.

3144. If they paid it back to the Exchequer they could not get it out again?—No.

3145. Therefore that would diminish their vote pro tanto?—Yes.

3146. In order to enable the advances made by departments for another department, or for any public service to be repaid into the Exchequer, it would be necessary to alter the law?—Certainly, alterations in the law would be requisite.

3147. If the law were altered, and if a charge were made by a nominal payment into the Exchequer, would that in your opinion necessarily lead to any increase of the balances in the Paymaster's office?—No; I do not think it would.

3148. Then we should have only to deal with about 300,000 l.?—Yes; assuming those figures to be right.

3149. Chairman] I see that in answer to questions put to Mr. Anderson, he states that all the business, excepting the preparation of Exchequer bills, and the small duties connected with the weights and measures, might be transacted by one junior clerk, and that if he allowed two clerks to do the whole business, he thought that that would be a very exaggerated estimate; in the first place, will you allow me to ask you, whether the preparation of Exchequer bills could safely be moved from the Exchequer office to the Treasury or to the Bank?—Mr. Anderson makes that suggestion, and he makes it as based upon the report of the Commissioners; I mean the original Commission of Inquiry; but he omits altogether, in repeating their recommendation, to say that they felt the necessity, even if that transfer was made, of preserving the Exchequer control, and they required that before the Exchequer bills were put into circulation after they were made out at the Treasury, they should in every instance receive the signature of the Comptroller of the Exchequer.

3150. That each separate Exchequer bill should receive that signature?—Yes. Therefore, according to their recommendation, there was a double operation carried on in two different departments, still preserving the control of the Exchequer as against any undue issue on the part of the Executive Government.

3151. Therefore the Report of 1831, though it recommended the transfer of the preparation to the Treasury, still retained the control of the Exchequer, and left to the Comptroller of the Exchequer nearly as much labour as he would have now?—So far as he is concerned, quite as much. It was evidently an operose and complicated plan. The plan under which the Exchequer bills are now issued was prepared by me originally, and was adopted by Sir Robert Peel's Government, on communication with the Commissioners that were then sitting; and Mr. Goulburn described it in Parliament, in the year 1843, on the 22d of February, "that the precautions taken were such as he believed would place the bills beyond the skill of the most ingenious person to repeat the forgery." This was a short time after the forgeries of Mr. Beaumont Smith. "The regulations now adopted," he said, "with respect to the Exchequer bills, were such as, in his opinion, would render the forgery of them impossible, even though the same combination of individuals and circumstances that had existed in the recent case should again occur." If the Committee desire it, I can describe to them what the system is, which will measure the labour of making out the bills.

3152. You know the labour of preparing Exchequer bills and signing them; do you think that the Treasury could perform that duty without increasing its staff, and without encroaching upon the time of those higher officers who would have to sign the Exchequer bills?—It would be entirely impossible, unless the Treasury business is very different from what it was in my time. The difficulty that arises out of the preparation and signing of Exchequer bills is, that it creates an increased demand for work at particular times of the year, that is at the times of the exchange; and therefore, in every department that is charged with occasional work of this kind, you must keep your supply of labour up to its maximum. You therefore have, in order to be able to do your work at one season, somewhat more hands than may be required at another season; but the Treasury, in my judgment, no more could undertake, in addition to their present functions, to prepare and issue Exchequer bills, than they could fly; they must have an increase.

3153. The Commissioners of 1831 proposed to retain the control of the issue of Exchequer bills in the Exchequer, although the preparation of them was transferred to the Treasury. Do you believe that the preparation, signing, and issue of Exchequer bills could be safely placed in the Treasury, without the control of the Exchequer?—I think that a more dangerous plan, upon constitutional grounds, could scarcely be contemplated or adopted. I think that to give to the Executive Government at any time the power of making out exchangeable securities, transferable from hand to hand, and payable to bearer upon the plan of our unfunded debt, and of issuing them without an independent check or control, would be one of the most dangerous steps that could be taken; more especially since the introduction of late years of new practices with respect to Exchequer bills. I allude to large purchases of bills by the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt on account of savings banks, together with the power given to these Commissioners, or in reality to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, of funding them at discretion. To the proposal of retaining those powers of funding, with an unchecked power of making out those securities, I think the constitutional objection is both obvious and insuperable.

3154. Will you explain to the Committee how you suppose that it would work injuriously?—For instance, amongst the cases of control which are now before the Committee, there is one as to which the Treasury pressed me exceedingly to issue Exchequer bills for them before those Exchequer bills were legally issuable. I declined doing so, and the Treasury acquiesced in my objection. I am not prepared to suggest that when they pressed me to do that they were quite aware that what they required was contrary to law. It was on the 21st day of March 1854 that that I had the honour to receive a letter from the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, who states: "I find from Mr. Anderson that he has seen Mr. Ottey, and that he learns that there is some doubt on your Lordship's mind as to the legality of any issue from the 1,750,000 l. of Exchequer bills to be authorised by the Bill now in the House of Lords, before the new financial year begins. We have already been obliged to send money abroad (with the due formalities previously gone through), the expenditure of which belongs to 1854-55; and it is highly necessary that I should have the means of meeting those demands, should it seem fit, by appropriations of these Exchequer bills. If, therefore, your Lordship entertains such a doubt, will you kindly supply me, at your earliest convenience, with the grounds on which it rests, that the matter may be put in course to be cleared up." My answer is given on the 22d of March, the day following, in which I state: "The Exchequer bills now voted are, therefore, legally issuable only for the purposes of the year, from 1st April 1854 to 31st March 1855. You will find this principle laid down in my correspondence." Then I add: "I do not quite understand your statement that you have been obliged to send money abroad for expenditure of 1854-55, 'the due formalities being previously gone through.' No Exchequer warrant either has, or in my mind could, be granted to that effect." I refused to make this issue. I doubt whether a Treasury clerk holding during pleasure would have done so 3155. I put this case: supposing the Treasury were to go beyond its duty, and to issue an amount of Exchequer bills not authorised by Act of Parliament; and, supposing they were to issue them so as to get into the hands of the Comptroller of the National Debt, and they were then converted into stock under the Act of Parliament, as savings banks' money, how would that be checked by the Commissioners of Audit?—I am not aware how it would be checked; I am not sufficiently familiar with their proceedings. I see the inconvenience that might arise, an inconvenience greatly increased in consequence of such purchase and sales of stock on the part of the national debt or savings banks.

3156. Do you know of any means, so far as you know the practice of the Audit-office, by which that would come under the control of the Audit Board?—I doubt its coming under control of the auditors at all.

3157. Would it appear in any shape in the finance account, so as to call for the attention of Parliament?—It would appear in the finance accounts, in the statement of the national debt, showing the increase or diminution of the funded and unfunded debt; that is an item in the finance accounts, but I have found out at least one serious irregularity in this branch of the accounts which greatly diminishes my confidence in their correctness in past times. I found out a statement made to Parliament of 25,000 l. returned year by year, by the former department of Paymaster of Exchequer bills, as an amount of bills outstanding; upon investigation, I found that that was a pure delusion, and that no such bills were outstanding or overdue, but that there had been a disputed account between the Treasury and the Paymaster of Exchequer bills, and that it was agreed, at a remoter period, to write off the amount of the disputed account, by charging it as Exchequer bills outstanding and overdue, to the extent of 25,000 l.; but no such bills existed, and the whole thing was a delusion. The Committee will find all that stated in the correspondence that I have laid before them. I state this as showing the necessity of having some check over this branch of the public service.

3158. That circumstance, so far as you are aware, was not brought out by the Commissioners of Audit?—Not according to the regular form of business; but after an inquiry carried on by myself, I begged the Treasury to refer it to the Commissioners of Audit, and they did so; and there is a report of the Commissioners of Audit upon the subject, which shows to me that their powers were inadequate for pursuing such an investigation.

3159. That was checked when the Exchequer bills were transferred to your office, was it not?—It was checked in my office in the duties connected with the Exchequer bill department.

3160. To return to the evidence of Mr. Anderson: it was stated by him that, removing from your office the special duties connected with the weights and measures, two clerks might do the whole business, and that that was a very exaggerated estimate: is that your opinion of the duties of your office?—I can only state that it is entirely at variance with my own positive experience: and if the Committee will do me the honour of inspecting the office, and seeing the duties my establishment is called upon to fulfil, I think they will agree with me in opinion. I am sure that Mr. Anderson made that statement, believing it to be perfectly true, but I believe he spoke without adequate information.*

3161. Has Mr. Anderson ever been to your office?—Not that I know of; I can quite imagine a person not understanding the matter to be led astray.

3162. In 1848, do you remember that in consequence of some difficulty in obtaining Parliamentary sanction to an increase of the income tax, the Estimates that were laid upon the Table by the Government were taken back for reconsideration; and upon that occasion all the Miscellaneous Estimates were gone through; at that time was a consideration given to your establishment?—That was the case, but perhaps it might be better, in the first instance, to state how the establishment was originally formed. It was formed by a very economical Secretary of the Treasury at the time, the Right honourable Gentleman who is now in the Chair, and the establishment was fixed upon full consideration.

3163. Did the Commission make any recommendation as to the amount of the establishment?—Yes; the Commission gave a recommendation, and that recommendation has been acted upon, except that the establishment has been rather reduced by myself since that period. At page 16 of the Paper before the Committee, is the following statement of the Exchequer establishment;

		PER ANNUM.
	£. s. d.	£. s. d.

The Commissioners have not here adverted to the Weights and Measures department, and they recommended a transfer to the Treasury of the duty of preparing Exchequer bills. I hold in my hand the establishment settled in 1834, and as it now is. Of course there are increases of salaries to some of the clerks, by reason of length of service; but there has been no other increase of salaries, with the exception of 100 l. a year to the chief clerk, upon the annexation of the whole of the Irish business to the English business, which was not contemplated at the time of this report; that added about one-third part to the business of the department, which has been executed with an increase of only 100 l. a year. That the salaries are below those in other departments will appear from the paper I put in. I have, on full consideration, recommended an increase myself, so far as certain individuals are at present concerned. The paper shows the correspondence respecting the establishment, and the work done.

Vide Appendix.

3164. Then the Committee who arranged the duties and recommended the amount of the establishment for your office, did not consider that the duties could be performed by two clerks?—Certainly not; and they had carefully investigated the business.

3165. You stated that there was a reconsideration in 1848 by the Treasury; was there any alteration made in your establishment on that occasion?—No, there was not; in 1848, it was also considered by a Committee of the House of Commons.

3166. Those amended estimates were referred to a Committee of the House of

* In recommending the transfer of the Weights and Measures department to the Mint, he ought to have known that I had made that recommendation to the Treasury. The Mint reported strongly against it, and on their authority it was abandoned.

of Commons?—Yes: and a Committee of the House of Commons reported (though Mr. Anderson seems not to have noticed it), that they had no objection to offer to the scale of the establishment, but they considered it moderate and reasonable, or some term to that effect. The words of the Report are, "The Committee have examined into the establishment of the Comptroller-general of the Exchequer, and do not find any extravagant amount of persons or of emolument."

3167. Up to the time when you appeared before this Committee, had you from the Treasury any reason to suppose that two clerks could do the duties of your office, and that your establishment was extravagantly large?—On the contrary, I had been asked in common with other departments, by circular, whether I thought it admitted of diminution; I suggested to them the diminution of I think two or three of the inferior persons connected with the office; a messenger and a watchman; watchmen being required from the amount of Exchequer Bills that we occasionally have on hand; I recommended the reduction of one clerk, and the reduction, I think, of the three other subordinate officers I have alluded to; thus far it has been reduced at my own suggestion. The Treasury also asked me on one occasion whether in their press of business I could lend them the services of some of my clerks. I said that it was impossible for me to lend them during the time of the Exchequer bill exchange, but that when that was over I should be very happy to do so, and I could do it without public inconvenience. I was never asked to carry that offer into effect, but I do not think if the business remains as it is, it could be carried into effect upon a lower establishment than my present one during our bill business. I am sure that neither I nor any one in his senses could believe that it could be carried on with an establishment of two clerks; but I see the mistake that Mr. Anderson has made; he is unacquainted with the peculiar practices of our office, or how much it involves beyond transcription or entering of accounts.

3168. Since the time when the establishment was recommended by the Committee, and sanctioned by the Treasury, have the duties of your office been increased by the addition of the Irish business?—The whole of the Irish business has been added to the office, which has been a great improvement for the public service, and not more than the public have a right to cast upon the Exchequer. We might do more business at the Exchequer, it is quite true, during a great part of the year, but when called at once to execute our general functions and to make out Exchequer bills, we could not undertake more business than at present executed. I was obliged to decline attending this Committee during that period; I could not have done it.

3169. I was not speaking of your Lordship's own duties, but of the duties of the subordinates in the establishment?—It applies quite as much to them as to me. I beg to lay before the Committee a list of the books and accounts; of all our books, which are kept in the most regular order, and of which I am quite sure Mr. Anderson could not have been aware, when he gave that opinion. I should be glad if he were asked whether he knew what accounts were kept in my office. (The same was delivered in.)

Vide Appendix.

3170. When you were at the Treasury the Miscellaneous Estimates were submitted, were they not, by the Treasury, for the sanction of Parliament?—Yes, certainly.

3171. Was it not your duty at the time that you were Secretary of the Treasury, and of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to investigate whether the establishments demanded by the several departments were beyond what they thought necessary?—The estimates for Army, Navy, and Ordnance were for the most part a matter of Cabinet arrangement, and the force to be kept up was a matter of which I, whilst Secretary of the Treasury, knew nothing, excepting from the instruction of my superiors. But as to the duty of the Treasury in itself to superintend all the preparation of estimates, I had always understood, certainly practised as Chancellor of the Exchequer, that communications were held with the Cabinet Ministers at the heads of those departments, with all those departments in respect to their estimates; and when a change was to be made; when large ordnance works, for example, were to be executed; when the army was to be remodelled in its armament, as by adopting detonators in place of flint and steel guns, the increased estimate was settled between Sir Hussey Vivian and myself. Before the estimates were prepared he came and explained what the

3 July 1856.

the cost would be, and all that was agreed to at the Treasury before the cost was incurred, and so with respect to ordnance works.

3172. With regard to those estimates, though they must receive the sanction of the Treasury before they are submitted to Parliament, the respective departments are supposed to be primarily responsible for the estimates?—Yes.

3173. With regard to the Miscellaneous Estimates, was it not the impression, when you were at the Treasury, that the Treasury was responsible for those estimates when they laid them on the table of the House?—It was not only the impression of the Treasury, but the practice of the Treasury.

3174. Is not that the constitutional view of it?—I think that the departments have to make suggestions, but that those suggestions are to be considered and adopted, rejected or modified by the Treasury, and that the Treasury is ultimately responsible for those estimates. Indeed any alteration of the establishments requires the consent, and is thus brought under the responsibility of the Treasury. Even the departments which require the sanction of an Order in Council, such as the Secretary of State, the Privy Council, and the Board of Trade, must first make out their case, as far as relates to money, before the Treasury. Acting upon that principle, the Government of Lord Grey took out of the hands of the Irish Government, which up to that period had prepared the Irish estimates, the whole of those estimates, and placed them under Treasury responsibility, and produced some of the largest and most efficient reforms, in consequence of that change, that had been effected; I believe that to be the course now; I believe that Lord Monck and Mr. Stephenson were employed by the Treasury this very year most usefully, in going over to Ireland, in revising a large establishment, which was to be provided for by the estimates. I never heard a doubt upon this subject. The mistake into which Mr. Anderson has fallen is a mistake in assuming that everything that is done at the Exchequer is purely done arithmetically, and that a certain number of signatures or of papers will represent the amount of the work done; that is entirely an error. I hold in my hand the Consolidated Fund Warrants for the past quarter, which are few in number, comparatively speaking; and Mr. Anderson, or anyone, being a mere cursory examiner, would consider that the duty was represented by the number of those warrants which I hold in my hand. I beg to submit one to the Committee (producing the same). This is the warrant for the Courts of Justice; it is but one warrant, it is true, but the Committee will observe that it consists of a document of six printed pages, going into the details, containing the names of all the parties receiving public money, on this head of services, from the Consolidated Fund, the amount that they receive, and the Act of Parliament under which they claim that amount, and every one of them must be regularly checked every quarter in order to ascertain the legality of those payments. There is a Scotch Warrant (producing the same), which will exemplify the same thing. It is through the medium of these returns that my control is exercised over this branch of the service. Every change that takes place must be entered in these warrants, and the authority must be produced to justify that change in every instance whatever in which a change is made. Each entry therefore becomes a separate question of individual control. I believe that is the mistake that was made. Mr. Anderson also states that the Exchequer communicated merely with the Treasury and the Bank of England. This is a list of nine several departments with whom we have communication.

[The same was delivered in, and is as follows:]

Bank of Ireland.	Paymaster-general.
Paymaster of Civil Services, Ireland.	Commissioners of National Debt.
Commissioners of Public Works, Ireland.	Commissioners of Woods, &c.
	Commissioners of Works, &c.
	Inclosure Commissioners.
	Master of the Mint.
Bank of England.	Revenue Departments.
Treasury.	Commissioners of Audit.

Again, under the old system of the Exchequer, there was formerly one Royal Warrant for each vote in the miscellaneous services. There is the Royal signature, and here is the counter-signature (exhibiting a Paper). Now, by the change lately made, which I think a very good one, the Treasury, in place of having perhaps 150 to 200 separate Royal Warrants, insert a whole series of votes votes in one document bearing one sign manual, which lessens the work of the Treasury in transcribing all those warrants; but to me the result is the same, for I have to consider the legality of all those separate votes upon the consolidated warrant, exactly the same as if I had them all as separate instruments. Therefore, the Treasury have adopted a change, which I think a very wise and sensible one, but it does not diminish the labour, the responsibility, or the authority of the Comptroller.

3175. Mr. Wilson.] The separation of those individual votes is merely a comparison of them with the Appropriation Act?—It is a comparison of them with the Appropriation Act in instances in which the Appropriation Act is carried into effect, but that would not be always conclusive; for there may be, for instance, a sum voted, and if the whole sum was to be drawn, in circumstances where the contingency under which that vote became due had not occurred, supposing, for example, that the vote was passed to provide for a department that had been abolished, I should not issue the money.

3176. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] What are the subjects of correspondence in general with other departments, besides the Bank and the Treasury?—They are varied. I have merely extracted a list of all the books here, which I have given in; with some of these departments the correspondence is infrequent. I have besides a miscellaneous correspondence with private individuals; the correspondence with many of those is but short and occasional, but still it is a correspondence which takes place between me and those departments and individuals occasionally; the whole particulars are open to the Committee; the books are in the room, and at their command.

3177. You are doubtless aware that a feeling prevails in the City that it would be desirable to dispense with the system of making periodical exchanges of Exchequer bills; do you believe it would be possible to devise any plan by which the necessity of effecting those exchanges could be avoided, and the same bills allowed to run on without exchange?—It was thought possible that that question might be asked, and therefore I was reminded to bring down a paper upon that subject. Mr. Gladstone wrote to me on the 17th of May this note: "Will you kindly look at the enclosed paper of suggestions by Mr. Masterman, and comments by Mr. Anderson, with respect to the presentation annually of Exchequer bills, and the payment of the interest upon them. It is not distinctly stated, but I conclude, as matter of course, that it is not meant to alter the maturity of the bills at 12 months. At your convenience you will perhaps kindly let me know in what light these suggestions strike you." Here is Mr. Masterman's suggestion, here is Mr. Anderson's report, and here is the report which I addressed to Mr. Gladstone on the subject, which I can put in; it will give the Committee the fullest information that I can offer them on that subject; the subject deserves consideration, though it is encompassed with more difficulties than would at first appear. Possibly from a consideration of those difficulties, or from some other cause, I never heard upon the subject from the Treasury again. I now beg to hand in those papers. (The same were delivered in.)

Vide Appendix.

3178. Mr. Hankey.] How many clerks are employed in the arrangement of Exchequer bills previous to their issue?—Previously to their issue, we have three that are specially connected with the Exchequer bill department; but they are also employed on the general business of the office at the time that the Exchequer bills are not in progress of execution; when the period of exchange comes I not only require all three, but others of the clerks into the bargain.

3179. At the period of the exchange of Exchequer bills, are there three clerks who are fully occupied in that business?—Yes, fully; and they could not complete the business without additional help.

3180. That is independent of your Lordship and the Deputy Comptroller?—And independent of some of the other clerks that are removed from the account department to assist them.

3181. How many clerks are employed in the Exchequer office exclusively on that business at the period of the annual exchange, or about how many?—There are six in all; there are three withdrawn from the other departments in addition to the three that belong to the Exchequer Bill Department, but not for the whole of each day.

3182. How much time is occupied by yourself and the Deputy Comptroller of the Exchequer in signing Exchequer bills?—The time is a limited time, because it is limited by the amount which the printer can furnish me with in the day; we sign in a day all that the printers, Perkins and Co., can furnish us with in in a complete state; we never leave bills unsigned; we complete the work within the day. Every stage of the proceeding, from the making of the paper to the printing, sealing, counter signature, record, delivery of bills, counterfoils, and registries, are completed under our own responsibility.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

3 July 1856.

3183. Do you remember how many Exchequer bills you can yourself sign in a day?—Yes, I think generally speaking about 1,500 bills are prepared in one day; we sign them generally in even quantities; one half I sign and one half the Assistant Comptroller signs; about 1,500 is the average number that Perkins and Heath furnish me with in the day; that is 750 daily for the Comptroller, and the same number for the Assistant Comptroller.

3184. Then 750 each is about as many, in accordance with the arrangements for the printing, as can be conveniently signed in one day?—In accordance with the arrangements made with the printers, and with the sealing, the cutting, and separating the counterfoil of the register, and binding up those separate documents, and depositing them in a complete state upon the registry being closed. The rules for executing these duties have been laid before Parliament, and will be found in the Sessional Papers.

3185. Suppose the annual amount to be the ordinary average, how many days would be occupied in signing Exchequer bills by your Lordship and your deputy at the rate of 1,500 Exchequer bills a day?—I can furnish the Committee at once with that return; it was communicated to Parliament for about six or eight successive years; I can let you have an exact return of the whole of the business done.

Vide Appendix.

3186. You stated, did you not, that you considered it very unconstitutional and dangerous for the Treasury to have the power of issuing Exchequer bills; is it not generally supposed that the check against a larger amount of issue of bank notes by the Bank of England than the law allows is now quite sufficient to prevent any excess of issue by that establishment?—I cannot undertake to say what the public opinion is, neither do I know whether the Bank of England acting jointly as a court of directors, in which each acts as a check upon the other, could by possibility, if so inclined, which I am far from suggesting, violate the law in this respect.

3187. Has your Lordship ever heard it suggested that the Bank of England would issue a larger amount of bank notes than is allowed?—I have never heard it suggested, and if I had I should not believe it.

3189. I meant, if the Treasury were to issue Exchequer bills, without any reference to the Exchequer, do you consider, in a constitutional point of view, that there would be any greater risk of an undue and illegal issue of Exchequer bills, than in a constitutional point of view is now involved in the right or power of the Bank of England to issue a larger amount of notes than is sanctioned by Act of Parliament?—I do not see any constitutional question that enters into the Bank question at all; there is a constitutional question that enters into the action of the Government, and I agree with the Commissioners of Public Accounts, whose names have been already before the Committee, namely, Sir H. Parnell, Sir James Graham, Sir Francis Baring, Mr. Ellice, Lord John Russell, the late Sir James Kemp, and Mr. Poulett Thomson, that if the power of making bills were to be transferred to the Treasury, it would be necessary, on constitutional grounds, that the Exchequer check should be still exercised by requiring the Exchequer counter-signature. The words of the Report are as follow: "to prevent the issue of any Exchequer bills beyond the amount authorised by Parliament, it should be provided that every such bill be countersigned at the Exchequer before it can obtain a legal currency." (Report, p. 16.)

3190. Are not both issued under direct Acts of Parliament?—They are.

3191. Are you aware of anything to prevent the Bank of England now issuing beyond the limit prescribed by the Act of Parliament; beyond the necessary weekly publication so prescribed?—I know of nothing else. It is in the integrity of their returns that the public get a security that the law has been obeyed.

3192. Would it not appear to follow that a similar check might be used to prevent an undue issue of Exchequer bills by the Treasury, if under their control, to that which is now in existence with regard to Bank of England notes, which are regulated by Act of Parliament?—The constitution of England is founded on a jealousy of the Executive Government, and therefore checks are required in dealing with the action of the Government, which a commercial company, like the Bank of England, may not in any respect require. I think that a constitutional check is necessary, and as the best proof of its being necessary, I can hardly conceive the possibility of the public enduring that the Government should have an unrestricted power of creating Three per-cents.; and whether it is the power of creating Three per-cents. or Exchequer bills without some check, and without some control, I can see no difference between the one and the other.

3193. A paper was put before this Committee, I believe by Mr. Hoffay, which stated that in 1849 a letter was written from the Bank of England, dated the 8th of February, suggesting an improved mode of keeping the accounts at the Bank of England with regard to Exchequer credits, and stating that if the accounts were kept in the same way as every other account at the Bank of England is kept, the number of entries respecting every account would be reduced from eight or eleven to three entries; is your Lordship aware of such a paper having been sent from the Bank of England to the Treasury in 1849?—Yes, I am, by the paper which I have read; but the fact was altogether new to me.

3194. Since that period, 1849, has the subject been considered at the Exchequer in connexion with the Treasury?—Not at the Exchequer; but the subject was previously raised at the Exchequer in an incidental case. The suggestion of the Bank has never been adopted, and it is my opinion that it would be a dangerous thing for this country if it were. It might be, I admit, convenient to the Bank, but it would deprive the Government and the public of the security and check the Bank accounts now provide them. The Bank or the Paymaster at one time endeavoured to effect an object of this kind of their own authority. I called their attention to the fact, 24th August 1846, and informed them that it was contrary to usage and to law; that it deprived me of the check which the constitution of my office gave me; and the Bank acquiesced in that statement, and resumed the practice to which I had called their attention. The correspondence will be found in the Appendix to the Exchequer Memorandum, p. 102.

3195. Does your Lordship think it is desirable for the Treasury to employ the Bank to ascertain the appropriation of the money to their proper accounts in detail?—I think it is essential for the Treasury to see that the Bank of England, which is remunerated for its services to the State, should in return for that remuneration keep its accounts with the Government in the manner which the public convenience and the public safety require.

3196. I infer from that answer that your Lordship considers it is essential for the public safety, and for the convenience of the Treasury, that the accounts should be kept in that detailed form which is now in use, and has been in use, notwithstanding the suggestion made by the Bank of England?—I think that is absolutely necessary so far as relates to the accounts to which I now refer, and to which I limit my observation; and it seems to me that the Bank are of my opinion. A letter was written by me on the 24th of August 1846 to the Governor and Deputy-Governor of the Bank of England, in which I state: "I beg leave to call your attention to the Exchequer account of the Paymaster-general, as to the mode in which the balance on his accounts is returned by you to this office in your quarterly statement of balances of public accountants. In the statements alluded to, one general balance is given on the Paymaster-general's accounts kept at the Bank of England; by the 23d section of the Act 4 Will. 4, c. 15, the balances on each head of service, according to credits granted by the Comptroller-general, are required to be stated in the accounts transmitted annually from this department to Parliament. I have therefore to request that in future you will give directions for the Exchequer balance to be so stated separately, separately, as to enable me effectually to comply with the provisions of the said Act." The answer was immediate, on the 28th of August, to this effect : "My Lord,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Lordship's letter of the 24th instant, suggesting certain alterations in the present mode of returning the balances of the Exchequer account of Her Majesty's Paymaster-general ; and in reply, I am directed to state that instructions have been given to the proper officers of the Bank to make future returns in question in conformity with your Lordship's suggestion."

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

3 July 1856.

3197. How is that in conformity with any directions specified in any Act of Parliament ?—It was in conformity, first, with the usage according to which the returns had formerly been given, and it was then in conformity with the Exchequer Act, for by this unauthorised change I was deprived of the means of making to Parliament the returns which by law I was compelled to do ; therefore upon the statement of that fact, the Bank, acting as on other occasions I have found them ready to do with ready acquiescence, both with law and the public interests, adopted the course which has been invariably practised since.

3198. Would your Lordship consider it a part of your duty to direct the mode of keeping the Bank accounts without any communication with the Treasury ?—I felt it naturally to be my duty, and I feel it still, that if the Bank of England were to make any alteration in the mode in which they return me my accounts, which would prevent me complying with the law, from an earnest belief that the Bank of England would not take any course that would prevent the law from being executed, I should feel certain that the Bank, as on that occasion, the instant their attention was called to the fact, would revert to the former practice.

3199. My question was, whether your Lordship considers that it is a part of the duty of the Exchequer to direct the mode, or would your Lordship not communicate with the Treasury previously to any communication with the Bank, as to the mode of keeping the Bank of England accounts ?—I should certainly have done so, if I suggested any novel change to be made. Here it was the Bank of England that made the change ; therefore I felt, and still feel, that I was quite warranted in what I did. That correspondence was laid by me before the Treasury, and they have never suggested, nor the Bank of England either, that I exceeded my powers.

3200. Sir James Graham.] The Exchequer Commission, over which Sir Henry Parnell presided, and which was composed of the persons whom you have already specified, in 1831, recommended, as a constitutional check upon the issue of Exchequer bills, lest the amount should exceed that authorised by Parliament, that every bill should be countersigned at the Exchequer before it obtained a legal currency ?—Just so.

3201. But at the same time, did not that Commission recommend that the Exchequer bills, before counter-signature, should be prepared at the Treasury, and not at the Exchequer ?—They did, as I have already stated.

3202. Did they not define the principle involved in their recommendation, which is laid down in these words, "That the business of preparing and issuing Exchequer bills should be separated from that of paying them" ?—They did, and the business of preparing and issuing Exchequer bills is separated from that of paying them ; the two things are not combined, and it would be very wrong if they were.

3203. Still the recommendation was, that the preparation should be at the Treasury, and not at the Exchequer ?—Yes, but with the counter-signature of the Exchequer.

3204. Then the recommendation of that commission, resting upon that authority, would be fully satisfied if the preparation were at the Treasury, so long as there was a counter-signature before the issue ?—Yes, it would be identical with it ; but I have said that it would be much more troublesome and complicated to employ two departments in place of one. It would also produce a derangement of the Treasury department if they were once to undertake it.

3205. If the Treasury authorities concurred with Sir Henry Parnell, and those who recommended the preparation at the Treasury, and who differed from your Lordship, the principle would be saved by the counter-signature of the authorised officer, whoever he might be ?—The Treasury authorities, at the time of this Report, did not agree in the Report, for they understood the Treasury business to be inconsistent with that recommendation. The principle of control would, however, be saved by the counter-signature.

3206. If longer experience should lead the Treasury now to revert to the opinion entertained by Sir Henry Parnell, by Sir Francis Baring, and by myself at that time, there would be in principle no violation, either of the Report or of the practice for which the argument is here urged that the preparation should be separate from the counter-signature?—Clearly, if we are to carry into effect that Report, that practice would be strictly conformable with the Report itself; it was from differing from that Report, at the time that the Bill was introduced, that those clauses were not adopted in the Bill. The Commissioners do not appear to have taken evidence respecting the mode of preparing Exchequer bills, which was afterwards examined and reported on by a Royal Commission, and by Sir R. Peel and Mr. Goulburn's Board of Treasury, by neither of whom was a transfer of this kind recommended.

3207. If the Executive now should recommend reverting to the announcement, which was originally recommended by the Commission of 1831, there would be no violation of principle?—No, certainly; it would be a very great relief to me, individually; the greatest relief that could be given to me, if the whole duty were transferred to the Treasury. But a counter-signature at the Exchequer was recommended, by which the principle of control would be maintained: I think the change would be inexpedient.

3208. With respect to the deficiency bills, your Lordship has cognizance of the amount of the quarterly deficiency from the return that is made to you, have you not?—I had in former times cognizance of it from the actual state of the balance of the quarterly accounts, ascertained and settled by officers of the Exchequer and the Treasury, and certified to the Treasury by myself. At present I am deprived of the means of cognizance; I know nothing about it at all, except by the mere arbitrium of the Treasury, who communicate the fact to me, and accordingly I have been compelled to withhold my certificate.

3209. Does your Lordship often sign deficiency bills without any knowledge of the state of the balances?—I have struggled to retain that knowledge, according to the old practice of the Exchequer, but that knowledge has been withheld from me by the Treasury, except by an unchecked communication made on their own authority.

3210. Still the fact remains, that your Lordship does countersign deficiency bills without a knowledge of the state of the balances, and that in conformity with the existing law?—That is in conformity with the existing practice, but whether the mode of issuing deficiency bills to the Bank is in conformity with the existing law is a matter upon which there has been a great deal of difference of legal opinion. The Bank counsel say that the present practice is contrary to law, and the counsel of the Crown say that the present practice is in conformity with the law; I do not pretend to say which of the two is right. Under the old system I knew the exact amount on the quarter-day by an exact comparison of balances. This, the change made by the Treasury in 1854 (see Paper No. 17) has deprived me of the means of doing, according to the former unvaried usage of both departments.

3211. Not knowing the exact amount under the existing system, your Lordship from time to time, quarterly, signs the deficiency bills, without which signature a deficiency bill would not be operative?—Yes; but there is a great distinction between signing bills for 50,000 l. each, payable exclusively to the Bank of England, or order, and passing only by endorsement of the Bank, which never occurs, and issuing bills payable to bearer and which pass by delivery from hand to hand; that distinction is a very important matter. I object to the system latterly pursued.

3212. Your Lordship states that the British Parliament, and the British public, would not tolerate for a moment the power of creating debt on the part of the Executive Government without some control?—Yes; I consider that to be true on a constitutional principle.

3213. Are there not such things as Ways and Means bills?—There are, but those cannot be issued without control; they are made out and signed by me; the Treasury cannot issue them of their own authority.

3214. How stands that matter; is not your Lordship, by Act of Parliament, bound, on the requisition of the Treasury, to issue Ways and Means bills without limit?—I am bound by the provisions of the Act of Parliament; not without limit.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

3 July 1856.

limit. I do not think so. Consolidated Fund bills are, in fact, only deficiency bills charged upon the quarter next ensuing.

3215. But they create debt?—Yes, but only a temporary one.

3217. Are your Lordship's duties, with respect to those bills, ministerial under the Act of Parliament, or are they discretionary; have you the power of refusing to sign?—I consider, with respect to the power of signing, that in all cases, if I am called upon to do anything which involves the question of the legality of the act done, I have the power vested in me to refuse to do that illegal act, and I have done it with respect to Exchequer bills; when the Exchequer bonds were sent, they were sent with a form of scrip, which I objected to. If that form had been persevered in, I would not have signed the bonds.

3218. Has your Lordship ever refused to sign Consolidated Fund bills?—I am quite sure I never have; such a case never could arise. A Government having a full Exchequer never would dream of issuing Consolidated Fund bills. I do not believe that any I was ever asked to sign would have admitted of a doubt.

3219. What are your Lordship's means of judging whether the order to sign be proper or not?—If I had before me, for instance, at the close of the quarter a full balance on the Consolidated Fund account upon which the Treasury could draw, and had thus the means of drawing and satisfying the public service without bills, and I was asked under those circumstances to sign and issue Consolidated Fund bills, I should hesitate in doing so.

3220. Has there ever been a call upon your Lordship, under the circumstances which you have suggested as possible, to sign Consolidated Fund bills?—No, I never had a case in which I felt the slightest doubt, nor do I think any such could arise.

3221. Then the case is, when there has not been a balance, but the object is to create debt by the issue of those Consolidated Fund bills at the instance of the Executive, your Lordship's duty has been ministerial?—That resolves itself into a power of borrowing from the Bank under the provisions of the Act of Parliament, and not creating securities which are to go into the market, the excess of which might affect the interests of third parties. These bills constitute charges on the revenue of the next ensuing.

3222. Is your Lordship not cognisant of transactions in which those Ways and Means bills, combined with the power of operating upon the savings banks money, has created a funded debt by the Executive unchecked by the Comptroller of the Exchequer?—I have never known Consolidated Fund bills applied for any such purpose. I have never heard it even suggested for a moment.

3223. Taken in combination with the power of operating upon the savings banks money?—No, that has never been dreamed of by any finance minister.

3224. You do not know of debt being so created?—The two last answers are given erroneously if applied to Consolidated Fund bills; they are true as applicable to deficiency bills, but Consolidated Fund bills have been taken up by the savings banks.

3225. And debt created. Three per cents., which you thought it impossible to create, have been created in that manner?—A funded debt has been created by exchanging the bills which were held by the Commissioners of Savings Banks for Consols. I think that is a most objectionable practice, though legal, where the bills have been purchased by the sale of Savings Bank stock.

3226. That is since you have been Comptroller of the Exchequer?—Yes, it is since I resigned the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer.

3227. And unchecked by your Lordship?—I do not consider it contrary to law, nor has the transaction any possible connexion with the Exchequer.

3228. Therefore the law, as it now stands, does give to the Executive, subject to your Lordship's control, a power of creating Three per cent. debt?—Yes; by the commutation of bills into stock. That has been objected to by me as a Member of Parliament, where produced by the previous sale of stock; I had no connexion

connexion with the transaction as Comptroller-general; it never came before me in any way, nor was it under my control.

3229. Still the law permits it?—Certainly.

3230. Would not your Lordship somewhat qualify your position, that the country and Parliament would not endure the power of the Executive to create a Three per cent. funded debt?—No; the cases you have referred to are cases which I think are objectionable in their consequence, but they are exceptional cases; the one operation is a commutation of one debt for another; the case originally put related to an unchecked power of creating funded debt. If Parliament were to give to the Treasury an uncontrolled power (which was the question put to me), of making Exchequer bills payable on demand or payable at the end of a year, assignable from hand to hand, I do not think that would be a constitutional principle, but open to great complaints.

3231. Chairman.] Do you remember the transaction by which the Consolidated Fund bills were taken up by the savings banks and afterwards funded?—Yes.

3232. Do you recollect also that that course was very much objected to in Parliament?—Very much indeed, in both Houses, if I remember right.

3233. You yourself entertained great objections to it?—Yes; I have argued the matter from year to year.

3234. You think probably that that is a power which ought to be kept in check?—I am satisfied that it is a very dangerous power; but I have known cases where the interest of the public debt was reduced, and in which the power was most usefully applied.

3235. Mr. Wilson.] The objection has been taken to the practice of creating a funded debt out of the Consolidated Fund bills; no objection has ever been taken, in Parliament or out of it, to the Treasury issuing Ways and Means bills or Consolidated Fund bills, and redeeming them out of the revenue of the following quarter?—No, I never heard an objection taken to that course when it unfortunately became necessary; a full Exchequer seems to me very obviously a better state of things.

3236. And the power of the Treasury to issue such bills, in point of fact, rests entirely upon the responsibility of the Treasury?—Quite so. I think it is there it should rest; it is to meet the case of exigencies.

3237. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Did you not say that it was not in the power of the Government to create a funded debt without the authority of the Comptroller of the Exchequer?—No, I did not. I never dreamt of such a thing. I have stated how it can be done by commuting bills for stock without any privity with the Exchequer. My argument was only that I did not think Parliament would like to give unlimited power to the Treasury to create Three per cents.; it never has done so.

3238. In the Loan Acts which regulate the creation of funded debt, is there any interposition of any authority between the Treasury and the Bank?—No; the act of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in contracting for a loan is a pure fiduciary proposition. The Chancellor of the Exchequer goes into the market and makes a bargain; he has no power of executing it; but he goes to the House of Commons and asks for a confirmation of his bargain upon the common principle of good faith and confidence in the Government. If the House of Commons are not prepared to impeach the Chancellor of the Exchequer, they are bound to carry into effect his agreement for the loan.

3239. In the Loan Acts which regulate the manner in which the funded debt is created, is it the practice to interpose the control of the Exchequer?—Certainly not; but there Parliamentary control is applied conclusively by resolution and statute, and the Parliamentary approval of the loan is embodied in the Bill. Where bills are included in loan proceedings, the Exchequer is solely entrusted with the authority of making out the bills, and thus keeping within the Parliamentary limits and conditions. My objection was against entrusting with this power uncontrolled.

3240. Mr. Hankey.] Did your Lordship state that there was power in the Bank to create stock, on the application of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, after he has made a loan (the trust being committed to him), before the Act of Parliament had sanctioned it?—The Chancellor of the Exchequer makes a bargain, and he brings it down in the shape of Resolutions, and the House affirms the Resolutions, and a Bill is ordered to be carried, to give effect to those Resolutions, and the transaction of the loan is complete when the Bill becomes law.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

3 July 1856.

3241. Is your Lordship not aware that the Bank cannot complete any one of those transactions until the Act of Parliament which sanctions it has received the Queen's signature?—I made no mention of the Bank; the Bank is precluded from having any pecuniary transactions contrary to the statute of William. Therefore every Loan and Ways and Means Act contains a clause exempting the Bank from the obligations of the statute of William so far as the Act in progress is concerned; without this exemption the Bank cannot move.

3242. Mr. Bowyer.] Your Lordship has mentioned instances in which the Treasury, subject to the control of the Exchequer, may create Three per cents.; I wish to know what the nature of that control is; whether it is merely a control with the exercise of the ministerial function, or whether any discretion is exercised by the Exchequer in that matter?—There is no control of the Exchequer by law applicable in such a case at all. What I described was a proceeding by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who chooses to order the Commissioners of Savings Banks to sell out 2,000,000 l. of stock, and buy Exchequer bills, or take them from him. He can afterwards, under the law as it stands, fund those Exchequer bills without any check or control on the part of the Exchequer. That is a principle which exists, and one to which I greatly object.

3243. Does not that practically enable the Treasury to obtain money without going to the Exchequer for it?—The proceeding is this, it relieves the Exchequer bill market by the substitution of the funded debt for unfunded debt, but it does not enable the Government to retain the command of money.

3244. Then what is the nature of your Lordship's objection?—My objection is that it is a mode of adding to the funded debt of the country without the knowledge or approval of Parliament.

3245. It is in point of fact funding the unfunded febt?—It is a transmutation of the unfunded debt into funded debt, without the direct sanction of Parliament. There is the power to do it, but it is done without Parliament being aware of it till after the event.

3246. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Is there not a difference between the funding of the common Supply Exchequer bills, for the issue of which the authority of Parliament has been obtained, and the funding of the Consolidated Fund bills, which are issued without the authority of Parliament, merely upon the discretion of the Treasury?—I think that the difference is very great. The Consolidated Fund bills are not exchangeable, but the Supply bills are exchangeable. By a very true distinction drawn in reasoning by Mr. Gladstone, he observed that Supply bills exchanged habitually year by year nearly assume the character of a permanent security, and consequently the transmutation of an ordinary Supply Exchequer bill into Three per cents. is not so violent an act as transmuting a short security, which at the most has only three months to run, into a permanent security. I think that the one is much more objectionable than the other.

3247. Chairman.] The one is the practical creation of a new debt, and the other is the transfer of the unfunded to the funded debt?—Yes, precisely.

3249. With regard to the common Supply Exchequer bills, they are practically the creation of a permanent, though unfunded debt?—I can hardly call it a permanent debt; the Government have the power of paying it off at the end of the year, and the holders have the power of requiring money for them; but usage has so far given them the character of a permanent debt, as to distinguish the case strongly between the Supply bills and the Consolidated Fund bills; they are different securities, and the funding of the one may be excusable, whilst the same operation in respect to the others is most objectionable.

3250. Chairman.] There is an objection, is there not, to transfer the unfunded to funded debt, because it brings the Government into the market as jobbing in stocks?—I think that is a very serious objection, when one considers the amount of capital placed at the command of the Government, namely, the full extent of the whole funded capital that now stands to the credit of the savings banks, and I think it a very dangerous system to give the Government of bringing such a money power to bear on the stock market.

3251. Mr. Bowyer.] When your Lordship stated that the country would not approve of the Treasury having the power of making Three per cents, you meant, meant, did you not, that the country would not approve of the Treasury having the power of making Three per cents., not by the transmutation of another security, but in such a manner as to obtain money; in point of fact, to obtain a loan without the control of the Exchequer and of Parliament?—Clearly so; the objection I raised was, that such operation should be performed by Government without the control of Parliament. When I had to borrow for the slave loan, I took powers, and I borrowed 15,000,000 l. at first, and afterwards 5,000,000 l., if I recollect rightly; and in one of those operations I had the power of creating stock, if I rightly remember, as Mr. Goulburn afterwards had, under a Bill, at the commencement of his Government; but I think Parliament only gave it in both cases under very special limitations; and in each of those cases Parliament seems to have been apprehensive of the possible consequences of their own act.

3252. In point of fact, if what your Lordship objects to were allowed, the Government, instead of going to the Exchequer for money, and taking that money according to the Exchequer Act, would be able to borrow money by making Three per cents., subject to no control at all?—There is the power of creating Three per cents. in the way that I have described; but I was not describing an existing power, but showing what appeared to me a conclusive objection to permitting Government uncontrolled to raise money, either by the issue of Exchequer bills or the creation of stock.

3253. I understand that power to be strictly limited, so as not to be liable to the objection which you have suggested?—I think it is open to very serious objections; but at the present time I think all those operations with savings banks money, such as buying bills, and funding those bills, are open to very serious objections.

3254. Your Lordship thinks that it gives the Government the disposal of money in a manner not contemplated by Parliament when Parliament constituted the Exchequer control?—There was no connexion between those operations and the Exchequer at all; the two operations are perfectly and entirely distinct. I object to the power it would give the Government of interfering in the stock market without the direct sanction of law.

3255. What I mean is, that your Lordship objects that those practices give the Government the means of obtaining the disposal of money, which disposal of money was not contemplated by the Act which constituted the Exchequer?—I object to it on grounds which are separate and apart from any Exchequer proceedings at all. It is perhaps indiscreet to reason by analogy upon the subject the Committee have before them, namely, the question of allowing the Government, without control, the power of issuing Exchequer bills, (which I stated would not, in my opinion, be wise, expedient, or constitutional); my analogy was not exactly from a power granted to the Crown—a power which, in reply to subsequent questions, I have described as existing—but deduced from a power which does not exist, that the Crown should of its own discretion have the power of creating Three per cent. stock. I do not think that that is a power that should be given to the Crown, and I do not think that the power of issuing Exchequer bills without control ought to be given to the Crown either.

3256. That power would enable the Government to give the go-by to the Exchequer?—Clearly, if it existed, and to give the go-by to Parliament likewise.

3257. The power which now exists of creating Three per cents., your Lordship thinks, is liable to objection, though not liable to the same objection which would exist to the uncontrolled power of making Three per cents.?—It is liable to very considerable objections; I have heard them stated, and feeling their force, I have more than once urged them myself.

3258. Does your Lordship object to that power which exists now, of creating Three per cents., on the ground that it is liable to abuse, or on the ground that it gives the Government the unconstitutional disposal of money?—I think it is liable to many abuses, of which the worst would be, that I think that it would give the Government unconstitutional possession, and power in disposing of public money or public securities.

3259. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] At present, with the exception of the Ways and Means bills and the Consolidated Fund bills, it is not in the power of the Government to create either funded or unfunded debt without the consent of Parliament?—No; those securities, it must be remembered, rest on specific Acts, regulating the mode and circumstances of their issue. Both classes of securities, as well as the deficiency bills, must be made out and signed at the Exchequer. The funding of these bills is the exchange of one security for another.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

3 July 1856.

3260. If the Government gets the power of raising money by perpetual annuities in the ordinary mode of creating Consols, a Loan Act passes, and that stock is created without any interference of the Comptroller of the Exchequer, is it not?—Certainly; but the whole is regulated by statute.

3261. It is created by the authority of the Treasury at the Bank under the provisions of the Act, and there is no interference of the Exchequer?—There is an interference which is not very active, or not, in my judgment, intended for anything but for purposes of record. The Bank are bound to furnish me at the Exchequer, at the close of every loan which they transact by the Act, with all the particulars of that loan, the parties who have subscribed, and the amount that they have paid; that remains recorded at the Exchequer, but it is not for the purpose of inviting any kind of control on my part. The record of the transaction rests with me.

3262. If the Government obtain by Act of Parliament the power of creating stock to the extent of 5,000,000 l., and they attempt to create it to the extent of 6,000,000 l., there would be no interference on the part of the Exchequer to prevent that, would there?—No, because it would be checked at once; it could not be done; the Bank and the market would know it instantly.

3263. The control of the Exchequer would not prevent that excess, would it?—There is no control of the Exchequer applicable to that, nor is it required.

3265. With regard to the creation of those two classes of debt, namely, the funded debt, and that portion of the unfunded debt which consists of common Supply Exchequer bills, they stand, do they not, on a totally different footing with respect to the Exchequer control?—Certainly, they do. The Exchequer has no duty in relation to funded debt, except issuing for the dividends and for the sinking fund.

3266. Mr. Bowyer.] Does your Lordship think that the issue of Consolidated Fund bills ought to be subjected to the same control as the issue of Exchequer bills?—No, I do not, because I think that, although I have already said a case might occur, an hypothetical case, for it is purely hypothetical, it can never practically arise with an abundant Exchequer, and therefore no want of Consolidated Fund bills would be felt. As to the ordinary issues which take place under different circumstances, I think that is a matter for the Government itself to determine; and it contains a check within itself, for those bills are payable upon the next quarter, and if the Government abuse their power of issuing such Consolidated Fund bills, they themselves, if they remain in office, would be the sufferers by their own mistake or misconduct in the next quarter.

3267. In point of fact, the proceeding checks itself, because a day of reckoning must be near?—Yes; within three months.

3268. Do the same observations which your Lordship has made apply to Ways and Means bills and to Deficiency bills?—To Deficiency bills they do. They apply strictly to all bills chargeable upon the immediate quarter or the quarter next ensuing. The Consolidated Fund bills would be chargeable upon the quarter next ensuing; the check would be still more immediate as to deficiency bills.

3269. With respect to Ways and Means bills, how would that be?—By Ways and Means bills, I understand bills of the character of ordinary supply bills, exchange bills; but they are applied, not for the purposes of exchange, but for the purposes of raising money for the current service, and with respect to them the Comptroller of the Exchequer has the full control on their issue; for the Act of Parliament authorising them puts a limit upon their issue, and the Comptroller-general must attend to that limit, and see that it is not exceeded.

3270. Are the proceeds raised by either of those three sorts of bills, Consolidated Fund bills, Ways and Means bills, and Deficiency bills, paid in to the Exchequer?—In most cases these bills have been taken by the Bank, and their produce paid into the Exchequer. This is the better course. In other cases the direction has been to issue Ways and Means bills to the Accountant to sell them in the public market, and to apply the proceeds through the Pay department to the public service; both courses have been taken, but I consider the course of selling through the Bank, and putting the money into the Exchequer, and drawing upon that money for the public service, to be the most convenient convenient and most constitutional. I have in a former part of this evidence explained the inconvenience of any other course in relation to the premium and discount of bills.

3271. In point of fact, the sale of those securities is equivalent to the issue of public money?—It resolves itself ultimately into that; in the one case what is equivalent to money, namely, bills, are given to the Paymaster to satisfy certain services; in the other case it is an issue of money's worth, to be paid into the Exchequer, and issued as ways and means.

3272. As it is in point of principle and fact an issue of public money, your Lordship thinks that the produce of those securities sold in the market ought to go into the Exchequer, and then be issued to meet the supply?—Yes, I think that is the just and legitimate way; it is in conformity with the last Act of the last Session, or the Act taking the power of issuing six millions of bills and bonds, in which Parliament decided that the produce should be paid into the Exchequer, and issued out of the Exchequer for the public service. I think that is the right mode of proceeding, and it is the latest precedent.

3273. In the cases in which your Lordship says that the Treasury gets a supply of money by creating a debt, does your Lordship think that that money ought to go into the Exchequer?—I think it ought; because that remedies all the difficulties which have been so much adverted to, as to the difference of premiums on discount; and the exact money required by the vote is then issued, neither more nor less. It keeps the accounts much clearer, and it avoids any kind of confusion. I think that the sale of bills through the Bank of England, in the open market, is the better way, rather than passing them to the credit of any particular accountant.

3274. That would make the security as complete, as to that species of supply, as it is with regard to the money paid by the revenue departments into the Exchequer?—It would resolve itself into the same principle; money would be lodged at the Exchequer, and issues made under the same principle.

3275. Mr. Williams.] Does your Lordship remember the Act under the authority of which the unfunded debt can be converted into funded debt?—Yes, it is a Saving Banks Act, 9 Geo. 4, c. 92, s. 50.

3276. Does that Act give any authority to any other person, for instance, to the Commissioners of the National Debt, to convert the unfunded debt into funded debt?—I do not wish to speak to the contents of an Act of Parliament, without referring to it.

3277. Are the Committee to understand that it is your Lordship's opinion that that Act ought to be repealed, and that such power ought to be withdrawn?—I think that Act, as it now stands, is open to very great objection; but I have sometimes thought, looking at the Act itself, that it was drawn up in a way that hardly limits the action under it within the intention of its framers; it gives power of dealing with Exchequer bills generally, and I could not help thinking that the intention must have been, that it was only to do with Supply Exchequer bills.

3278. I understood your Lordship's opinion to be, that power should not be vested in any authority but that of Parliament to convert unfunded debt into funded debt?—I am not quite prepared to go that length. I can understand, more especially in the case to which I have adverted, that if the Government are engaged in a large operation for reducing the interest of any class of public securities, in carrying that into effect they may not be able to anticipate how much of those securities may come in for money, and events of that description; such events have occurred, as in the case of Lord Spencer, when he made use of powers of this description in order to carry out a very excellent scheme for reducing the interest of the public debt, which he could have hardly carried into effect without the use of this power, but it ought to be exercised with great limitation, and used with great reserve. Above all, it should be frankly made known to Parliament, and a Parliamentary approval be obtained. I think you ought to exclude altogether any bills from its operation, except the ordinary supply bills; to buy Consolidated Fund bills or deficiency bills for the purpose of funding being objectionable. I think the Act ought to be amended in that particular; nor do I think that the Sinking Fund should be employed on these latter securities.

3279. In case of the reduction of debt, is there any difficulty in obtaining the sanction of Parliament to provide for the amount of the deficiencies?—Operations of this description may be carried on under circumstances in which it might be be inconvenient to seek for a previous Parliamentary sanction. These powers are, however, riskful and anomalous; we got on without such a power for a long time, through very troublous times, and that leads somewhat to the inference that we could get on without it now; an amendment, I think, is absolutely necessary to put an end to the power of dealing with Consolidated Fund bills on those short securities; I think that practice is quite clearly wrong, or sale of stock for purchase of bills.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

3280. Your Lordship has stated that in some instances it may be inconvenient; does not your Lordship think the establishment of a principle to secure public money is of far more importance than occasional inconvenience?—Yes, that is true; but I think it may be at the sacrifice of public money in those instances I have referred to. I do not see that there would be so much danger of abuse with certain safeguards. However, the matter is one of opinion, upon which the opinion of the Committee is worth more than mine. If the power is retained at all, it should be defined and limited.

3281. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Are the Committee to understand you to say, that you think it clear that the Comptroller of Savings Banks should in no case have the power of converting Exchequer bills in his hands, generally Supply Exchequer bills, into funded debt, under the responsibility of Government?—I have very great doubt upon that subject, as I have already said; I have no objection whatever, if the practice is limited to allowing the Comptroller of Savings Banks, or the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to invest monies that come in to him for deposits, or the interest he receives from stock, in any security he thinks fit; and even I should see no insurmountable objection to giving him, so far as that portion of his receipts is concerned, a power of conversion; but what I do object to in the strongest manner is, the danger, if not the fatal consequences of giving him the unlimited power of selling out savings bank stock for the purpose of buying Exchequer bills, and then converting those Exchequer bills again into stock. I think that may enable the Chancellor of the Exchequer to act upon the stock market in a way that he ought not to be permitted to do.

3282. Suppose the Comptroller of Savings Banks should be a holder of Exchequer bills originally issued to him by the Government, do you think it would be objectionable that he should, in certain cases, with the consent of the Government, have the power of converting those unfunded securities into funded securities?—If he is the holder of those securities by the investment of the interest payable to him, or of the deposits, then I think such a power may be conceded; but if he has become the holder of those securities by the sale of stock, I object greatly to his funding those bills so acquired by sale of stock.

3283. Chairman.] Though there exists an objection to that practice, are there not cases in which it has been usefully employed for the public service, in cases where a reduction of interest has taken place in stock; in Lord Althorp's time was not it by means of sales of savings banks stock that he was put in funds to take up the dissentients?—I stated that as an exceptional case, which justified Lord Spencer's proceedings; I think that was defensible as an exceptional case.

3284. Mr. Bowyer.] Mr. Anderson and Mr. Hoffay have stated to the Committee that the control exercised by the Exchequer causes a delay of public business, and multiplication of accounts, and they therefore suggested that the Exchequer should be abolished; what is your Lordship's opinion upon that subject?—I think I have stated that, if you weigh on the one hand the possibility of the saving to be made by suppressing the multiplication or the duplication of accounts, as one advantage tending to economy and simplicity, and on the other the advantage derived from obtaining the Parliamentary security such as it is, and the adherence to the principle of appropriation, there can be no hesitation in saying that the greater principle is the Parliamentary appropriation, and the lesser principle is the doubtful economy (for that I consider it), that would be attained by a somewhat greater simplicity of the accounts.

3285. Does not your Lordship think that all checks and controls must necessarily to some extent create delay and perhaps trouble?—No doubt; all our constitutional system is a system of check and control which creates delay and trouble, but that is cheerfully endured in consideration of the balance of advantage derived from that system.

3286. In fact, the country would be governed with much less trouble without Parliament?—It would be, I believe, much more easily governed, in the judgment of some persons, if we had a Governor in Council, who by a Minute of Council could direct all things at his pleasure.

3287. Those

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

3 July 1856.

3287. Those gentlemen have also stated to the Committee, that the Exchequer prevents the Paymaster from adopting the best system of accounts; what is your Lordship's opinion?—The answer to which my attention has been called bears that interpretation; but that does not seem to me the real meaning of the answer, which I believe to be this: Mr. Anderson states, that inasmuch as the Exchequer accounts deal with all credits and transfers as if they were actual payments, and the Paymaster's accounts deals with specific payments, there is an inconsistency between the one and the other; and that the public accounts, which now by law are kept according to the receipts and issues of the Exchequer, clash with the accounts which are kept according to the actual payments. It is that to which I think he adverts, and not to any imperfection in our books. I am assured that a perfect system of double entry prevails at the Exchequer. It is not consequently the Exchequer accounts which stand in the way of improving the Treasury accounts, but it is that the two accounts, the Paymaster's account and the Exchequer account, are by law made upon different principles. Mr. Anderson seems to wish to see them reconciled. It is thus I understand Mr. Anderson; but I may be in error.

3288. You state, do you not, that the true meaning of what Mr. Anderson said was, that there is a sort of inconsistency or disagreement between the accounts of the Exchequer and the accounts of the Paymaster?—I so understand his complaint; but I do not myself see how it would be possible for the Exchequer accounts to be kept in any other way than they are. Every transfer and every credit is, in point of fact, a payment, so far as the Exchequer account is concerned. For if any gentleman round this table pays an account, by giving to a person to whom he is indebted a credit upon his banker (he losing all power over that credit himself), which his creditor can go and take up at pleasure, that credit so issued upon that bank amounts practically to a payment.

3289. Your Lordship, then, is of opinion that the system which you have described at the Exchequer does not prevent the Paymaster, in his own accounts, adopting the best possible system of account?—I should say not. He becomes chargeable with the credit that I give him, and then he puts to the other side of the account the payments which he makes to individuals. Practically speaking, I see no difference whether I give the Paymaster a bill of 1,000*l.* from the Exchequer, or place 1,000 l. to his credit, and enable him to pay it into his drawing account. I see no difference, practically, between the one and the other. I lose all power over the transfer or credit given to the Paymaster; he and he alone can draw on it. It becomes his, and ceases to be mine.

3290. So that, in fact, he has an Exchequer credit to work upon, but the peculiarity of that Exchequer credit does not prevent his keeping his own accounts on the best system on which accounts could be kept?—I should think not; but I know very little of the interior economy of the Paymaster's office.

3291. With your experience, your Lordship sees no reason why his accounts should not be kept in the best manner?—I see none whatever. But I would not rely on my own judgment confidently. If I give my steward managing my estate a credit for 1,000 l. to draw against, or I give him 1,000 l. paid in to himself, his account ought to be kept on the same principle, as it appears to me.

3292. In fact, the account of the Paymaster is an account of payments made by him, and those payments so made by him he may keep an account of in any manner that is thought proper, without reference to the mode in which he received the money from the Exchequer?—Yes, subject to the directions in force and the orders of the Treasury; but I may add, that in the evidence of Mr. Anderson, and which appears in terms to describe the system of the Exchequer, the objections that he raises are all objections raised to the Treasury system of accounts; and it comes to me with great astonishment that such a description should apply to accounts which were carried on by Mr. Brooksbank, who was, I believe, one of the ablest and most trustworthy public servants that could be found in any country. I was astonished in reading that there was no journal, no ledger, no cash-book; in fact there was nothing which account-keeping requires. I could not have believed that possible.

3293. Does your Lordship see any reason why an account which consists of payments by giving credit, should not be kept in the same way as an account consisting of payments by cash?—There is no difference whatever, so far as I can judge.

3294. Your Lordship sees no ground for Mr. Anderson's opinion upon that point?—I do not see upon what it rests.

The Right Hon. the Lord Monteagle of Brandon.

3 July 1856.

3295. Mr. Williams.] Is it not your Lordship's opinion, with regard to the difference in the making up of the accounts of the Paymaster and the Exchequer, that it arises in this way: that the Treasury sends an order to the Exchequer to pay a certain sum to the Paymaster for specific purposes, and that the Paymaster is not afterwards called upon immediately for the money which he has received?—No; but he has it entirely in his own control. It stands as a credit to his own account, and he can operate upon it; I cannot.

3296. But he may not be called upon for payment immediately after the credit is given?—No.

3297. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] You referred just now to an example of what a person would do in respect to the management of his private affairs; let me put a case in order to illustrate your plan of conducting the Pay Office. Suppose a person instead of keeping a balance at his banker's, upon which he draws for the payment of all his tradesmen's accounts, requested his banker to manage his affairs in the following manner; that he should raise a credit for his butcher, another credit for his baker, another credit for his tailor, and so on for his different tradesmen; that he should keep a balance upon each account; that he should pay each tradesman by drawing upon his special credit; and should require his banker to furnish him with a separate account for each one of those tradesmen: is that a parallel case to what you recommend to be done with the public money in the Pay-office?—I have not recommended anything with respect to the Pay-office, I have only answered questions put to me with respect to the parallelism of the transactions; I do not think that that is shown to exist. If I was to place 100 l. at Drummond's and tell them, There is the sum of 100 l. to pay A. B., the butcher, and 200 l. to pay C. D., the wine-merchant, if I put those out of my own control, and I can no longer touch them, but the butcher or the wine-merchant may; I should consider those orders as payments to those parties, only giving them the means of getting it from the bank in place of getting it in specie from me; but a payment it would be, and nothing else. I should consider that I had parted with money, so far as my own banking account went, when I transferred it to another account upon which I could not operate, but the person who was credited could. I should not consider it a balance of mine; it is a payment to others.

3298. If it is admitted that the Paymaster never pays money out of his drawing account for any purpose which is not within the Appropriation Act, and which has not been voted by Parliament, or made a charge upon the Consolidated Fund, do not the two modes of keeping accounts seem to be parallel?—I do not think that they do exactly; if I put money to the account of another person it belongs to him, and not to me. I have no more to say to the balance; it is appropriated to another purpose. If I was to go and say to the banker, I am keeping a great balance with you, because, in addition to my own account, I have 500 l. which belongs to the butcher, and 600 l. which belongs to the wine merchant, and so on, I think my banker would say, "These are not your balances; these are the balances of the parties to whom you have transferred them, and they are appropriated for such purposes."

3299. Mr. Bowyer.] But that seems something of the same sort as giving a standing order to a banker to make a particular payment at a particular time of the year?—That is so, sub modo; but then that is a case not close in its analogy; because if I direct my banker to pay my subscription at Brookes', or at the Athenæum, I can recall it; but in the case where I have transferred a credit absolutely, and placed it within the power of another, that case is quite distinct; that is a payment, to all intents and purposes, for the benefit of the other party.

3300. Does not your Lordship think that the case of the State is not parallel to that given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because in the case of the State it is an arrangement between different departments of the public service for the payment of the public charges, which is a different case from a man having the disposal of his own money, not being appropriated?—Still as relating to me, as Comptroller-general, the money is gone from me, and I have nothing more to say to it; I can only deal with it as a payment. The State, in its corporate capacity, may represent all its accountants. With the permission of the Committee I will hand in a paper showing the delays in payments made to the Exchequer as compared with the more direct mode of payment. (The same was delivered in.)

Vide Appendix.

Charles Vine, Esq., called in; and Examined.

3301. Chairman.] WHAT office do you hold?—That of Inspector of Naval and Military Accounts under the Commissioners of Audit.

3302. How long have you been in that office?—Since March 1854.

3303. What office did you hold before?—I was book-keeper in the Audit-office.

3304. How long had you been there?—Twenty-one years.

3305. The Committee have heard a good deal about the Appropriation Account; will you explain to what extent the officer who checks the account, take the Navy, for instance, carries out his duties: what does he consider that he has the power of doing?—He sees every voucher upon which an entry in the books is made; he sees that that voucher bears upon its face evidence of examination and allowance by the proper authorities, and that the regulations of the department are complied with before it can pass into an order for payment; he sees that that voucher is marked with the proper head of service, and the vote to which it is chargeable; he sees that the voucher is in every respect sufficient to warrant its being carried to the account as a final payment on account of the vote; that it is not imprest, or an advance for which a future account is to be rendered; and as the grants are for sums which shall come in course of payment during the year, he sees that no final payment made within the year is excluded, and that no final payment in the subsequent year is included in the prior year's account. The original entry for every payment charged against the vote is traced from its commencement through all the books, until it is finally recorded in the annual account laid before Parliament.

3306. What check has he; does he feel it to be a part of his duty at all to consider whether the sum has been properly paid, and whether Government has exercised a proper discretion in ordering the payment?—No, he does not do that.

3307. He is satisfied with the authority, which is a proper authority?—He is.

3308. He would not interfere if the Navy were to order a certain sum to be paid, nor check that payment, but see that it was properly accounted for, and placed under the proper head?—He would do so.

3309. If there was any improper payment, would he report it in any shape to the Audit?—If there was any payment which he did not consider was properly chargeable against the votes, he would bring it in writing before the Commissioners of Audit for their decision.

3310. Take the case of the Ordnance accounts; up to what time is it, from month to month, that the report takes place?—Yes.

3311. We have understood that the Ordnance have been lately engaged in making fireworks for the celebration of the Peace; will you explain to the Committee when that comes before the officer how is it checked; what has he done with regard to that expenditure of the Ordnance?—I presume by far the larger proportion would be included in the wages of persons employed at Woolwich.

3312. Take the case of the wages of parties employed at Woolwich for making fireworks, would he feel it his duty to inquire at all whether they had been employed in making fireworks, or in making shells, or other work necessary for the war?—That would never come before him.

3313. He would in no shape be aware, except from common conversation with the parties, how the money was expended?—It would only appear before him as a payment on account of wages. The particular duty upon which the persons had been employed would not, I think, be stated on the voucher.

3314. Then he would not think it his duty to report to the Audit anything of that kind?—I think not.

3315. There have been other expenses incurred by the Ordnance for materials of different kinds with regard to those fireworks; there was something, was there not, for colouring the fireworks; and the purchases have not been the usual purchases for the war expenditure of the Ordnance. With regard to anything of that kind, would he have any exercise of discretion as to reporting to the Audit that they were purchases for fireworks, and not for war purposes?—I do not

C. Vine, Esq.

3 July 1856.

not think he would have any discretion to question the purchases which the Ordnance had directed to be made.

3316. Even with regard to that expenditure, which we suppose to have taken place for fireworks, the appropriation control would not bring it before the Audit Board?—Not unless the payment is at variance with the Estimates. The Estimate contains a very large item for miscellaneous stores, including laboratory stores, without any definition. I do not think we should bring under the notice of the Board of Audit purchases of stores of a character similar to those usually charged to this head.

3317. Some extra difficulty might arise, but it would not come under the Audit Board?—I think not.

3318. The Audit Board, I take for granted, would have no action unless it was brought before them by their officer?—None.

3319. There has been some confusion, has there not, with regard to works that are done by one department for another department; what is the rule; supposing the Ordnance performs works for the Navy, or the Navy for the Ordnance, will you explain whether that is done on imprest, or is it done first by the department out of their own funds, and then giving in a bill of account of what they have expended?—The work is carried on by the Ordnance, and an account is rendered to the Navy, for instance, of all the expenditure incurred by the Ordnance, and a repayment takes place of the amount; at the end of the year, if there is a balance owing by the department for whom the work has been carried on, it is shown in the balance sheet of the detailed account, which is, I think, invariably laid before Parliament by the Treasury. There is a case in point here, in the account for 1853–54, the last detailed account, in which there are certain sums owing by the Lords of the Admiralty to the Ordnance "for stores supplied for works at Bull Point and for passages of Ordnance officers."

3320. You were in the Committee-room during Mr. Hoffay's examination, were you not?—Yes.

3321. Perhaps you will recollect that he was asked a question with regard to the Treasury Minute, in November 1836, for the regulation of the Paymaster. I was under an impression that, by that Minute, there was an inconvenience found in employing the Ordnance funds for other departments; and therefore it was directed that there should be some other arrangements made, as to the Ordnance funds, different from the arrangements with regard to the Army and Navy funds?—I am not aware that there has been any change with regard to the advances made in anticipation of claims which the Ordnance had to make for works which they were undertaking for the Navy.

3322. I will read Article 76, in which it is stated, "My Lords are sensible that it is for the advantage of the public service that the Board of Ordnance should continue to be employed in executing such services for other departments of Government as can be more economically conducted by that Board; but as every department is understood not to incur expenses which have not been previously provided for by Parliament, there can be no difficulty when any department requires the aid of the Board of Ordnance in executing a service, the expense of which is to be charged against such department, in placing at the disposal of the Board of Ordnance a sufficient sum to defray the cost of the work or supply entrusted to that Board. My Lords desire, therefore, that this arrangement may, as far as practicable, be acted upon in future, as my Lords consider it important that advances out of the grants of Parliament for services not finally chargeable on such grants, should be limited to cases of indispensable necessity, and to which the previous sanction of this Board shall have been obtained." I read it that in cases where the Ordnance was to perform duties for other departments, the other departments were bound, in the words of the Minute, to furnish a sufficient sum to defray the cost of the work entrusted to that Board before it was completed; is that done now?—I am not aware of that; it is not a subject, I think, on which the Audit would have any control whatever, further than to see that the payments made on account of a particular work were charged in the ledger to the account for that service, that no payments made for that service were charged in the account against the votes, and that when the account was made up the balance upon it was accurately and faithfully shown in the balance sheet.

3323. It would not come under the Audit check?—No further than to see that that every payment was accurately recorded and charged to the proper head in the ledger.

3324. You would not know whether the expense was incurred upon imprests from other departments, or whether it was paid first by the Ordnance, and then repaid by the other departments?—I think that the Audit would exercise no control there.

3325. Probably they would not know?—We should know, certainly.

3326. Do you know whether it is done or not done?—I do not think it is; with regard to the Admiralty, for instance, the whole of the balance on the 31st of March was only 120,000 l. on account of works.

3327. Probably it has not been found necessary to carry that regulation out?—I think not.

3328. You were at the Audit-office, were you not, at the time when the Commissariat accounts were audited by the Audit Board?—I was.

3329. You are now at the head of the Appropriation Audit, are you not?—I am.

3330. Do you consider that the Appropriation Audit, now that the accounts are transferred to the Army, is as effective and as good a check as when that audit was at the Audit Board?—I should say so, certainly; the Commissariat being only a fractional part of the army I can see no more reason why the Commissariat accounts should be examined at the Audit-office than the accounts of every naval storekeeper.

3331. The old practice was, that the navy accounts were audited by their own department, by the Accountant-general of the Navy, without any check whatever on the part of the Audit Board?—For the detailed examination; the Audit Board having the check of the Appropriation Audit.

3332. But previously to Sir James Graham's Bill the whole audit was done, was not it, by the department of the Navy itself?—It was.

3333. A check was introduced upon the system which existed, by which the Navy audited the whole of their accounts?—Yes.

3334. In the case of the Commissariat the Commissariat accounts were audited by the Audit-office, were they not?—They were.

3335. Therefore the department has had sent back to it the duty of auditing its own accounts now, with the Appropriation Audit?—Yes.

3336. You still think that it is equally effective?—Yes; I should say so.

3337. Is there, in your opinion, no objection arising from the fact that the Commissariat Chest accounts are audited by the Audit-office?—The Commissariat Chest account (the Treasury chest) now is a banking account, and consists merely of the receipts and payments on account of other services, and raising money; and there is nothing that remains a charge upon that account; therefore that account is purely a banking one.

3338. Take a Commissariat officer on any station, the Cape of Good Hope, for example; he has a certain sum of money, has he not, in his hands?—Yes, he has.

3339. As the banker of the Government?—Yes.

3340. How is it ascertained that he has that sum of money actually in his hands, which he is supposed to have in his hands?—There is a Board of Survey held upon the chest at certain periods.

3341. Now that account goes to the auditors, does it not?—Yes, it does.

3342. He has, besides that, an account of his own, has he not, that goes to the War-office?—No, not at present. The whole of his account at the Cape of Good Hope comes to the Audit-office, and the Audit-office take out the vouchers for the payments and receipts on account of all the different departments at home, and adjust the account with the Commissariat Chest. The whole that remains is the raising of money, and the specie sent from England to the Cape; but other than that, the whole of that service is either money received on account of some department in England, or money paid on account of some department in England. The Audit-office send a statement, for instance, to the Navy of sums paid on their account, and also of sums deposited in the chest on account of the Navy; and a settlement takes place between the Navy and the Audit-office periodically.

3343. Do I understand you rightly that all those accounts go to the Audit-office first?—Yes.

C. Vine, Esq.

3 July 1856.

3344. Do they separate the two accounts?—The Audit-office separate from the account all that is recoverable from the other departments.

3345. Do the Audit-office separate the Chest account from the Commissariat account?—They take that account as a banker's account, and they separate the cheques which each department has drawn upon the Bank, and they claim the amount of those cheques from the department.

3346. It goes through the process of separation at the Audit-office?—It does; the only difference is this, that now with the Commissariat account the actual voucher for the payment is transmitted, but the proposed arrangement is, that each of the accountants of the different departments should draw on the chest for the money he requires, and the final vouchers would be transmitted to the department by the accountant at the station.

3347. At present the whole of the accounts, with all the vouchers, are sent to the Audit-office first, are they not?—Yes.

3348. Are you cognisant of that process of separation?—Yes, quite so.

3349. Is that process any labour at all?—Considerable; the claims on account of the Army for the year 1854-55 amounted to 1,778,000*l.*, and the receipts on account of the Army to 38,000 l.; the whole of these had to be recorded in the books at the Audit-office.

3350. What is recorded in the books of the Audit-office?—The whole of the claims upon the different departments, and the adjustments of those claims.

3351. What is done at the Audit-office with that part of the account which is sent to the Army department?—A record is kept of every voucher that goes forward as a claim against the army.

3352. Is the voucher examined at all?—It is examined to see that it is receipted and issued under competent authority; the detailed examination of that voucher rests with the department on whose account the money has been advanced.

3353. A certain part of the examination is gone through at the Audit-office?—To see that the banker has paid upon a sufficient document.

3354. What is left undone?—The detailed examination.

3355. What is that?—Suppose the paymaster of a regiment requires money to pay the troops at the Cape of Good Hope, he goes through certain forms and at last draws money from the Commissariat Chest, and the examination of that voucher at the Audit-office consists in seeing that there is an estimate, the approval of the commanding officer, and the warrant of the general commanding to pay the money. The detailed examination of the whole pay-list takes place at the War Department. Again, with regard to the vouchers for the staff pay, the whole of those are examined in detail at the War Department.

3356. Before the transfer to the War-office this year what was done?—What is transferred to the War-office, is the detailed examination which was formerly conducted by the Audit Board, consisting of those payments which are made on account of the Commissariat service, that is, the pay and allowances of the Commissariat officers, the purchase of provisions, forage, fuel and light, for the army and the land and inland water transport; the whole of the detailed examination of that has been transferred to the Army.

3357. The detailed examination of which you were speaking, of the pay list, was always done by the Army department before, was it not?—Yes.

3358. There is no change in that, is there?—None. The only change is with regard to payments made on account of the Estimate for Commissariat Services.

3359. What takes place at the Audit Board now with regard to forage, for example?—A payment is made by the Commissariat officer, and the Audit Board see that the commissary has made the payment upon a proper document (they do not check it to see that the amount of forage has been carried into store), and then when they have ascertained that the payment has been made under proper authority, they forward the voucher to the War Department, and the chest account gets reimbursed the advance which it had made; and the detailed examination of that voucher so forwarded is conducted by the War Department.

3360. What difficulty was there with regard to the Commissariat Department in the Audit-office still continuing to examine, in such detail as they were accustomed to, that particular charge for forage?—No difficulty; but I consider that it was inconsistent. The Commissariat is a fractional portion of the army, and there was no more reason why the Commissioners of Audit should examine a fractional fractional part of the army expenditure, than that they should examine a fractional part of the naval expenditure. A commissary acting on behalf of the War-office is in the same position with regard to them as a naval storekeeper to the Navy; and there was no reason why the Audit-office should examine the accounts of the commissariat any more than the accounts of the naval store keepers.

3361. That is an argument; I rather asked you whether there was any practical difficulty in their continuing the audit as they had hitherto done?—None, that I am aware of.

3362. Except the difficulty as to principle, would any inconvenience have existed, if the old system had been continued?—I am not aware that there would have been any.

3363. It seems to me that there is a part of that duty now which the Audit-office must still exercise as to this forage; when the account comes to them they must, to a certain extent, examine into the account, must they not?—Only so far as the banking account is concerned, to see that the person who acts as banker has paid upon a proper draft.

3364. In what shape is it; is it a mere bill, or a charge, or what is it?—I take the word "draft" to mean this, that the commissary pays upon a certain prescribed document. Suppose a banker were told to pay a cheque only upon two signatures and a counter-signature, or upon three signatures, the Audit-office check is to ascertain that that order has been complied with, and that the document upon which the commissary has paid is that which is prescribed by the regulations.

3365. There is no specification of the quantity or the price, is there?—There is at present, because the Commissariat performs the double function of acting for the War Department and also for the Treasury, as bankers. The proposition was, that there should be a treasurer acting on behalf of the Treasury, and an accountant on behalf of the War-office; the accountant on behalf of the War-office would then draw upon the treasurer; the account of the treasurer would then consist of the drafts drawn upon him, and would be transmitted to the Audit-office; and the final vouchers would accompany the accounts of the War accountant to the War Department at home.

3366. At the present moment the documents sent in would include the quantity of hay bought, and the price, and the Audit-office are obliged to look into that, are they not?—No. They look into it only in this way: suppose the purchase of so many head of cattle at so much a head; the Audit-office merely see that there was a proper authority to pay the contractor so much money; they would not enter into the computation at all; that is a part of the detailed examination conducted at the War Department.

3367. Surely they did more than that formerly, did they not?—Certainly; because they examined the account of the payments on account of the Commissariat vote; and provisions being part of the estimate for the Commissariat services, they examined those vouchers in detail.

THE RIGHT HON. SIR FRANCIS T. BARING, BART., IN THE CHAIR.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

William George Anderson, Esq., called in; and further Examined.

7 July 1856.

Vide Appendix.

3368. Chairman.] CAN you state to the Committee what books are kept?—This is a table which will explain that. (The same was delivered in.) These are merely the books in which the payments are recorded after they are made, but there are various other books kept in the office for the purpose of examining the accuracy of the claims.

3369. What is the date of the issue of the Exchequer credit for the Duke of Wellington's funeral expenses?—On the 1st of April there was a credit for 10,000 l., and on the 5th there were two credits, one for 66,000 l. and another for 4,000 l., making altogether between the 1st and the 5th of April 80,000 l.

3370. Sir Henry Willoughby.] What is that book which you have before you?—This is an abstract of all the miscellaneous votes for the year 1852-53.

3371. Chairman.] Will you state what was expended on account of the Duke of Wellington's funeral in the course of the month of April?—There was paid out of civil contingencies prior to the 1st of April, 14,000 l., and in the month of April only 958 l. 7 s. 3 d.; the repayment of the advance out of civil contingencies took place in May; in two months there was rather more than 15,000 l. paid.

3372. Was there any further payment from that vote in that quarter?—No. Not in that quarter; there was nothing paid in the month of June. The payments were continued in August, October, November, and February, 3373. What became of all the money, the 80,000 l. that was drawn from the Exchequer credit?—On the day on which the credit was received the cash would be used for all the services that came in, and be carried to the general fund; from that fund it would be carried to the drawing account, and the bill account, and be expended for any services that came in course of payment.

3374. At the end of the month or at the end of the quarter is there any re-adjustment of the fund?—The account of the Duke of Wellington's funeral, remained at the end of the quarter in credit 50,412 l. 19 s. 6 d.

3375. Has there been a repayment for any fund?—No; when a credit is once drawn it is placed to the credit of the service for which it is issued, and there it remains till it is finally expended; it is not transferred to any other service in the books, although the cash may be put into the general till and used; the credit always remains for the service for which it was drawn, therefore this balance you will find carried on up to the present time, showing the 24,000 l. which now remains unexpended of that grant.

3376. In the evidence it was stated that there was a readjustment of the account which took place in the course of the month, or at the latest at the end of the month, but sometimes at the end of a fortnight?—If services are over-drawn by using credits or any other monies, in the course of a day or a week, or a month, credits are drawn under the services for which those advances are made; but if you draw too much upon any head of service you must leave that balance to be exhausted. You can use the cash for other services, but you cannot transfer transfer the credit to any other account. Where there is too little drawn, you can then draw from the Exchequer to place the account in credit.

3377. That money has remained applicable to any services that might turn up?—It remains to the credit of this service, and is only considered applicable to this particular service, and it remains as a balance to the credit of that service now.

3378. But the money has been employed?—The cash is used the moment it is drawn, otherwise you would accumulate a surplus.

3379. But the money has practically been lent for other services, has it not?—Yes, it has.

3380. Your book would only show that there was a credit for the sum due to the Duke of Wellington's funeral, but the money would have been spent on any other service which it might suit the Pay-office to spend it upon?—It falls into the general balance. In the statement of the balances the Committee will see the credits to the different votes, and an equal sum in the bank to balance those credits. The account of the balances on the 31st March 1856, which I gave in, showed that if it had been necessary to close the accounts on that day, there was a sum in the Bank exactly equal to the amount required to pay back into the Exchequer the sums to the credit of each of the different services and votes.

3381. When does the account as to the Duke of Wellington's funeral go to the Audit-office?—Every month.

3382. Has it gone always regularly every month to the Audit-office?—The whole of the accounts are sent in about a month or five weeks after the close of the month, when all the outport establishments and the establishment in Hanover have sent in their statements; they are then made up and sent to the Audit-office, accompanied by vouchers.

3383. Do the dates of the payments go?—The receipts themselves.

3384. And the dates of the drawings and the issue of the Exchequer credits?—Everything goes to the Audit-office.

3385. Does the Audit-office ever make any objection?—No, it is not considered a part of the duty of the Audit-office at present to look to the appropriation of the votes for the Miscellaneous Services.

3386. Provided the accounts balance, they are satisfied?—Yes; they have never interfered with the appropriation of the civil service votes.

3387. They have not asked any question as to whether any money was paid before you had proper authority to pay it?—They would look to that, because the Paymaster cannot pay without proper authority; he must have authority to make the payment, and that authority accompanies the proof of the payment upon which the Paymaster is discharged.

3388. They would not observe whether you had paid money for the Duke of Wellington's funeral before there was a vote for it, and an Exchequer credit for it?—They would not at present; the Treasury authority is final.

3389. Have you nothing but payments in the account of the Duke of Wellington's funeral?—The credits are on one side and the payments on the other, and the balance remaining.

3390. That is to say, the sums drawn from the Exchequer credit?—Yes; the payments out of that credit, and the sums remaining unapplied.

3391. I should like to see the Consolidated Fund charges for 1852?—As to the Consolidated Fund charges for 1852, the same principle applies to them as to all the other services. We pay out of our general balance, and ask for a credit, when it is proper that a credit should be issued. A case in point occurred to-day. We began to pay the Consolidated Fund charges to-day, and this morning we transferred 300,000*l.* from the balance at the Bank of Ireland; and that balance of 300,000*l.* will be exhausted before we give the Paymaster-general any credits for Consolidated Fund services; otherwise it would be necessary to issue to-day about 80,000*l.* deficiency bills, to provide for those charges, and pay the interest upon the same, while other money was lying dead in the Bank.

3392. Mr. Henley.] You have stated that money, when it goes out of the Exchequer, goes into the general drawing account, though the amount is entered to the credit of a particular account, say the Duke of Wellington's funeral, to which it properly belongs; and that the money then is applicable to the general purposes of the Paymaster, from the drawing account?—Yes.

3393. At what periods of the year, if any, are those accounts balanced up, showing showing what excess or payment over the credit in any account, or what amount less than the credit has been paid?—The Treasury receive from the Paymaster a monthly account, showing the service balance upon every vote in his books at the close of the month.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

7 July 1856.

3394. Is that made up at the end of the year, for the whole year?—No, it is made up at the close of every month, and it is sent to the Treasury a few days after the expiration of the month.

3395. Then at the end of the year there is no general making up of the account, but merely the months' accounts at the end of the year?—Each separate month's balance is made up; all the books are made up yearly and closed yearly.

3396. Is the account made up to the end of each month, carrying on the balance of the preceding month, or is it merely made up for the current month?—The receipts and payments are made up for each month, and the balance remaining to the credit of each service at the close of the month is carried on from month to month, and that monthly statement is transmitted to the Audit-office. The first would be one month's account, the second would be in two columns; showing in one the account for the month, and in the other the account for two months. In the next account, the account of three months, and so on till the last month of the year, when it would be an account for 12 months.

3397. If there is any balance on the whole of those accounts in the hands of the Paymaster-general for the respective services that have been voted for the year; does that go back into the Exchequer, or what becomes of it?—The balances in the Pay-office are always carried on from month to month; the final appropriation does not take place in this office; for the naval account eight months are allowed for closing the account in the departmental books. When that account is finally closed and made up for the year in the Admiralty a balance is struck which the Treasury withdraw from the votes to the credit of the navy in the Exchequer; they do not do that through the Paymaster at all; they tell the Exchequer that there is a surplus balance on account of the navy for the year ending in March last, and they withdraw from the funds at the disposal of the Admiralty in the Exchequer the amount of the balance, and declare it available as ways and means.

3398. Whenever this account is made up, say at the end of eight months, does that money in any way go back into the custody of the Exchequer?—Yes, certainly, for the army, navy, commissariat, and ordnance services; in fact, for the whole of the naval and military expenditure; but it does not for the civil services. Those have been considered running accounts for a great number of years; it is only when the Treasury, looking at the state of the votes, find that there is a surplus beyond what they think will be wanted, that they cancel the votes and tell the Exchequer to set aside the sums so cancelled.

3399. Does the Exchequer account that is published show the amount that is received, and if there be any, the surplus upon those votes which you have named?—The Exchequer account does not deal with those sums. The departmental accounts show those balances; they also show that they have been withdrawn from the funds at their disposal in the Exchequer.

3400. Then, in point of fact, the Exchequer account of the revenue and expenditure of the country does not show the repayment into the Exchequer of the surplus of the preceding year, nor how it gets out of the Exchequer to be used for any future services?—That is shown in the finance accounts presented annually by the Treasury. It does not appear in the Exchequer account, but in the finance accounts which are made up from the Exchequer transactions.

3401. Is there any reason why, if there is an actual payment of money brought in to the Comptroller of the Exchequer, it should not appear in the Exchequer accounts, or under what authority is it that the Comptroller of the Exchequer issues that balance so brought under his control?—The Comptroller of the Exchequer does not issue the balance, he merely cancels so much to the credit of the department, thus limiting the credit at the disposal of those departments; and it does not appear as a cash transaction at all, but as so much withdrawn from the fund at the credit of the department.

3402. If this cash has been absolutely issued out of the Exchequer, and comes into the Paymaster's hands, how does it get back to the Exchequer, or what becomes of it?—It is taken out of any monies at the disposal of the department. Supposing there was a surplus in March last on the final account of the navy of 100,000 l., that would have been issued because the whole of the grants for that year year were drawn out before this surplus would be ascertained; but when they close their final account, in November next, this balance will be reported to the Treasury, and the Treasury will tell the Exchequer to take out of the grants for the current year for the navy, 100,000 l.; so that the surplus on account of the last year would be taken away from the votes of the present year.

3403. Suppose 1,000,000 l. is voted for the navy for the year 1854–55, and that that sum shall not be expended by 50,000 l.; that 50,000 l. in hand is ascertained, if I understand you, eight months after the termination of the year. Then if 1,000,000 l. be also voted for the same service for the years 1855–56, will that 50,000 l. be deducted from the issue?—Certainly.

3404. Then there always is remaining a sum hanging in the Exchequer that does not appear in the Exchequer account?—The Exchequer account is a running cash account; the years run one into another, you cannot ascertain at the close of a year what the final state of the account will be eight months afterwards; therefore, when the account is finally closed, you take it out of any monies that stand at the time to the credit of the department in the Exchequer.

3405. You have stated that at the end of eight months the balance will be ascertained, but there is nothing to prevent the Government drawing out the whole of that money, under the authority of Parliament, from the Exchequer which has been voted for the service of the year?—Nothing.

3406. Then what I want to know is, what security is there that this surplus money should properly get back into the Exchequer to come under the control of Parliament?—It gets back into the Exchequer by deducting from the funds, at the credit of the naval department, the exact amount of surplus on the closed accounts.

3407. You tell the Committee that that is the way that it is practically done; but there is nothing to prevent the Government, if they should think fit, from drawing out of the Exchequer the whole of the money voted for that year, without any reference to the balance they have in the Paymaster's hands?—If they did not withdraw that money from the funds, at the credit of the department, it would be shown at once in the account which the Audit Board presents to Parliament, because the first item is the balance of the preceding year; and they state on the face of the account that that sum has been withdrawn from the funds, at the credit of the navy, in the Exchequer; and they always annex to the account a copy of the Treasury letter by which that deduction has been authorised.

3408–9. Is that Treasury letter an authority to the Comptroller of the Exchequer to issue upon the vote of that year so much less money as that balance accounts for?—Precisely so.

3410. That is clear, is it?—Quite so.

3411. That Treasury letter informs him that that surplus of the preceding year is an authority for him to deduct from the vote of Parliament for the current year that amount, whatever it may be?—It is so.

3412. Assuming that the account was closed, as in the instance of this account of the Duke of Wellington's funeral, and no further vote made by Parliament, how would that balance get back into the Exchequer from the Paymaster?—If you had an annual audited account for civil services similar to the account for the army, navy and ordnance, the circumstances of the Duke of Wellington's funeral never could have occurred, because, at the time fixed for closing the account, that balance would have been cancelled; but by leaving those services open for an indefinite period you allow those balances to be retained. What would have occurred in the case of the Duke of Wellington's funeral would have been this, that at the end of the first year there would have remained a certain sum unexpended on the vote, which would have been surrendered to the Exchequer, and made available as ways and means, and the Government would have applied to Parliament to re-vote an amount to meet the charges which remained unpaid at that date; but, according to the principle which has guided the Government for many years in the application of the miscellaneous votes, the unexpended balances are carried on, and are consequently not re-voted.

3413. Are the Committee to understand that the Exchequer accounts do not show those credits of which you have spoken, being carried on through the Audit-office by a Treasury letter?—No, the Exchequer accounts do not, because they are founded upon credits, as I explained before. It would be better if all accounts of expenditure were founded upon actual payments; the Exchequer account account being founded upon credits, and not upon payments, does not show the unexpended balances on the votes.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

7 July 1856.

3414. Why should not the Exchequer account show the money that they actually transfer from the Exchequer to the Paymaster?—The Exchequer account does show that; it shows the transfer; but if the Paymaster has not paid away that money the Exchequer account would not show it, but the Paymaster's account would.

3415. What I mean is this, 1,000,000 l. being voted in 1854-55 for a particular service, and 50,000 l. being unexpended, and 1,000,000 l. being voted for the same service in 1855-56, why should not the Exchequer account show, at the close of 1855-56, that they had only issued 950,000 l. of that vote, because there was a surplus of 50,000 l. in the preceding year?—The Exchequer account would show in the subsequent year the issues and the balance minus the sum withdrawn.

3416. I asked you whether it does show it or not?—No; it merely shows the actual sums issued within the year.

3417. Then if it only issued 950,000 l., instead of 1,000,000 l., the account would show that?—Certainly.

3418. But not the reason of it?—No; the Exchequer account would not show that particular transaction. The Exchequer account is like the Paymaster's account, a mere cash account; whereas, the account upon which this balance is struck is the aggregate of a series of accounts embracing the transactions of a number of persons scattered all over the world.

3419. It would show the transaction though not the reason of it. It would show 950,000 l. issued instead of 1,000,000 l., though not the reason why that 950,000 l. was issued; and it would show that 950,000 l. being only issued, there would remain in the control of the Exchequer, 50,000 l.?—Yes; but the account would still be complicated by the same transaction in former years.

3420. Mr. Bowyer.] Would not that, as an unexpended balance, be transferred back to the Exchequer, and be re-issued by the Exchequer as a part of the vote for the next year?—No; the sum cancelled upon that balance in the account is withdrawn at once, therefore it would act pro tanto as a reduction of the grant for the subsequent year.

3421. Then that money is re-transferred, is it not, to the Exchequer, by cancellation?—Yes; by cancellation of the surplus balance.

3422. Suppose Parliament voted the same sum for next year, as for the last, on which there was this balance, then that unexpended balance transferred by cancellation would be re-issued out of the Exchequer?—No; it is declared at once as available as ways and means.

3423. How does it get out of the Exchequer again?—By ways and means grants; it is not money; it is merely a matter of account.

3424. Then it is re-issued, is it not?—The sum is cancelled, and brought to account in this way: you grant in the next year so much less ways and means to the Government, because they have this surplus remaining on the prior year. You will see in every Appropriation Act a clause appropriating to the service of the year any surplus of ways and means granted in the prior year which is not required.

3425. Supposing the Government thought fit not to refuse the ways and means for that vote next year, how would that appear?—All the surplus ways and means of prior years are shown annually in the finance accounts, and a vote is taken in Committee of Ways and Means to appropriate them to the service of the succeeding year.

3426. Therefore, the Government could not keep on that balance as a continued balance?—No.

3427. Mr. Hankey.] Would not the account present the same aspect exactly, as if only 950,000 l. had been originally voted?—That is the effect of it.

3428. Mr. Williams.] You have stated that the balance, or the unexpended part of the votes of one year, is applied to the next year?—It is taken in aid of the ways and means of the following year.

3429. Is that amount deducted from the estimates of the next year, or is it merely applied for payment of part of the estimates?—Practically it is deducted from the estimates of the next year; it is deducted from the votes of ways and means. For instance, when you have closed the account for one year, and a balance balance remains, you tell the Exchequer to take out of the grants remaining at the disposal of the department for the next year, an equal sum.

3430. Supposing the army estimates of one year amount to 7,000,000 l., and there is 100,000 l. of that sum unexpended, would that 100,000 l. be deducted from the estimates of the next year, supposing the same amount to be required?—No, it is not done by deduction from the estimate, because the surplus cannot be ascertained when the estimate is formed, but the sum voted upon that estimate is the sum from which the 100,000 l. will be deducted. Therefore, it comes to precisely the same thing as if you knew your surplus balance at the time of taking the estimate, and then deducted it from the estimate, and allowed the department to keep the balance.

3431. I find that in the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Budget he states the exact amount of the estimates to make out his ways and means, therefore I infer from that circumstance that the amount of the surplus is not deducted from the estimate?—The Budget is itself only an estimate, upon which you allow the Government to raise the taxes necessary to meet the expenditure for the year, but the final account of the expenditure is the account upon which the settlement of these transactions takes place.

3432. Chairman.] Will you have the goodness to state as to all the Civil List charges upon the Consolidated Fund, the first charges which are chargeable upon the Consolidated Fund?—The first class of the Civil List is generally paid out of the growing produce of the Consolidated Fund; that is the privy purse.

3433. What book have you before you?—This is an "Abstract of the Consolidated Fund Services."

3435. Will you take the next payment from the Consolidated Fund for the next service?—The first payment was on the 2d of April, 153 l. 15 s., which was the exact amount of the balance remaining in hand on the 31st of March.

3436. Take the next payment from the Consolidated Fund for the next service?—It was on the 30th of June, 24,268 l., and the Exchequer credit on the same day was 31,629 l.

3437. Take the next instance?—For the third class there was a balance on the 1st of April of 1,257 l.; the payment on the 2d of April was the exact amount of that. The next payment was for the expenses of the Lord Chamberlain's department, 6,229 l., on the 12th of April; and the Exchequer credit was on the same day. In the fourth class the first payment was on the 7th of April, 250 l., and the Exchequer credit was on the 8th for the exact amount. The fifth class embraces the pensions; the first payment was on the 7th of April of 568 l.; and the Exchequer credit was on the 8th, 2,888 l. With regard to the sixth class, the first payment was on the 8th of July, 850 l., and the Exchequer credit was on the same day. Then I come to the annuities and pensions; these credits are irrespective of the balances that are brought forward on the 1st of April. With regard to the annuities and pensions, the first payment was on the 6th of April, 4,203 l., and the Exchequer credit was not granted until the 19th.

3438. Between that and the 19th is there any further payment?—Yes, several; a great part of the whole charge had been paid, and the reason for that, so far as I recollect, was, that at that time we were issuing ways and means bills; we had very little money in the Exchequer then, and we issued ways and means bills, which can only be issued for supply services. The object was to make the issue at the time when it could be paid off without incurring the charge of interest; that applies to the whole of the Consolidated Fund. We should issue credits on the very day on which the payment commenced, if we could do it without entailing a charge for interest; we are paying to-day various charges on the Consolidated Fund, and if money issued from the Exchequer to meet them it would be necessary to make that issue by deficiency bills, bearing interest; but having transferred on Saturday 300,000 l. from Ireland to the Bank of England, to meet the current payments, we delay the issue from the Consolidated Fund till that money is gone; the head of salaries and allowances would be in precisely the same situation.

3439. Will you state the dates?—The first issue for salaries and allowances is on the 6th of April, 11,591 l., and the Exchequer credit of 43,088 l. was not till till the 20th of April. With regard to "Courts of Justice," the first payment was for 755 l. on the 6th of April, and the Exchequer credit for 50,000 l. was not until the 28th of April.

3440. Between that and the Exchequer credit issuing, was there a considerable sum paid?—Nearly the whole; 50,000 l. was drawn to cover all the payments, and to leave a small balance for future services; under the title "Diplomatic" the first payment was not until the 7th of May. The charges are 3,212 l.; and the Exchequer credit was not until the 20th of May for 32,000 l.

3442. Chairman.] What are the miscellaneous charges?—They are the compensations for the loss of tin duties, payable to the Duchy of Cornwall; and there is the Russian Dutch loan, the annuity to Greenwich Hospital, and the Greek loan; those are all payable under that head.

3443. When do they become chargeable; at the beginning of the quarter?—The Russian Dutch loan is only chargeable twice in the year, generally at the end of the quarter, and the Greek loan also.

3444. You have not one account entirely for miscellaneous charges, have you?—Yes, only one account.

3445. Will you have the goodness to turn to that?—The 6th of April 1852; the first payment is 3,153 l. 8 s. 3 d.; the Exchequer credit was not till the 28th April, 18,681 l.

3446. In the meantime was the principal part of it spent?—About 14,000 l. of it had been spent.

3447. Before any credit was taken?—Before the credit was issued.

3448. Will you have the goodness now to take the miscellaneous votes?—They are very numerous, but a separate account is kept for each.

3449. Take the public buildings and Royal palaces?—The first payment was on the 1st of April, 9 l. 7 s. 3 d., and there are various small sums up to the 19th of April when there was a payment of 6,468 l.; there was a balance on the 1st of April of 1,616 l., and an Exchequer credit on the 5th for 10,000 l. This account was in full credit the whole of the month.

3450. You did not exceed your credits?—No, nor anticipate them. The next item is "Royal Parks." The balance on the 1st of April 1852 was 1,293 l., and the credit on the 30th, 300 l. There were other credits through the cash account also in that month; there were no payments of any consequence in that month; the whole of the payments amounted to 2,166 l., and the balance was overdrawn on the last day of the month, 256 l.

3451. When did you get the credit?—Some cash was paid in on the 8th; there was no Exchequer credit drawn till the 31st of May.

3452. How did the account stand when you applied for an Exchequer credit?—It was then overdrawn at the end of that month, 3,571 l.; at the end of the next month it is 870 l. in credit; at the end of the following month it is 449 l. in credit; at the end of the following month it is 1,299 l. in credit; at the end of the following month it is 613 l. in credit; and that goes on from month to month; it does not appear that it has been overdrawn again within the year.

3453. That is at the end of the month?—Yes. It was overdrawn in various small sums up to the 25th of the month when an issue placed it in credit.

3454. It has been stated in evidence, I think, by Mr. Hoffay, that before the end of the month it was the habit to obtain Exchequer credits to cover the advances?—Yes, generally; but as the monies are drawn out on estimate, it will always occur that there are payments which you cannot provide for.

3455. But the state of the account at the end of the month would not show what the course of the transactions had been during the month?—Not on each day.

3456. Now take the Treasury?—The Treasury on the 1st of April 1852 was overdrawn 81 l., and they got a credit of 7,000 l. on the 5th, but they began paying the salaries on the 1st.

3457. They did not advance from the civil contingencies?—No. Those issues have generally been made at the close of the financial year; the 5th was the last day of the financial year, and they generally made all those transfers on that day; now it is always done on the 31st of March; the payments commence on the 1st of April.

3458. When

3458. When was the account set right; when was the first issue?—It was all set right on the 5th.

3459. Will you now turn to some other office?—The "Home Department" was overdrawn 1,757 l. on the 1st of April; the Exchequer credit was on the 5th; but there were very few payments in that month, not above 855 l. in the whole month.

3460. When was the first credit?—On the 5th; the credits for salaries were all issued, no doubt, on the same day. The "Foreign Department" credit was on the 5th also.

3461. Were the salaries paid before the monies were issued?—Part of them were, but of course all these services had balances in the Exchequer.

3462. Sir Henry Willoughby.] Where did you say the money was?—There were credits in the Exchequer which more than covered all those sums overdrawn.

3463. Chairman.] You had not exceeded your vote, but there was no credit in the Exchequer?—It is not a credit till it is out of the Exchequer.

3464. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] You mean that there were funds in the Exchequer?—Yes.

3465. Chairman.] Were there votes before you paid those sums?—Yes; the payments in April relate to the prior year, and not to the current year.

3466. You pay for the bygone quarter, do you not?—Yes.

3467. Take another class, if you please?—Class 3: "Sheriffs' Expenses." There was a balance of 1,117 l. remaining on the 1st of April; the payments of the whole month were only 396 l., therefore there was no anticipation there. "Law Charges in Scotland:" the first payment was 5,000 l. on the 23d of June, and the second payment was 3,382 l. on the 28th June. The Exchequer credit for the second was issued on the 28th of June, and a further sum of 2,167 l. 10 s.

3468. Sir Henry Willoughby.] What do you mean by anticipating the next year's grant?—I think this 2,832 l. overdrawn on the 1st of July would be on account of the current year; whether the votes had been taken then I cannot exactly say; the probability is, that on the 1st of July they would be, because on the 3d the sum of 3,500 l. was drawn to cover it.

3469. Chairman.] Can you state whether that account was overdrawn on the 1st of April?—It was not overdrawn then; there were no payments till June. It was overdrawn on the 30th of June, 2,832 l.; and on the 3d of July a credit was drawn to cover it. "Prosecutions formerly charged on the county rates." There was a balance of 1,281 l. on the 1st of April. On the 5th, an Exchequer credit of 27,157 l. was drawn; and the payments go on from day to day throughout the month, leaving a balance at the end of the month of 1,765 l. The next item is, "Prisons' superintendence." There was a balance, on the 1st of April, of 874 l., and on the 1st of April there was a payment of 1,125 l., and there are a few small payments throughout the month, making the whole payment in the month of 1,710 l. An Exchequer credit was drawn, on the 29th of April, of 1,200 l., which put the account in credit, 364 l. A small sum, a few hundred pounds, was overdrawn between the 1st and the 29th. "Establishments of prisons at home;" there was a very large balance on that, on the 1st of April, which covered the whole of the payments of the month.

3470. How much was there on the 1st of April?—Fifty-four thousand and seventeen pounds. There is a large expenditure on that vote.

3471. How long had that balance remained?—Probably not many days. It is generally towards the end of the month that it would be drawn.

3472. How came you to draw out 54,000 l. without demands of any importance pressing?—It was no doubt supposed that large demands were coming in.

3473. Did they generally fall due about that time?—Yes, all the charges for prisons come in about that time; but this sum appears to have been larger than was necessary.

3474. How did the accounts stand at the end of April?—A balance of 50,000 l. at the end of April.

3475. Now look to the end of May?—Then it was reduced to 25,000 l., and at the end of June to 10,000 l.

3476. When did you get any Exchequer credit?—There was one on the 23d of April, and nothing till the 29th of July.

3477. How did that account stand on the 23d of April?—There was money on the account; a large sum. I cannot say why it was drawn; there appears to have been no necessity for it.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

7 July 1856.

3478. How much was drawn when there was that balance?—£. 16,000; I suppose claims came in, and that balance must have been lost sight of when a further credit was issued.

3479. How much; had you any balance at that time?—About 30,000 l. or nearly so; at the end of June 10,000 l. Then a credit was drawn in July of 7,000 l., and the balance at the end of July was 1,765 l., and further credits in the following month of 25,000 l.; the balance at the end of that month was overdrawn 2,400 l.

3480. When was it set right?—On the 13th of the next month; at the end of September it was in credit 5,832 l.

3481. Then in October what was it?—Including all the credits drawn in the previous month, the balance was 5,607 l.; at the end of November 6,696 l.; at the end of December it was overdrawn 190 l.; at the end of January it was 457 l. in credit; at the end of February 1,935 l. in credit, and at the end of March 4,927 l.

3483. Go on to the next?—"Transportation of convicts;" the balance on the 1st of April was 5,545 l.; the first credit was for 15,299 l., on the 29th of April; on the 30th it was paid away as a transfer to the navy; the monthly balances ran as follows: 5,545 l. on the 1st of April; on the 1st of May, 2,826 l.; on the 1st of June, 2,666 l.; on the 1st of July, 2,376 l.; on the 1st of August, 2,642 l.; on the 1st of September, 2,366 l.; on the 1st of October the balance was overdrawn in consequence of a large transfer to the navy on the previous day of 12,436 l., and it was drawn out and adjusted on the 9th of October.

3484. Sir Henry Willoughby.] How do you know it went to the navy?—I have it here, on the opposite side of the account; most likely the transfer order came on the last day.

3485. Who was the judge of that?—The naval department order the Paymaster on the last day to receive the amount; there is a transfer order from the prisons department, and a receivable order from the navy.

3486. Who sanctioned the transfer from that particular account to the naval department?—The transfer is authorised by the department controlling the expenditure; that is the department of the directors of convict prisons; that transfer of 12,000 l. placed the account in debit.

3487. Chairman.] How came the convict establishments to be connected with the navy?—For supplies made by the navy, connected most likely with the fitting of convict ships.

3488. Not in the ports is it?—At the dockyards. I believe all convict ships are fitted by the navy, and the Admiralty make their claim on the prison department, and it is adjusted by a transfer. The balance on the 1st of November was 387 l. in credit; on the 1st of December it was 2,679 l.

3489. Mr. Wilson.] It has been stated before the Committee that you had drawn 54,000 l. for the convict department last month, and it was inferred from the answer given to the question that it must have been drawn from another service; will you explain what that 54,000 l. was, in reference to what you have been stating?—I think it was about 340,000 l. that was drawn out on the 31st of March to make a payment to the commissariat chest for advances made abroad, for the expense of convicts in the colonies; a claim was made by the Audit Board on the previous day, and a credit was drawn to meet that payment.

3490. Chairman.] I thought those claims were settled quarterly or monthly?—No; most of those civil claims are only settled annually, upon the preparation, by the Audit Board, of the annual account of the commissariat chest.

3491. But the claims against the army, navy, and ordnance are not only settled monthly, but I think all the claims are settled by payment in advance, are they not?—They are settled with those great departments by a payment on account at the close of every month, but the final settlement only takes place at the close of the year, when they pay the balance.

3492. At the end of the year there is a final settlement, is there not?—Yes.

3493. Is it the same thing with the civil votes?—No; that is not done with them; with the exception of this one item, they are not large enough to make it important to do that.

3494. The sum total of those items must be very considerable with the commissariat chest?—This item is much larger than all the rest put together.

3495. Why is not that system applied to them?—There is no reason why we should not have a sum transferred to the chest on account, instead of leaving so large a transfer to be made at the close of the year. It rests a good deal with the Audit Board when they make their claim; if the Treasury told them to do it quarterly or monthly, they would do it on the receipt of the accounts from abroad. With regard to "Public Education," there was a balance of credit of 2,089 l. on the 1st of April, and a credit was received on the 5th, of 10,000 l., and the payments are carried on from day to day. It appears that those sums were not quite sufficient to cover the payments; it was overdrawn on the last day 1,200 l.

3496. When did you apply for a fresh credit?—A credit was obtained on the 10th for 20,000 l.

3497. How did your account stand on the 10th when you set it right?—It must have been about 18,000 l., and we drew 20,000 l. to square it, and leave a small balance to carry on the service, and at the end of the month it was 1,618 l. in credit; at the end of the following month it was 647 l., and at the end of the following month it was 3,455 l. overdrawn.

3498. When was that set right?—On the 12th there was an Exchequer credit for 20,000 l. At the end of the following month it was again overdrawn 2,766 l., and on the 13th it was set right by the issue of 25,000 l. Then the Post-office had a claim of 17,000 l. on the same day, and at the end of the month it was again in credit 1,505 l. At the end of the following month it was 116 l. overdrawn; a large payment was made on the preceding day, and 116 l. was overdrawn on the 31st of October; and on the 8th of November there was a credit of 20,000 l. to meet a large payment of 16,000 l. to the Post-office on that day.

3499. In how many of those months does it appear that the account is overdrawn at the end of the month?—Five.

3500. Will you just turn to another account?—"British Museum;" a payment was made on the 17th of June, of 7,085 l.; the trustees generally get an advance from civil contingencies to commence the year's service with; it is generally voted late, and nothing was paid till the 17th of June, when 7,085 l. was paid, and on the 30th of June 6,000 l. more, making 13,085 l., for which the exact sum was drawn on the 29th of June; all the other receipts and payments are generally on the same day. With regard to the "British Museum Building, Works Accounts," there was a balance on the 1st of April of 1,163 l.; a payment was made on the 8th of May of 6,033 l., and the credit was not drawn till the 31st of May of 7,000 l., which placed the account in credit; and it continued so throughout the year.

3501. What is the next?—"Colonial and Consular Services, Bermuda;" a balance of 111 l. on the 1st of April. "North America;" on the 1st of April, 703 l. in credit, and a further credit drawn on the 5th, 374 l.; the payments in the whole month were small. As to the head of "Governors, West Indies," there was a balance of 670 l. in credit on the 1st of April, and a credit of 676 l. on the 5th, and there was no large payment till the 20th; and there was a further credit of 2,000 l. on the 30th; the payments upon the whole fund exceeded the credit by 71 l., and there seems to have been a credit there by transfer from another vote for correction of an error, which put it in credit 478 l. "Justices, West Indies;" the balance there is 173 l. on the 1st of April, and the Exchequer credit on the 5th was 22,451 l.; and there was a transfer for the exact amount to the commissariat chest, which was made at the close of the month; then there is nothing of any importance throughout the year, there were small sums only. "Western Coast of Africa;" there was a balance on the 1st of April of 529 l., there was a credit on the 5th of various sums; the payments in the month were 3,870 l., leaving a balance of 473 l. "Western Australia;" the balance on the 1st of April was 502 l. in credit; there were two Exchequer credits on the 5th, 6,028 l., and a transfer at the end of that month for 6,286 l. to the commissariat chest; the balance continues in credit throughout the year; they are only small sums. "Hong Kong;" the balance was 178 l., and the Exchequer credit drawn to the amount of 12,971 l.; and there was a transfer of that exact amount to the commissariat chest, leaving the same balance of 178 l. at the close of the month. "Emigration;" that is a large vote, and on that there was a balance of

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

7 July 1856.

of 457 l. on the 1st of April, and an Exchequer credit of 1,500 l. on the 29th; the payments in the whole month were 2,100 l., overdrawing the account by 200 l.

3502. Does that account continue overdrawn?—No, it is set right again. The next balance is 300 l. at the end of that month: the following month it is 1,500 l. in credit, and then it is overdrawn 636 l.; the next month it is overdrawn 243 l., and there is a credit balance in the following month of 2,510 l.; it is overdrawn at the end of the month 224 l., and the following month in credit again 437 l.

3503. In how many months does it appear that the accounts are overdrawn?—Four; all the rest are in credit. "Consuls abroad;" the balance on the 1st of April was 706 l. in credit; on the 5th there were two Exchequer credits amounting to 37,916 l., and another, on the 29th, of 5,000 l.; the payments in the month were 45,000 l., overdrawing the account, at the end of the month, 1,589 l., owing to a large transfer at the close of that month to the commissariat chest; in the following month it was overdrawn 1,000 l.; then it is in credit again; the following month it is overdrawn 1,609 l.; then it comes to 2,481 l. in credit; the following month it is overdrawn 4,733 l.; in the following month it is in credit again 519 l.; in January it is 112 l. overdrawn again; the next month it is 3,211 l. in credit; the next month it is 3,025 l. in credit; and, at the close of the year, it is 3,284 l. in credit.

3504. How many are there overdrawn in that account?—Five; that is one of the services as to which it is very difficult to foresee the expenditure; the claims come in principally by bills of exchange drawn from abroad.

3505. At what date are they drawn?—At various dates.

3506. Not at sight?—No; I think very few of those bills are drawn at much less than 10 days. With regard to the "Board of Health," there was no balance; there was a credit of 5,000 l. on the 30th of June, and a payment, on the 29th of June, to the same amount; and the same in December; there was 5,000 l. on each side of the account. On the item, "Alterations in new Houses of Commons," there is 4,400 l., which is carried on: Under "Census of the Population;" the balance on the 1st of April was 2,946 l. in credit; there were no payments till the 7th of June; and credits were drawn in June to cover the payments, leaving a balance of 946 l.

3507. Was there any credit drawn before the 7th of June?—No; the account continues in credit throughout the year, small sums; the 2,946 l. went in part payment of the sum of 4,000 l., which was balanced by an issue, at the close of the month, of 2,220 l.

3508. How much were they overdrawn?—About 1,000 l. from the 7th to the 30th of June.

3509. Sir Henry Willoughby.] Was that a payment authorised by the Treasury?—Yes, every payment is authorised; no payment is made without full authority.

3510. Did the Treasury then know that you had no credit?—No; the Treasury would only know when the Paymaster applied for the money; they cannot know unless they have an account laid before them daily.

3511. Sir James Graham.] The account at the Bank is a general account, and not a branched account?—Yes.

3512. All this branching is in your books, but it does not bear upon your cash credit at all?—No.

3513. This branching is not controlled by the Comptroller of the Exchequer in any way?—No. The Comptroller of the Exchequer only knows when the money is demanded; it is demanded generally on all those votes that are overdrawn; credits are always drawn upon those votes; none of those sums overdrawn are in excess of the grants; care is taken that there are funds always to meet them in the Exchequer.

3514. All that the Comptroller of the Exchequer looks to is, to see whether, under any head, you are in excess of the vote?—Yes.

3515. If you are within the vote, he has no control whatever with respect to the payments into the general cash account at the Bank?—None.

3516. The general cash account is not branched, and as long as the whole account is not overdrawn you can operate upon it as necessity requires?—Yes; we can operate upon it within the limits of the respective votes. Nothing can be more troublesome than this splitting up of the cash; it is almost impossible to work it. It appears to me that such a mode of regulating the cash account is contrary contrary to common sense; it ought to be one fund, and the money should be issued as it is wanted. The appropriation ought to be, not against the daily credit, but against the annual vote; then the accounts would be always in credit.

3517. Mr. Wilson.] You mean daily payments against the vote, in order to see that no issue is made beyond the vote which Parliament has sanctioned?—Precisely.

3518. Mr. Cardwell.] Do you see any result in that book except the labour of keeping it?—Nothing. The keeping of this credit account does not prevent our keeping two vote accounts in addition to this.

3519. Mr. Wilson.] This account would be quite necessary, would it not, for the knowledge of the Paymaster, to see that he never made a payment beyond the amount which Parliament had authorised?—Yes; at the head of the account of every one of these we have the amount of the vote stated, to see that no issue is made beyond it.

3520. Mr. Bowyer.] This book is produced to show how you stand from time to time as to the Exchequer credits?—Yes. At the same time we keep in view at the head of these accounts the annual vote, to see that when the account is overdrawn it is not beyond the amount that we can draw on applying for it. The account for the Duke of Wellington's funeral is 14,000 l., paid out of civil contingencies, not in anticipation of the vote, but in anticipation of the issue of the credit. Lord Monteagle holds that he cannot issue money for the service of the year before the 1st of April. I have very strong doubts as to whether his law is quite good on that point, because the service may commence before the 1st of April. He considers that he cannot make an issue before that date, because the ways and means belong to that particular year, and no other.

3521. Sir Henry Willoughby.] You stated that two accounts were kept; what did that mean?—There are two accounts kept with each vote; there is this cash account, which shows the amount of the Exchequer credits received on each vote, and the amount of payments against those Exchequer credits; and another account is kept of the annual votes, with the payments set off against those votes; a third account is kept, showing the Exchequer credits on one side and the vote on the other, and the balance of credits unissued.

3522. Mr. Bowyer.] Without this book you would not know when you wanted new credits?—No. If it were not for our being compelled to ask for credits under specific heads of service, we should not keep separate accounts for that purpose.

3523. Mr. Cardwell.] The necessity for keeping all that detailed account, which you have described as giving no practical information to anybody, would be dispensed with if you were permitted to do in point of form what you actually do in substance, namely, take the balance to your credit to meet all the demands that are likely to be made upon you?—Precisely.

3524. Then an account showing the vote at the top of the page on one side and the payments on the other would answer all the purposes of that very complicated book?—Yes, because there ought to be only one account of the appropriation.

3525. The other account would have the advantage of being, to all intents and purposes, true, whereas that is not only a mere form, but if it appears to convey any information, it is all moonshine?—The necessity of keeping those credits, which are issued for specific services, distinct under each separate vote, compels us to keep three sets of accounts. We ought to be able to do what the Comptroller of the Exchequer would do, if he managed the payments; suppose the Exchequer made the payments in detail, the course which the Comptroller of the Exchequer would follow, would be to make those payments from day to day and charge them against the annual votes; but by having two offices to do the same thing, there are two intermediate accounts raised which are extremely troublesome from the time that they consume, and they lead to no result after all. We could draw any sums that we wanted for those services, and keep them all in credit if unlimited balances were allowed.

3526. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Two out of the three books are rendered necessary by the Exchequer system?—Yes; by the necessity of keeping our accounts so as to square exactly with those of the Exchequer.

3527. Mr. Williams.] Is not that book before you a sort of cash book?—Yes, it is a cash book split up into 200 or 300 cash accounts, instead of having one.

3528. Do you keep a regular cash book?—Yes.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

7 July 1856.

3529. Mr. Henley.] Is that book out of which you have been reading, a fair sample of the various years?—I question if the issues are usually so late as they were made in April that year; there was a disturbing cause which does not usually exist.

3530. Mr. Williams.] How are the accounts furnished to you of the different amounts; are they by bills sent in or by warrants?—Claims come in from all quarters. They come in either by letters, by orders for payment in a particular form, by warrants, by negotiable bills at various dates, by bills at sight, and by personal application; a vast number of them are by personal application.

3531. When personal applications are made, how are you made acquainted with the particulars of the items in a business-like form?—All those relate to the non-effective services, and there is an account opened with each individual, many thousands, stating the sums which they are authorised to receive periodically, and an estimate of the sum likely to be demanded on a particular day is made.

3532. Mr. Bowyer.] Instead of applying from time to time for Exchequer credits, and keeping an account against them, you would propose to take a credit for the whole vote at once?—I should propose that the issue should be made to us for the estimated amount of our payments on each day, but not appropriated in anticipation of payments; it should be out of a general fund, out of the general votes, and an account of that should be rendered. I think that a system of that kind might be carried out, supposing the Exchequer to remain.

3533. Chairman.] Do you mean that you should have a credit for one sum of money?—Say that the payments of to-day are estimated at 100,000 l. that 100,000 l. should be issued from the Exchequer out of the general vot and at the close of the day the actual appropriation should be charged agai t the votes upon the actual issues; and therefore that the Paymaster should be dealt with as an imprest accountant, the same as any one of the great departments deals with a naval storekeeper or other paying officer.

3534. Sir James Graham.] Coupled with a concurrent audit?—Yes.

3535. Mr. Bowyer.] Then it would be safe if you had the whole put to your credit at once?— Yes.

3536. Mr. Wilson.] Would not the effect of that be simply that instead of making your specific appropriations by estimates, as at present, without knowing what will be required, you would make your specific appropriation in that case by absolute payment, when you could do it accurately?—Yes; by accurate payments upon vouchers.

3537. Mr. Bowyer.] You would keep your account against the votes, and not against credits?—Yes; and the effect would be as if we had the whole vote at our credit at once.

3538. Chairman.] What would you do with those repayments from one account to another?—The repayments from one account to another are like cash receipts to the credit of one account and payments to the debit of another; those come in in addition to the Exchequer credits.

3539. You must keep an account of them?—Yes; the same as with the cash account.

3540. Would not that break in a little upon the simplicity of your account?—No; because any credit that is paid to the credit of a vote, would be a deduction from the sum to be accounted for to the Exchequer. Supposing that the Comptroller of the Exchequer issued 100,000 l. for payments to-day, and the Paymaster received, in addition to that 100,000 l., 5,000 l. on his cash account to the credit of the navy, he would return his payments out of the 100,000 l. to the Exchequer less by that sum, and the 5,000 l. which had been paid into the cash account would thus go in reduction of the naval payments.

3541. Mr. Henley.] You would then provide against an issue from the Exchequer beyond the amount of the vote upon the system you have suggested, but if I understand it, you would ask for 100,000 l. on account, and as soon as it was expended you would return the different heads to the Exchequer; but how would you provide or guard against the Exchequer being asked for a sum that might overrun the amount of the vote in the Exchequer?—The Exchequer would see, from day to day, throughout the year, the progress of the expenditure of each separate vote, and when they came close upon the balance then would be the time to stop before any issue had been made. It would be necessary then that some step should be taken to prevent an over-issue by the Paymaster.

3542. Must

3542. Must the Exchequer then stop the issue of any money, from the Exchequer being in ignorance as to what account the Treasury intended to apply it; 100,000 l. being asked for, some votes being all expended, and others not, how would you deal with that?—The Exchequer would know when a vote was exhausted; but there is nothing under the present system that would prevent a payment in excess of the vote. By the issue under specific votes, there is nothing to prevent the payment of a larger sum that the Exchequer has issued; it may be drawn under one vote and paid away for others; at present the Exchequer does not know that, but under the proposed system they would know it at the close of the day.

3543. At present, if the whole of the money voted for the navy were issued from the Exchequer, and you asked for a further sum, the Comptroller would not issue it?—No; but he must issue whatever is demanded. I do not know of any case in which an application has ever been made for an issue beyond the vote; you would have the same control over an improper application as now, so far as the Exchequer is concerned, with this advantage, that the Exchequer would know it, whereas now it does not.

3544. I understand that you propose to ask for money on account from the Exchequer?—Yes; to ask for money on account, and to give a statement of the application of it under the different votes.

3545. Would there be any security in any way for the amount of a particular vote not being exceeded?—There would be no more security for the amount of a particular vote not being exceeded than under the present system; but the moment a vote was exhausted by payments returned, of course steps must be taken to adjust that.

3546. Are the Committee to understand that now, if the vote for the navy was 2,000,000 l., and the Treasury asked for 2,500,000 l., the Comptroller of the Exchequer would issue 500,000 l. in excess?—No, he cannot do that.

3547. Then there is a security now?—Yes, as to the issue, but not as to the application.

3548. The money is in the Exchequer, and until it is issued you cannot apply it, is not that so?—Precisely.

3549. You say that now it could not be issued in excess of the vote?—It cannot.

3550. I ask you whether, if under the system you propose, you asked for money on account, without telling the Comptroller of the Exchequer to what purposes it was to be applied, what security there would be that money would not be applied in excess of a vote?—No other security than there is now.

3551. At present you say it cannot be issued out of the Exchequer; what is the security; you may apply other monies that you take out of the Exchequer upon the plea of applying them to other purposes, and wrongfully apply them?—Yes.

3552. But you cannot get money out of the Exchequer without its being clear upon the face of it that you have so wrongfully applied it?—But that never appears, because you never ask the Exchequer for any issue beyond the vote.

3553. The issue now from the Exchequer is upon the credit of a particular vote?—Yes.

3554. It seems to me that you might be taking money generally, and that you might apply it in excess of particular votes, and that in that way the Exchequer really would have issued in excess of the vote without knowing it?—But they could not issue in excess of the aggregate of the votes at any time.

3555. Mr. Wilson.] Is not the difference this, that at the present moment you can issue from the Exchequer the whole amount of the money included in the Appropriation Act up to the last shilling, only you must do it under the various heads under which Parliament has voted it; but when you have that money in the Paymaster's-office, issued from the Exchequer, you have the power of applying it as you please, without any control of the Exchequer, if the Treasury are so disposed?—Yes, that is the system.

3556. There is no check upon the application of those monies after they come out of the Exchequer?—No; the Exchequer check practically applies only to the aggregate votes, not to issues under specific votes. As to the application of the money, it can only limit the application to the aggregate of the votes.

3557. Without reference to what you have done with the issues which have been already made through the Exchequer, you are entitled now, as the law stands, stands, to issue upon any vote which may be unexhausted up to the aggregate amount of the votes?—Yes.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

7 July 1856.

3558. Suppose you had issues, as you propose, by sums from day to day, and not appropriated, the only check you would have is what you have now, as to the aggregate votes of Parliament?—Yes, just the same security that we have now with regard to the specific issues.

3559. If 57,000,000 l. are voted, you can get them out of the Exchequer without any interference of the Exchequer; but you take them and cut them in pieces in the way in which Parliament has voted them?—Yes.

3560. If you took it in your way how would it be?—In either case you get the aggregate amount of the votes.

3561. Mr. Bowyer.] I understand that the only way in which you can exceed the vote would be by applying to the Exchequer for money on an unexhausted vote, and then misapplying that money to a vote which already had been exhausted?—Precisely so, as that is the only way.

3562. Then according to the plan you propose, you would take money from the Exchequer, without saying how you meant to apply it, and then you could apply it to the exhausted vote?—We could do so, but the rule is always to look to the aggregate credit.

3563. My question is this: could you apply to the Exchequer for money without saying what you meant to do with it; could you misapply it to a vote which had been already exhausted?—Yes, we could do it under the proposed system, the same as under the present system.

3564. Then you would be pulled up at the end of the year, because you exceeded the aggregate?—I propose that we should be pulled up at the end of the day. I propose to render a daily account, showing the manner in which the sums drawn upon the aggregate account have been applied.

3565. How could you be pulled up when the Exchequer would not know how you meant to apply the money you asked for?—In this way: the moment the account was overdrawn they would know it, which they do not now.

3566. Mr. Cardwell.] According to your plan, you would not be hauled up at the end of the year, but you would be hauled up the following morning?—Yes, when you gave an account showing that you had overpaid your vote; but the Paymaster will not overpay without an authority.

3567. Chairman.] How would it be known that the Paymaster had not paid from army votes any services for the Duke of Wellington's funeral, or any other service?—An account of the actual application of the monies drawn would show that.

3568. As I understand you, at the end of the day you are to send in an account how the money has been disposed of; what would prevent you putting any charge upon any one vote, supposing you had received such directions, or were so disposed?—By falsifying the accounts anything can be done.

3569. If you received an order to pay certain sums of money from the Treasury, or from any other department, you would pay them, of course?—Yes. If the Paymaster were kept in ignorance, if it was charged against the wrong vote by the department, the Paymaster would have no check upon it.

3570. You could not stop it?—No; but those orders come from different departments, and of course no department could go beyond its own credit.

3571. Mr. Bowyer.] You state that under the system which you propose you would be pulled up the next morning, because the Exchequer would see that money had been applied in excess of an exhausted vote?—Precisely.

3572. Then when that happened what remedy would the Exchequer have?—That would depend upon what powers were given to the Exchequer.

3573. The Exchequer would be obliged still, though you had misapplied the money in excess of the exhausted vote, to continue issuing money to you?—For the general service; but I can see a very simple remedy, namely, to authorise the Exchequer to charge every such issue against the civil contingencies, against the vote which is liable for such over-issues.

3574. Chairman.] Might not this plan be adopted as to your system: when it appeared to the Exchequer by your return in the morning, that you had applied money in excess of an exhausted vote, that then the Exchequer should be authorised to refuse any further issues till it was rectified?—That would never do, because you would force the Paymaster to stop payment, and that would damage public credit.

3575. Might not that rectification be made immediately without doing that, or in the course of half an hour?—If the money had been issued, we could not remedy it, except by charging it upon civil contingencies.

3576. Mr. Wilson.] You have stated, in going through the book, that frequently accounts have been overdrawn, and you have been asked whether they have been overdrawn four and five months in the year. By the word "overdrawn," you merely mean that more money has been issued by the Paymaster, not that the vote has been overdrawn?—No; in no case was the vote overdrawn; there was always money in the Exchequer belonging to the vote.

3577. The rule is invariable not to exceed the Act of Parliament?—Yes.

3578. Chairman.] They can prevent you taking money out of the Exchequer beyond the vote of Parliament?—Yes; when monies are paid in to the cash account, we of course exhaust those sums first.

3579. Mr. Wilson.] You are bound to do so?—Yes; if the Paymaster were allowed to have an unlimited balance, there would be no necessity for overdrawing.

3580. Mr. Bowyer.] What would be your object in reporting every day the appropriation of the money, if the Exchequer had no remedy whatever in case you misapplied it, or applied it in excess of an exhausted vote?—The object would be to simplify the mode of conducting the whole business of keeping the accounts.

3581. What security would there be as to the application of this money?—Nothing beyond preventing issues beyond the aggregate of the grants, which is just the security we have now, unless some other regulations were established.

3582. The report which you propose to the Exchequer, of the application of the money from day to day, would be of no use at all?—Yes it would, as it would show the actual sums applied to each vote, which the present accounts of the credits do not.

3583. It would produce no result, because the Exchequer would have no remedy?—That would depend upon what remedy Parliament chose to establish; if excesses were charged upon civil contingencies there would be a remedy at once.

3584. Sir Henry Willoughby.] Your plan would require some new legislative enactment, would it not?—Yes; we cannot alter the system under the present Exchequer Act.

3585. Mr. James M'Gregor.] Your evidence goes to this, that instead of having the Comptroller-general of the Exchequer, you would have a comptrolling auditor-general carrying on a daily audit?—I consider, with regard to the whole of the civil service votes, that we should adopt the same rule which is already in force as to the great naval and military expenditure, to lay the vouchers and accounts from day to day before the auditors, and if necessary, to extend their powers.

3586. That system of audit would go on side by side with your payments?—Yes.

3587. In fact, the payments would be carried to the account at once opened by the vote of Parliament?—Every payment would be charged at once against the vote.

3588. Without the intermediate account which you have exhibited to-day?—Yes. I merely suggested that as an arrangement which might be adopted without disturbing any existing departments; that arrangement would still compel us to keep duplicate and triplicate accounts.

3589. Mr. Wilson.] What you have recommended as to the civil, is precisely the same as is now done with regard to the army services?—It is the same system that has been in operation as to those great services for upwards of 24 years.

3590. Though the army services are voted in 20 or 30 votes, there is no attempt in issuing that money from the Exchequer to adhere to those special votes, but it is issued upon the whole aggregate vote from time to time?—Yes; that is the rule that has been adopted ever since the passing of the Exchequer Act; they have never attempted to issue upon the special votes of the army, navy, and ordnance.

3591. The appropriation has taken place with a concurrent audit within the departments, instead of attempting an appropriation in the issuing of the monies?—Yes.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

7 July 1856.

3592. If the whole of the civil service votes were issued on account, as you have suggested, so much per day, and the appropriation of the monies took place within the Paymaster's department in the same manner as it now does in the army, there would then be uniformity of system between the civil services and the present army and navy services?—Yes, and the same control would be applied to those votes which Parliament has established over the naval and military votes.

3593. You would have a specific appropriation of each vote governed by the actual payment of the money, instead of being governed by an estimate made the day before of the probable requirements for each vote?—We should have an appropriation founded upon actual payments, instead of estimated issues.

3594. This system which you have recommended as to the civil services has now been in operation with the great naval and military departments for more than 20 years, and the plan has worked well, and Parliament has had as much control and check over the one as over the other?—I think that Parliament has had a far more perfect control over the naval and military expenditure than over the civil expenditure, because the accounts being closed at the end of every year, and all surplus balances surrendered, Parliament has had a control over those votes which it has not had over the civil votes, which are carried on from year to year, whether they are in surplusage or not.

3595. But which superior control Parliament would have over the civil services if the same principle were applied to them which has been applied during these 20 years to the other services?—Yes; we should have one uniform system, which, I think, would work better than the present conflicting regulations.

3596. Chairman.] Will you have the goodness to state to the Committee the practice with regard to the great services; you stated that there was some disturbing cause as to 1852–53; was that so?—There must have been, because the Exchequer credits for the Consolidated Fund services are always issued much earlier than that; it seldom goes beyond the time fixed for the re-issue of daily credits; there is always an interval after the close of the quarter, when no issues are made.

3597. That is unusual, is it?—It evidently is unusual; I do not know any case in which it was pushed on so far as in that month. There was one case which occurred in October 1853, which arose when they were re-issuing Exchequer bills, which had been paid off in money; these can only be issued for supply services; you cannot pay the amount into the Consolidated Fund; we had 3,000,000 l. of bills to exhaust in that way; it was not considered right to issue money from the Exchequer, bearing interest, upon deficiency bills, when you had those bills which you were bound to exhaust. Therefore, in those cases it is done simply to save interest; but the credit, although delayed, is demandable at any moment.

3598. What is the rule with regard to miscellaneous services; you were understood formerly to say that if you issued beyond your credit in the course of one day, it was set right by alteration the next; that does not apply now?—That would depend a good deal upon the money wanted; it is impossible to do it daily if you have a large balance, such as we have had of late years, of deposit money and other sums placed in the hands of the Paymaster for security; if you have those monies, you must use them, and you cannot draw a credit each day to square each account without accumulating a large surplus balance.

3599. Those deposited monies interfere very much with you, do they not?—Yes; if you are to use them for the benefit of the public, you can only do it by leaving in the Exchequer monies which otherwise you would draw out; formerly a great part of those deposit moneys stood at the credit of particular individuals; the present arrangement has been made with a view of saving the public money.

3600. Have you the army account in your time?—Yes; the army, navy, and ordnance.

3601. Take the ordnance?—With regard to the ordnance, the balance on the 1st of April was 34,827 l. in credit; the payments on that day were 14,513 l., and the balance carried forward to the next day was 20,518 l. The payments on that day were 6,185 l., and the balance carried forward to the next day was 14,332 l. Then the next day the payments were 14,920 l. 18 s. 4 d.; they overdrew the account 587 l. Then on that day 120,000 l. was drawn, and the payments were only 9,199 l., leaving a balance of 110,916 l.

3602. What was the balance the next day?—On the 7th it was reduced to 93,631 l.;

93,631 l.; on the 8th to 82,180 l.; on the 10th to 74,984 l.; on the 12th to 56,523 l.; on the 13th to 50,593 l.; on the 14th to 46,880 l. 7 s. 2 d.; the balance on the next day was reduced to 30,757 l.; on the 22d it was overdrawn 4,871 l.; on the next day it was overdrawn 8,035 l.; and on the 24th, the next day, it was overdrawn 12,581 l. Then the Exchequer credits on that day are 81,797 l.

3603. Is that three days running?—Yes. Then the balance on the next day was 62,760 l., and the following day it was 60,056 l.

3604. They had overdrawn the account again?—Not on the 30th. The balance on the 30th was 8,285 l., and a great part of that sum was drawn to meet a transfer which was in hand, that had to be made on the last day, amounting to 35,000 l. Those transfers always affect the issues towards the end of the month, If there is a large sum to be received by a service the account is purposely overdrawn, so that a surplus balance may not be accumulated upon any one of the accounts.

3605. Will you see whether it is overdrawn again?—Yes, it is overdrawn four successive days, and on the fifth day it is put right by the issue of 25,000 l.?—It is overdrawn three days, and it begins to be overdrawn on the third, and it is put right on the sixth, two days intervening; it sometimes occurs that it is much longer than that.

3606. Does it frequently occur that you have overdrawn on one day and it is not set right for several days?—That would depend upon the amount of money wanted.

3607. Does it occur frequently, whatever the cause may be?—It will constantly occur when you are running your balances close; it is very difficult to know what those departments are going to draw.

3608. From your reading of the first month's account you seem to have drawn large sums; you were drawing from day to day, but you drew large sums and worked them off?—Not from day to day; probably we drew for the other services on those intermediate days.

3609. Now take the Navy account?—It was overdrawn two days, and was set right by 210,000 l. on the 5th; then it went on, and it was overdrawn a small sum on the 7th. At the commencement of a quarter you must estimate prospectively for several days, because the Exchequer being cleared out for the debt, we have no means of getting money for several days; generally speaking, it used to run as much as a week; it varies; and of course, for a week, we do not get revenue enough in to commence a fresh issue; and if it is overdrawn in that week it cannot be set right till the following week.

3610. How long was it overdrawn?—On the 5th there was a large sum of 210,000 l issued for the navy; but it did not last beyond the 7th; the payments came in so heavily, and that would not be set right till probably about 10 days after that.

3611. When was it set right?—It was not finally placed in credit till the issue on the 28th; there were intermediate sums drawn on account, but the balance was not finally turned till the 28th.

3612. Sir Henry Willoughby.] Was it overdrawn all this time?—Yes; though issues were made on account, from time to time, the payments kept beyond the issues the whole of that time.

3613. From the 16th to the 28th?—Yes.

3614. What was the final amount that you had overdrawn?—It amounted to 112,000 l. on the 27th, and on the 28th the issue of 120,000 l set it right, and at the end of the month the balance was 4,436 l.

3615. Are there not instances in which the account has been overdrawn to a much greater extent than that?—No.

3616. Not in the present year?—No; last year the War departments took their votes as distinct departments, and they expended them as an united department.

3617. All in one lump?—The orders came separately, but owing to the transfer of services between the different departments it has been almost impossible to make any separation of the cash. The votes for the ordnance corps, the artillery and engineers, were transferred to the management of the Horse Guards, and their pay was issued through the War-office.

3618. Would that system apply to thirty millions of money?—No; only to that portion which is voted for ordnance services, and to the proportions of the votes transferred to the departments that took this new distribution of business, and for all purposes for appropriation during the last year those votes must be considered as one in their progress through the Paymaster-general's accounts; at the end of the year, when the final accounts are made up, every payment will be charged against its particular vote, as voted by Parliament.

3619. Chairman.] Mr. Hoffay stated, that last year there was an irregularity?—There was great irregularity, and I spent days in the ordnance and war departments, and here, to try if it was possible to preserve this separation, but I gave it up in despair; it was impossible to keep to a strict separation of the cash.

3620. Sir Henry Willoughby.] What was the difficulty?—The exchange of services and the exchange of votes.

3621. Mr. Henley.] What do you mean by exchange of services?—When the war department was consolidated, that portion of the Ordnance Estimates voted for the pay of the engineers and the artillery was transferred to that branch of the department which was formerly the War-office; and some portion of the Commissariat Vote in the Ordnance Estimates was handed over to the commissariat department. I believe there was also a transfer of all the non-effective services; and the commissariat department transferred a portion of its services over to the ordnance department; all this caused a great mixture of services.

3622. Upon the transfer of those services the application of the monies to the particular objects voted by Parliament was equally attended to, was it not?—Yes, each department, of course, has to expend the monies in accordance with the vote of Parliament.

3623. Does the account show that?—It will not show it till the final account is made up under the directions of the Commissioners of Audit in the War department.

3624. There will be no difficulty in showing the expenditure of the money, though it may have been under different authorities?—Not at last in making up the account; the difficulty arose in making up the cash account, one department drawing upon the fund which Parliament had placed at the disposal of another.

3625. In that state of things, the accounts were not audited from month to month?—They were audited from day to day by the Audit Board.

3626. But as to the appropriation of the money to the particular objects of the vote, would that be shown from day to day?—No, a large portion of the expenditure in all those departments is on imprest advances, and the accounts come in a long time after the issue is made; those departments are each allowed 12 months after the end of the year, for closing the account.

3627. Then what you call an audit from day to day is only an audit of the imprest, not an audit of the actual expenditure upon the particular votes?—It is an audit which takes up the monies from the vote of Parliament, and traces them through every transaction, through the hands of every person to whom they are intrusted, until the final charge is raised against the vote. Each account takes two years, commencing from the date when the vote commenced until the date when the account of the expenditure of that vote is finally closed; each account spreads over, from day to day, two years.

3628. Do I rightly understand you to state, that though this account is audited from day to day, yet you could not from day to day see what money has been applied exactly to the purpose for which Parliament voted it, or, on the other hand, do you so ascertain it?—You cannot ascertain the state of any particular vote for the army, navy, or ordnance, as to the final appropriation, from day to day, only when the account is finally made up at the expiration of the 12 months.

3629. Then, in point of fact, this daily audit is of the monies issued on account in various sums, not showing the actual application of them?—Yes.

3630. Mr. Wilson.] It shows the application so far as it is possible, does it not?—If the payment is final it does; but if it is an imprest given to the paymaster of a regiment you must wait for his account to see it.

3631. Then still the audit officer sees that that issue is made upon proper authority?—Yes; he always sees that the proper charge is raised against the individual who receives the money, and he is not discharged except upon the production of vouchers for the actual payments.

3632. That knowledge is absolutely necessary for him to check that imprest accountant hereafter?—Yes, to enable him to allow to the credit of the accountant the actual sums expended.

3633. Sir

3633. Sir Henry Willoughby.] If anything went wrong, when would it be detected?—As to any sub-accountant, it would be detected at the time of rendering his account; but there are regulations in the departments as to the examination of the Paymaster's balances; and there are returns; he does not get all his money for the quarter at once; he will get probably, if supplied by a regimental agent, an account every week or every fortnight, for the expenditure of the ensuing fortnight.

3634. When would any irregularity be made known to Parliament?—No excess upon the vote would be made known until the account was finally closed.

3635. At the end of two years?—At the end of 12 months after the expiration of the year.

3636. Mr. Wilson.] It would be upon the public service the appropriation of those individual votes; there is a clause in the Appropriation Act which empowers the Treasury to authorize the departments to spend the surplus of one vote for the deficiency of another; it would be only as to the aggregate votes that any excess would be shown?—It would be the excess upon the aggregate of the votes taken for those servicer.

3637. Mr. Hankey.] With regard to those balances to which you have been referring as sums in excess, I think this book shows the balances on the total number of different accounts every day?—Yes.

3638. This amount (pointing to the book) is agreed with the balance at the Bank of England every day?—Yes, precisely.

3639. Chairman.] How are the army votes taken; does not the army vote include the commissariat, the militia, the navy, and the ordnance votes?—The votes are separate; but in the Appropriation Act the general amount quoted at the commencement of the clause for the army embodies the whole of those votes, but there are separate votes for the different army services, for the commissariat services, and for the militia; but in this particular year 1855-56, there was a large transfer for the embodied militia to the Army Estimates; it was not voted on the Militia Estimates, as it usually is at the end of every session; the vote for the embodied militia was 3,813,000 l.

3640. How much was expended?—I suspect that the expenditure is not completed; but I can give the Committee the amount issued in the year; the actual cash issues in the year were, after taking out all the credits, 2,727,952 l.

3641. Those were issues from the Exchequer, were they not?—They were actual payments by the paymaster; the payment was 2,727,952 l.; but there may be further payments coming in on account of that year which we have no means of knowing the amount of at present.

3642. Sir Henry Willoughby.] Where is the balance?—It will have to be accounted for to Parliament upon the balance-sheet prepared next year for the army, but not till 1857.

3643. Mr. Williams.] And the vote was for 1855, was it not?—Yes; for 1855-56.

3644. Sir Henry Willoughby.] Are the Committee to understand that that is the whole sum that has been drawn out of the Exchequer?—Yes; up to the 31st March. There may be further sums payable on account of that year.

3645. Mr. Henley.] What was the whole of the army vote for the year 1855-56?—£. 18,789,532.

3646. How much of that has been issued from the Exchequer to the Paymaster?—The sum drawn out from the Exchequer in the year was 17,395,059 l.; there was a balance on the preceding year, of course, which has been drawn out. That 17,000,000 l. includes the balance of the previous year and the sums drawn out of the grants of the current year.

3647. That is not altogether on the vote of the year, but upon the votes of the previous year as well?—Yes. The sum remaining in the Exchequer at the commencement of the year was 875,486 l. for the army services proper, and 119,573 l. for the commissariat.

3648. What was left at the close of the year?—The amount left upon the two accounts was 2,389,532 l. How much of that will turn out to be surplus upon the militia vote, when the account is finally closed, it is impossible to say yet; but no doubt a large portion of it will revert to the Exchequer.

3649. Mr. Williams.] But the whole of the militia vote is for pay, is it not?—Principally for pay; there are other heavy charges connected with it; it is for pay, agency, clothing, bounty, and other services.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

7 July 1856.

3650. How often are the militia paid?—I believe they are settled with like the army, daily or weekly.

3651. There cannot be any balance of any amount left unliquidated?—I judge from this account that there are balances outstanding, for I see in this year a tolerably large sum paid on account of the preceding year.

3652. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] You wish to make a statement, do you not, with reference to the balances?—I stated, in answer to Question 1209, that I believed that the aggregate balances under the new system of the consolidation of the departments were lower than the separate balances under the former system. I said that I thought that any one of those large offices kept a much larger balance than the aggregate balance which is at present kept by the Paymaster for the whole of the public service. On his last examination, Lord Monteagle gave in a statement of the balances of Exchequer credits at the Bank of England to the account of the Paymaster-general, the Treasurer of the Navy, and the Treasurer of the Ordnance on particular quarter days. I do not dispute the correctness of this account, which I have no doubt is prepared with the characteristic accuracy of his department; nor do I complain of the inference which he draws from it. When I said that the separate balances of those offices were larger than the aggregate balances at the present time, I meant to say, under similar circumstances; I did not mean, taking the year 1835–6, when the aggregate expenditure for the naval and military services was only 12,000,000 l., that now we could keep the balances as low when the expenditure has risen to 50,000,000 l. What I meant was, take two periods at all alike in the amount of their expenditure, and my statement is borne out; I have, therefore, prepared a statement of balances, which I will take the liberty of giving in. I take the most favourable period for the old system, the quarter immediately preceding that in which the Treasury Minute for the consolidation was issued; and it is most favourable for a comparison with the old system, because the annual expenditure at that time for those services was not more 12,000,000 l.; moreover, the three offices were under the management of one person, Sir Henry Parnell, who was a great advocate for low balances. It is taken also at a time when the balances were probably lower than the average. The period that I take to compare with that, is the second quarter of the year 1838, when the annual expenditure was about a million more than in 1836; the result of the comparison is that the average balance of the army, taking it day by day for the whole period of three months, striking an average upon the total, was about 101,000 l., and that of the Treasurer of the Navy about 52,000 l. The consolidated balance for all the accounts of the Paymaster-general, the average balance daily was only 36,570 l.; that was the average balance at the close of each day in the second quarter of 1838. There is one balance as high as 253,000 l., on the 5th of April, but take the whole three months, and divide by the number of days, the average balance was only 36,570 l. Therefore the whole service could be carried on with quite as little money as any one of the large services could formerly. This account of the balances I beg leave to hand in. (The same was delivered in.)

Vide Appendix.

3653. Chairman.] You have seen the correspondence in which the Exchequer complained of the large balances that were kept by each of the departments before the consolidation?—I have; but the period I have selected is after the complaint had been attended to and remedied; that complaint refers to the navy two years before the consolidation. I was in the Navy-office at the time, and it was my duty to overlook those balances, and I kept them as low as I could. I believe that the balances I have taken are the minimum balances that ever existed in the navy; and the aggregate balances with the Paymaster during the corresponding quarter was not two-thirds of the amount.

3654. Do you think that the average balance of 52,000 l. was as low as they could go on with?—That was the lowest average balance.

3655. When you had got the navy and two other departments, you could go on safely with a surplus balance of 36,000 l.?—Yes; the average surplus balance was about 36,000 l.

3656. For the service of the navy?—For the whole service.

3657. Do you mean to say that 52,000 l. was not more than was really necessary in the navy?—It is different dealing with one accountant and with several; the navy probably had no larger surplus upon any one of those accounts than we had, but they had several cashiers, and each had a balance; but by working upon upon a consolidated balance now, it is not necessary to have a larger balance than each of the separate offices formerly held. W. G. Anderson, Esq.

3658. Mr. Wilson.] That was by the introduction of transfers instead of payments?—Yes, that regulation has materially promoted the reduction of the balances. 7 July 1856.

3659. In all those cases in which you have been asked about postponing the adjustment of these accounts for a few days, did not that arise from the fact that you had money in hand which you were obliged to use in the first instance, which, if you had not used, but had adjusted those accounts earlier, must have led to large unprofitable amounts in your hands?—We could only have adjusted those accounts by drawing money which we did not want.

3660. Chairman.] When you talk of balances, do you include in the balance your cash balance?—The Exchequer credit and the cash balances, the drawing and the bill accounts, the whole of the surplus of the working accounts. I do not include the appropriated balances, which we could not touch, such as naval prize and army prize. Before the Committee breaks up, I request permission to add that Sir Charles Trevelyan has requested me to state that, as Mr. Brooksbank's authority has been so frequently referred to, he begged I would lay before the Committee a letter which was communicated to him not long after the Pay-office Minute was drawn; it is a letter from Mr. Brooksbank, addressed to Mr. Lichfield, the senior clerk acting for him in that department, and as it explains Mr. Brooksbank's opinion upon many of the matters which have been under discussion before this Committee, Sir Charles Trevelyan thought it might be useful that it should be handed in. (The same was delivered in.) Vide Appendix.

Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.	Sir James Graham.
Mr. Peacocke.	Mr. Hankey.
Mr. Henley.	Mr. Bowyer.
Mr. Williams.

THE RIGHT HON. SIR FRANCIS T. BARING, BART., IN THE CHAIR.

Charles Vine, Esq., called in; and further Examined.

3661. Chairman.] YOU were asked on your last examination with regard to certain fireworks made at the Ordnance. Suppose the audit officer were to make any observation upon that, and to make any objection, which went to the Audit Board, and the Audit were to report, when would that come before Parliament?—It would come before The House when the Report on the Ordnance Account was presented; but I do not think that there is any reason why, if the Treasury saw fit, they should not lay it before The House at an earlier period if The House were then sitting. Charles Vine, Esq. 10 July 1856.

3662. In the ordinary course of business, if the Audit-office took an objection, and thought it right to bring a matter before Parliament in their Report, when would that which has happened since April last come to the knowledge of Parliament?—The account for the year ending the 31st of March is laid before The House on or before the 1st of June in the subsequent year; one year is allowed to the department to collect from all over the world the different accounts, to examine them, pass them, and record them in their books; one month to make the account up; and in the succeeding month the Audit Board report upon that account to the Treasury.

3663. Then the account would not come before the Audit Board till April 1858?—Just so.

3664. Does not the Act say that the Audit Board must lay it upon the table at the latest in June 1858?—The Army, Ordnance, and the Commissariat.

Charles Vine, Esq.

10 July 1856.

3665. I am speaking of a particular transaction that took place at the Ordnance. As I understand it, it would not come before Parliament in the ordinary course of business from this time till June 1858?—It would be so.

3666. The Navy is somewhat more rapid, is it not?—The Navy account is laid before The House in January. The last Navy account was ordered by the House of Commons to be printed on the 31st of January 1856.

3667. That would come before Parliament at the beginning of the Session of 1858?—Yes.

3668. With regard to another transaction, we understand that the Navy Department performed some services for the Turkish Government, and that the Turkish Government advanced money for the purpose of repaying the service when performed; how would that be checked, or how would it be known to the audit clerk who checks the Navy account?—The receipt of the money from the Turkish Government would be shown in the accounts of the Paymaster-general, and be recorded in the account opened in the ledger of the Admiralty with the Turkish Government; and all the payments which were made on account of the Turkish Government, in respect of that sum so paid in advance, would be traced to that account in the ledger; and when the detailed account for Naval Services is made up, the balance on that account would be shown in the balance sheet which accompanies the detailed account.

3669. Are the Committee to understand that in the Report of the Auditors to Parliament, that transaction would be noticed?—The Report of the Auditors is upon the Parliamentary account, the one directed to be rendered under the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 92; there is no balance sheet attached to that account; that is merely an account of the Votes of Parliament, and the expenditure of the department against those votes.

3670. I do not imply that the auditors would not perform the duties imposed upon them by Parliament. I am asking whether such a transaction such as has happened would be brought before Parliament by the account, and the Report of the Auditors?—I doubt very much whether the Audit Board would think it requisite to notice it; it would be shown in the balance sheet.

3671. Would the officer under your superintendence at the Admiralty think it necessary to report the transaction to the Audit Board?—I think not.

3672. In point of fact, the transaction has taken place. Has the officer brought it before the auditors with a view to bringing it before Parliament?—No, he has not.

3673. Then such a transaction would not appear in the account?—Yes; it would appear in the detailed account, in the balance sheet.

3674. Will you show that, if you have it here?—I have not got it here; that detailed account is not yet made up. I can show the Committee similar things.

3675. Have you any detailed accounts here?—I have not a similar case where the money has been paid in the first instance to a department, but where an advance has been made by a department on account of another Government.

3676. Where provisions and stores have been supplied to French ships of war, the amount has been repaid to the Navy for those provisions and stores?—Exactly so; and the balance sheet shows the amount at the time due by the French Government in respect of stores furnished by the Navy. That is the account for 1852-53, the last account printed. (The same being handed in).

3677. This, which I hold in my hand, is printed August 1855, and it is an account up to March 1854?—Yes; the accounts for 1854-55 will shortly be reported by the Audit Board to the Treasury.

3678. This was a case not entirely similar, it being a payment for stores supplied, and the payment made upon the supplying of the stores; there was no advance of money there?—There was not; I know of no other instances where there has been an advance of money.

3679. Mr. Wilson.] You have been asked whether the officers of the Audit Board in the Navy or Army Department take any cognizance of the expenditure of the money; do you conceive that that expenditure takes place upon the responsibility of the head of the department, or that the Audit Board had any right to interfere with it?—I consider that the Audit Board have no right to interfere so long as the services are provided for in the estimate; if any monies were paid by the Ordnance, for instance, for a work which was not contemplated in the estimate, the Treasury authority would be required, and it would be shown in an appendix to the detailed account, which is added by the Commissioners of Audit Audit, showing that there had been no grant for the service, and that payment had been made, and that it was sanctioned by the Treasury.

3680. So long as the expenditure of the public money is kept within the purposes for which Parliament granted it, you conceive that the whole duty of the Audit Board is to see to that; but they take no responsibility as to the expenditure themselves?—I conceive that to be their duty.

3681. You conceive that the department to whom Parliament has granted the money is solely responsible to Parliament for that money?—Yes.

3682. Do you conceive that if the department were relieved in any degree of that duty, and any authority were given the Audit Board for that purpose, of interfering with or directing the expenditure, it would weaken and destroy the responsibility of the department to Parliament?—I consider that it would do so.

3683. With regard, therefore, to the use of money for fireworks, or for whatever purpose, that is a subject for which the head of the department is responsible to Parliament; and if sums were used for the payment of wages, whether it be for fireworks or for whatever other purpose, so long as that labour is directed in that particular way by the head of the department, the responsibility lies between the head of the department and Parliament, and it would not be any part of the duties of the Audit-office to interfere?—No; it would be no part of the duty of the Audit-office to interfere with regard to the fireworks. There are other purchases not of a similar character to those usually charged against the laboratory stores; for instance, erecting sheds, builders' work, ironmongers' work, which, when they come under the notice of the Audit, would not be allowed to be charged against the Ordnance Votes, because the Ordnance Votes were clearly never intended to provide for such sums. Payments of this character have been made, and they have been charged by the Ordnance to an account opened in their books against the Lords of the Treasury for fireworks. The different stores consumed, powder, and the labour employed, cannot, of course, come under the control of the auditors.

3684. That would be an expense which the Treasury would be bound to repay to the department out of the Civil Contingencies, as was stated in the House of Commons, no vote having been taken for that purpose?—Yes.

3685. Then, suppose a portion of powder to be used for those fireworks, that again would be used upon the responsibility of the head of the department, and the money expended for the powder under the head of stores would be passed by the Audit Board without any power on their part to interfere?—Yes.

3686. The whole duty which the Audit Board can perform with advantage to the public service is to see that the expenditure that takes place, takes place under the head of the different services which Parliament has approved of?—Yes; just so.

3687. The use of those stores, or whatever it might be, is the use to which they are applied by the department itself, and it is done on their responsibility alone?—It must be so; it never comes under the notice of the audit.

3688. You have stated as to the fireworks, that certain sheds and other works had been erected which clearly did not come under the head of stores; you would object to that expenditure being made under any Ordnance vote?—Certainly.

3689. And, objecting to that, you would object to the Ordnance department charging it to their votes?—Certainly.

3690. As such, you would require that they should either provide for it by a separate vote, or obtain competent authority for the defraying of that expense?—Yes.

3691. It has been stated that if any irregularity took place in this expenditure of the department it would not appear in any account laid before Parliament until the period at which the detailed accounts are made up. Will it not be the duty of the Audit Board at once to apprise the Treasury of any irregularity in the applications of money in any department as soon as it took place?—They invariably do so.

3692. You regard the Treasury as the legitimate check upon the application of the monies to their proper purposes in the other departments?—Yes.

3693. According to your experience, have you found that when a representation has been made to the Treasury in respect to the misappropriation of monies, the Treasury has usually almost invariably supported the Audit Board in the view they took of their Parliamentary responsibility and duty?—I think they have always done so.

3694. Therefore you find that the present system provides, not a Parliamentary check at the end of 18 months, but a Treasury check and a Parliamentary authority almost concurrent with the Treasury which takes place?—It does so.

Charles Vine, Esq.

10 July 1856.

3695. The Audit Board furnish to the Treasury a monthly account and a concurrent audit, which takes place in each department?—No; if there was any irregularity we should point it out, and report to the Treasury.

3696. In any case of any irregularity, you report within a month?—Yes, within a short period.

3697. If an irregularity were at once put right by a department, there would be no necessity to report to the Treasury if the thing were put right?—None whatever.

3698. As to the payment for the Turkish Government, is it not a matter of every-day occurrence that the Naval department, and in some instances the Army department, make advances on behalf of foreign governments abroad, for various services?—Yes.

3699. And those advances are made on the credit of the foreign government?—Yes.

3700. And they are finally adjusted by payment from foreign governments, are they not?—They are.

3701. Will you just state the nature of those services which are of constant occurrence with foreign governments, for which we make advances?—Suppose a French ship of war to meet an English ship of war, and to require provisions, the English ship of war would furnish them. In another case there was, I think in New South Wales, a French ship of war requiring money, the money was advanced, and has been claimed from the French Government.

3702. Is it not constantly the habit of foreign ships to put into English ports, requiring refitting or repairs and coals?—Yes, and for a variety of other purposes.

3703. There is never any hesitation in supplying those stores on the credit of a foreign government?—None that I am aware of.

3704. Those matters are always adjusted afterwards, are they not?—Yes.

3705. Credit being given in the mean time by the English Government to the foreign government?—Yes.

3706. The only distinction between that transaction with the Turkish Government and those commonly occurring transactions, is that in that case, the Turkish Government paid money in advance, and did not require any credit from the English Government?—That is the only difference between them.

3707. And therefore when the Turkish Government had paid a certain sum of money into the hands of the English Government, to be applied in this particular way, no public monies were used for that purpose?—None.

3708. Therefore no public monies being used it did not necessarily become the duty of the officers of the Audit Board to take immediate cognizance of those payments?—I think not.

3709. But all those transactions must necessarily pass through the detailed accounts, must they not, because they pass through the Paymaster's account, and enter into the transactions between the Navy and the Paymaster?—Every one of those transactions comes before the officer of the audit; every voucher comes before him for the payments on account of those services; he would not allow any payment on account of the supplies for the Turkish Government to be charged by the Navy against naval votes, but he would trace that payment through all the books to the account of the Turkish Government in the ledger of the Admiralty; he would not admit any misappropriation of that money.

3710. Then this transaction would come before Parliament in the detailed annual accounts in the same way as transactions of a similar nature, when the English Government give credit to a foreign government, as you have described?—In precisely the same way, only that the balance would be on the other side; it would be due, perhaps, by the Navy, instead of due by a foreign government.

3711. Therefore you say that the Audit-office would prevent this money being applied to any other purpose than that for which it had been placed to the naval account, and that the Pay-office could not apply to Turkish services any amount which had been placed to their credit with the paymaster?—We should see that every payment made on account of the Turkish Government was charged to that head in the ledger of the Admiralty.

3712. Mr. Williams.] What is the system adopted by the Audit-office in auditing the army accounts?—The system, as I explained in my first day's evidence, is this: we see every document upon which the books are posted; we see that that document bears upon the face of it evidence of examination and allowance by the proper officer before it can pass into the books as a final charge against the votes.

3713. Does the examination take place by an officer of your department in the department for war?—Yes, it does.

3714. What report is made by those officers to the Audit office?—A report is made monthly of the state of business in the department, and if they have any observation to make upon the account, it is invariably sent in writing.

3715. Does any further examination of those accounts take place in the Audit-office itself?—None.

3716. Do you see any great advantage in sending officers from the Audit-office to audit accounts in the War department when the clerks in the War department themselves might tick off those matters and look to the vouchers?—The two audits are distinct, the audit in the War department is a detailed one, but the audit conducted by the audit officers at the War department is an audit of appropriation, in conformity with the Act of 9 and 10 Victoria, c. 92.

3717. Would it not be possible to have the books of the War department and the vouchers sent to the Audit-office, and there to be examined?—I think not, without very great delay.

3718. What would be the cause of the delay?—The books are in daily use; the audit is a daily audit; the books could not be sent to the Audit-office until the termination of the year.

3719. They examine, I suppose, the entries in the book with the vouchers laid before them?—They do.

3720. And they tick off the book, do they not?—It is not merely ticking off the book, it is to see that the document upon which the entry is made is a proper document upon which a charge against the votes ought to be made.

3721. Have they any means of checking the book besides merely ticking off?—Certainly; the voucher itself, that is the document from which the entry in the book is made, is placed before the Audit-office officer.

3722. Suppose an entry is made in the books of the War-office, and ticked off by any officer, would the officers of the Audit department be able to discover it?—Yes.

3723. How?—They would know perfectly well they had not checked the vouchers; there is a daily audit, and they know perfectly well what vouchers they check.

3724. Is there any evidence on the face of the examination in the books that they have seen a voucher for each item?—The voucher is marked as examined by them.

3725. I am speaking of the book?—The vouchers are compared by them with the book.

3726. May not an entry be made in a book by an officer of the War department, and ticked off as having been passed by the auditor without the audit officers having the means of discovering it?—I consider that impossible; every voucher passes the audit officer, and he checks them through the books; the first records are checked through every book until they are finally recorded in the account which is laid before Parliament; there is not a single item in the books which is not checked by the audit officer.

3727. Is there clear evidence on the face of the entries in the books that the auditors have passed those entries having vouchers to correspond with them. For instance, suppose opposite to the item the audit officer were to put his initials?—He affixes his initials to the vouchers themselves, and compares them with the books, and he marks the book so that he knows perfectly well what he has checked.

3728. Does he put his initials opposite the entry, or tick it off?—The entries are so numerous that he would not have time to put his initials to each.

3729. Mr. Henley.] With regard to the audit officers, if there was any item on which a doubt arose, what would they do then?—It would be reported in writing by the officer in the department, and would be brought before the Commissioners of Audit, who would then decide whether the case should be reported to the Treasury or not.

3730. Is that report made from an officer in the War or Naval department to the Board of Audit, and is it a matter of record?—It is.

3731. Does it appear in the query books at the Audit-office?—Those observations are all numbered by the examiner, and all those observations are laid before the Commissioners of Audit.

3732. And the production probably of a portion of them would put this Committee in possession of the nature of the doubts and objections which arise from time to time?—They would do so; they are chiefly charges against one vote, when the Audit-office consider they ought to be properly charged under another head.

Charles Vine, Esq.

10 July 1856.

3733. That is the ordinary nature of the objection?—Principally. The objections as to principle are few in number.

3734. Following up the questions which have been addressed to you by an honourable Member as to the daily audit, is there at the end of the month, quarter, or year, any certificate in the books showing by what officer those various accounts had been audited; any written document, or in what way does it appear upon record that they have been so audited?—A report is made monthly.

3735. But upon the documents themselves, examined and audited, is there any signature or other record, assuming that the officer was to die, by which anybody else would know that they had passed under the examination of A. or B.?—The voucher bears his initials.

3736. I am not speaking of the voucher, that is, merely a voucher that had been entered; but in the books themselves, which are the accounts, is there any entry in them to show who has audited them, and to show to what period they have been audited; suppose a man to die at the conclusion of a week or any other period?—The period up to which the books are examined is invariably shown in a monthly return made of the state of the business in the department.

3737. There is no entry in the books themselves showing up to what time they have been audited?—No further than the tick which is put to the entry in the book.

3738. That is a tick that an officer would know, but it would be no evidence to satisfy anybody else?—I should certainly know, from his monthly return, up to what date the books had been examined; that return contains a list of every book and the date to which that book is posted by the department, and the date to which it is examined by the officer of the Audit Board.

3739. That is a recital, in fact, of what has been done?—It is.

3740. Then there is no evidence upon the account itself that it has been so done?—Not in the books.

3741. Neither at the end of the year, or quarterly, or at any other period?—There may be his initials to certain documents to show that he has checked them.

3742. You have stated, that from day to day the books are audited and examined?—Certain books; the journal and the ledger are made up monthly, and they can only be examined monthly.

3743. What I want to know is, now that we know that those books are examined only monthly, whether there is any entry or record upon those books to prove as a matter of fact that the officer A. or B. who has examined them, has examined them up to a certain period; is there a responsible signature or entry to prove that?—The ledger would show it, because the folios of the journal are inserted in the ledger by the audit officer.

3744. Are there his initials, or any signature?—There is not.

3745. Nothing of that kind is done?—No.

3746-7. If the audit officer was out of the way, it would be next to impossible for anybody to prove that those figures were inserted by him?—If you were perfectly acquainted with a person's handwriting, you could tell it.

3748. Mr. Wilson.] If any doubt arose, reference to the vouchers would prove the whole thing at once, would it not?—It would; the vouchers upon which the books are founded; we do not make any memorandums in the books of the departments; I think the departments would complain of us very much if we made memoranda in their books.

3749. At no period, neither monthly, quarterly, or annually, is there any entry in the chief books of the various departments to show that they have been audited by A. or B. signing those books to show what officer is responsible for the audit?—There is not; the same officer has always remained at the department.

3750. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Has any question ever arisen as to the period up to which the audit has been carried?—Certainly not; the vouchers show that they are traced into the books, and from the first entry the check is followed up until it forms a final record in the account.

3751. The documents which show the proceedings of the Audit Board are the vouchers?—Yes.

3752. Those remain in the possession of the Audit Board?—No; they are with the departments.

3753. But the Audit Board put their signature or mark upon every voucher when it has been examined, do they not?—Yes.

3754. Mr. Wilson.] Every month the officers auditing the books send a return to to the Audit Board of each book that has been audited, and the date up to which it has been audited ?—Yes, 3755. If the officer died, and if any doubt arose as to any particular entries having been audited by him, reference to the voucher would show whether it was so or not ?—It would

3756. Sir Henry Willoughby.] Suppose an officer failed in his duty, what means have you of discovering his delinquency ?—If a man is a rogue, and chooses to pass vouchers without checking them, I have no check at all.

3757. You entirely therefore rest upon the honesty and good faith of that officer ?—I think it must necessarily be so.

3759. What is his position; is he above a clerk ?—The office consists of inspectors, senior examiners, junior examiners, and assistants.

3760. You say he is a junior examiner ?—Yes.

3761. What number of years has he been in the Audit-office ?—I can hardly answer that question.

3762. Mr. Wilson.] Is it not your duty to go round those offices and superintend those officers whose daily duty it is to check these accounts ?—Yes.

3763. If there were any dereliction of duty, would not you discover it ?—If he initialed vouchers which he had not looked at, no inspection could check that.

3764. Mr. Williams.] Suppose a fraud were attempted to be committed in the War department, and they were to make regular entries in the book and tick them off in the same manner as the audit officer would do, would there be any means of discovering such a fraud through the Audit-office ?—Yes.

3765. How ?—The vouchers in support of it would show that.

3766. How could a clerk, when he looked at an entry, discover that it was the entry with which he left off ?—The voucher would show him that; the vouchers are all examined by him, and if there was no voucher for the entry he would not pass it.

3767. Supposing it were ticked off in the same form, by a clerk of the department, what means would the auditor have of discovering that the entry was made without a proper voucher ?—He would know up to what date he had examined the voucher, and that he had not examined the voucher for that date.

3768. There may be many items under the same date; suppose only one item were added ?—I think he would discover it.

3769. Chairman.] Do you consider that your officers are the auditors there ?—No, they are the officers of audit; the auditors are the Commissioners of Audit.

3770. Is the audit conducted by your officers, or by the officers of the departments ?—By officers under me.

3771. I understood that the detailed audit was performed by an officer of the department, the War-office, the Ordnance, and the Admiralty, and that your officers were there for Parliamentary purposes; is that correct ?—The detailed audit is conducted by them; what is termed the appropriation audit is conducted by the Commissioners of Audit.

3772. You stated, did you not, that if there is any irregularity you report it to the Treasury; do you report direct to the Treasury, or does it go through your own department ?—The report would be made by me to the Board, and the Board would then direct upon my representation a report to be made to the Treasury.

3773. Of what nature are the objections taken, and the report to the Treasury ?—There is one in the last naval account.

3774. From time to time ?—Yes.

3775. Before the end of the year ?—Yes.

3776. What is it ?—Take the case of the army. A sum of money was carried to the credit of a vote which the Audit-office considered ought properly to have gone to the Exchequer, but as the votes had been taken with this deduction, and it was opposed to the Treasury Minute, the Audit-office thought it their duty to report the case to the Treasury.

3777. The deduction ought to have been repaid into the Exchequer ?—It ought not to have been taken as a deduction on the Estimates; but that being so, there was no means of introducing it into the account other than in the way in which the War department had done it; but the Audit-office reported the case to the Treasury.

3778. If it appears, in the course of an examination, that a department is exceeding exceeding a particular vote, is that reported to the Treasury at all?—If the auditors were able to say so.

Charles Vine, Esq.

10 July 1586.

3779. There was a sum which was voted for the disembodied militia; if that sum was not expended for the particular service, would there be any means of your clerk ascertaining that?—That always is ascertained when the account is made up, but it is almost impossible to ascertain that before the whole of the accounts are passed, and recorded in the War-office books.

3780. Suppose we take any one of those particular votes for the army; if that has been exceeded is it not immediately reported to the Treasury?—It is impossible to say whether it has been exceeded or not till the whole of the expenditure has been recorded, and the accounts closed.

3781. Should any particular vote appear to have been exceeded, would you report it?—Yes, when we reported the account.

3782. Not before?—It is impossible to say; the vote may be exceeded in one month, and the next month there may be a credit to that vote, which may bring it within the limits of the vote of Parliament.

3783. That is exactly what I wanted to know; you would not think it necessary, suppose apparently in one month there was an excess, to report it?—Not until we reported the account; the final report.

3784. In point of fact, not until it was all set right?—We should not report it until the account was made up.

3785. That is the final account?—Yes.

3786. You stated, with regard to the work done for the Turkish Government, supposing there were repairs done for the Turkish Government for a vessel, that would be so much for work and so much for stores: how could you distinguish the wages of the men employed in repairing a Turkish ship from any other?—If there was any work performed, or stores delivered to the Turkish Government, the entry in the books of the Admiralty would be from the returns furnished by the Dockyard.

3787. It would be from their books, but in the estimate, rather than from the actual account, would it not?—I do not know how that is made up in the Dockyard; it would come from the Dockyard, but the audit would have no cognizance of that before they had a declaration, as it is termed, which is sent in by the storekeeper or the director of victualling.

3788. With regard to the War-office audit, will you explain to the Committee previously to the last arrangement, what were the War-office accounts that were audited at the Audit-office; there was the Commissariat account, was there not?—Not the Commissariat account, but the payments which were made for the Commissariat services.

3789. I do not quite understand you?—The Commissariat account embraces the whole of the banking transactions abroad; that account amounts to about 11,000,000 l., and that account includes the payments which are made for Commissariat services, which amount only to about 1,482,000 l. The Commissariat service includes the pay and allowances of Commissariat officers' provisions, forage, fuel, light, and land and inland water transport of the army.

3790. Are those audited by the auditor?—Yes, the appropriation audit.

3791. With regard to the account of the non-effective services of the army, was not that audited by the auditors?—Yes.

3792. Where is that audited now?—By the army.

3793. That has been transferred?—Yes.

3794. With regard to the effective services, were they not, to a certain extent, audited in the Paymaster's accounts by the Audit Board?—The order given by the department to pay any individual, and the receipt of that person for the money; the banking account.

3795. It was audited, was it not?—Yes.

3796. What change has taken place in that?—That is examined in the War department.

3797. With regard to the Commissariat department, the Commissariat Services account, the non-effective account, and partially the effective account of the Army, have been all transferred?—Not the effective account.

3798. Partially, I said?—Yes, that portion of it which is the banking account.

3799. There was some account audited by the Audit Board, was there not?—A payment made by the Paymaster-general in respect of an order given, either by the War department or the Admiralty. Suppose an order was given by the War department to pay A. or B., or order, so much money, and the Paymaster-general paid paid upon it, that document was transmitted with his account to the Audit-office, and was examined there.

3800. That is now transferred?—Yes.

3801. When we talk of the Commissariat service account being transferred, there was a much larger transfer by the late arrangement than that one account. It is not correct to say that only the Commissariat service account has been transferred; for not only that, but the non-effective service of the army, but a part of the examination of the effective service account has been transferred?—It has.

3802. Have they transferred it with regard to the navy?—They have not.

3803. It remains with regard to the navy?—At present.

3804. It has been transferred with regard to the army?—Yes.

3805. Was there any inconvenience formerly in consequence of the non-effective service accounts being examined by the auditors?—I am not aware of any.

3806. Was there any unnecessary delay?—I can give you no opinion about that, because I was not acquainted with the examination of the non-effective portion.

3807. You have not heard of any complaint?—No.

3808. Was there any practical inconvenience, do you know, from the audit of the Commissariat account by the auditors?—None that I am aware of.

3809. As it appears to me, with regard to the army services previously to this new change, the greater part of those accounts were audited at the Audit-office, and not at the Army department?—No; the whole of the documents upon which those orders to the Paymaster-general were given, were examined by the War department.

3810. What was the vote for the whole of the Army service in 1853-54?—The effective and non effective services is here, 6,503,756 l.

3811. Does that include the Commissariat service?—No; the Commissariat is a separate estimate.

3812. It used to be included under the army?—Yes; but it was a separate estimate taken by the Treasury.

3813. What was the estimate?—About 557,000 l.

3815. That makes 2,600,000 l.; that was always audited fully at the Audit-office?—Yes.

3816. To a certain extent there was an audit of the effective?—No, not of the effective, further than the examination of the order to pay.

3817. There was some observation of the effective at the Audit-office, was there not?—In the navy, for instance, a contractor furnishes his account, and that account is examined in detail by the navy, and when it had gone through all the forms necessary, an order to pay the contractor is given by the navy; that order, when presented to the Paymaster-general, is paid; that order, and the receipt of the person so ordered to receive, goes to the Audit-office. I can hardly call that an examination of the effective.

3818. It is not an audit in detail, but a certain examination which has been transferred to the Army department?—It is an audit of the banker's account of the army.

3819. But, whatever it was, it has been tranferred to the Army department?—Yes.

3820. What was the state of the Ordnance; were those accounts audited?—The same as the army.

3821. Before the change?—Yes.

3822. Were they audited by the Audit-office?—The non-effective; the banking account of the Ordnance was also examined.

3823. Have you read the memorandum of Mr. Romilly, the Chairman of the Board of Audit. Mr. Romilly says, "In all cases, however, in which the rules emanate from or are sanctioned by the Treasury, I see the importance of a body, independent of the War department, ascertaining for the Treasury that their rules have been duly observed, exactly in the same way as it is right that Parliament should know that its directions have been carried into practical effect. But even in these cases, to do this effectually, a minute examination of the accounts accounts will, for the most part, be necessary; and it will, I apprehend, be difficult to separate that part of the expenditure which is incurred under rules established by the Secretary of State alone, from that part which is subject wholly or partially to Treasury rules." Mr. Romilly in that case, I apprehend, foresees the difficulties in the present audit, and of ascertaining whether the regulations of the Treasury are carried into effect. Do you think that the present check of the Audit-office upon the War department is sufficient to carry out that?—No.

3824. Is there any means of ascertaining whether the Treasury rule is by anybody carried out?—Not without a much more detailed and exact audit than at present takes place.

3825. Then there is no check upon the Admiralty or the War-office as to carrying out the Treasury rules except the good faith of the department itself?—No.

3826. Sir James Graham.] Are you an inspector both of the naval and military balances?—Yes, I am.

3827. How long have you discharged the duty of inspector?—Upwards of two years.

3828. You are cognizant of the mode in which the Naval and Military departments keep their books?—I am.

3829. Is the mode strictly uniform?—The system is uniform in all the departments.

3830. Is the form of the account the same?—It is, except in some minor details.

3831. With respect to the details which you call minor, what is the variation?—In the form of the abstract books.

3832. Who has been consulted with respect to that variation in the form?—I am not aware.

3833. You do not know by what authority that variation has been introduced into the Army account?—I do not.

3834. Which do you consider the better form, the naval or the army?—The naval decidedly.

3835. And have those variations in the form of army accounts taken place from time to time since you began the inspection?—No, they have not taken place since I began.

3836. You found that variation existing when you first began the examination?—Yes, I did.

3837. Though, in point of detail, you say there is a variation which you think not advisable, with respect to the change as relates to the army, still in principle are the accounts kept in the same manner?—They are.

3838. Is the practice of keeping the account the same as to double entry?—It is.

3839. Then though you find a change introduced into the army accounts, you cannot say who decided upon the changes which have been made?—No, I cannot.

3840. You adhere to your statement that those changes are not an improvement in the form of keeping the account?—I will not say that with regard to the department, but there is more work in the audit.

3841. Does the strict system of double entry, as established in the navy accounts, assist the business of the audit?—Materially.

3842. And any variation in detail, therefore, in your opinion, impedes the system of audit?—Yes, I think so.

3843. That opinion is confirmed by a comparison of the naval and military accounts as now existing, in which there is this variation in the military that you have specified?—Yes.

3844. That renders the audit more difficult, does it not?—Yes.

3845. Does it render it less perfect?—No.

3846. But more difficult?—Yes.

3847. Had the Audit Board been consulted before the changes were made, and if it had been guided by your advice, the changes would not have taken place?—No, they would not.

3848. Do you say that in the last two years no further changes have taken place?—None.

3849. Is your concurrent audit any security for the preservation of the improvements in a system of account when once established?—I do not consider that the Audit-office can interfere with the arrangements of a department for keeping their accounts, accounts, provided that the system does not interfere with the application of money chargeable against the Votes.

3850. If you saw any imperfection, from your experience of the mode of keeping accounts in the navy or the army, would it be your duty to point out that imperfection to the Audit Board?—No.

3851. Without having so reported, are you, from your experience, cognizant of any material imperfection in the one or the other?—I am cognizant of no imperfection at all in the naval system: I consider the system perfect.

3852. Your experience of the naval accounts, then, leads you not to form an opinion there is a necessity for any change?—I think there is none. I think the system of naval accounts is capable of any expansion; and I think that is clearly shown by the fact that the naval account was rendered to the Audit-office within the time prescribed, notwithstanding the enormous expenditure consequent upon the war.

3853. It has borne the test of great expansion during the war, without any interruption of the clearness of the account?—It has.

3854. Has the posting been regular?—Quite so.

3855. And the ledger kept close up?—Close. The record is so systematic, that it affords the audit the greatest facility.

3856. So far as the rules of the Audit Board go, as to the concurrent audit, you have no difficulty in carrying it into full effect?—None whatever.

3857. In answer to certain questions put to you at the close of your examination by the Chairman, you indicated an opinion that the audit you were allowed to carry on was not so strict or so searching as you thought desirable. What are the changes that you would suggest?—I do not think it desirable to go further, because I think that the advantage of a more searching audit would be more than counterbalanced by the increased labour and expense which would be necessary to carry it out. I think the departments may be safely entrusted with that portion of the audit.

3858. You would not suggest any alteration with reference to the audit, considering how desirable it is that those large executive departments should act with promptitude in the exercise of their discretionary power, subject always to the control of the concurrent audit?—I would not suggest any change.

3859. Then some breach of uniformity, before you commenced your inspection of the system of accounts in the two great departments of the Navy and Army, has taken place through changes in the details?—Yes; but that change has in no way impaired the accuracy of the record.

3860. Has the consolidation of the great army account consequent upon the change of system as to the Board of Ordnance been carried into effect in the books?—The two accounts, that is to say, of the Votes, similar to those of the Army and Ordnance, are separate; the accounts of those votes, which assimilate to the old army votes, are kept at the Horse Guards; those which are similar to the Ordnance are kept in Pall-mall; the two will be recorded together in one account at the close of the year. But I should consider that it would have been far better to have had the whole establishment under one roof, with one set of books.

3861. A complete fusion of accounts has not taken place, so that the army account shall correspond with the navy account?—Not quite; there are two sets of books, one at the Horse Guards and the other at Pall-mall.

3862. Is not that contrary to the principle of book-keeping, and also quite at variance with the simplest and most correct forms of account?—The result will be shown the same, because the whole of the transactions of the Ordnance will be recorded at the end of the year in the army accounts.

3863. But since the fusion of the two departments has taken place, would it not, on every principle of accounting, be most desirable that the fusion of the accounts also on one system of book-keeping should take place?—Yes, decidedly.

3864. And that two sets of books should no longer exist?—No.

3865. And there should be one great ledger for the army, as there is one great ledger for the navy?—Yes.

3866. And the extent of the transactions in the army would be no bar to the fusion, considering the extent of the transactions in the navy?—None whatever.

3867. Therefore, upon every principle of book-keeping and simplicity of accounts, the fusion of the accounts should be as complete as the fusion of the establishments is?—Yes.

Charles Vine, Esq.

10 July 1856.

3868. Is not now the time to make that arrangement?—Yes, I should say so.

3869. If it be postponed, will not the change become more difficult as the transactions in the two different branches multiply?—I am not prepared to say that.

3870. Upon the whole, you would say that now is the time when the thing is desirable?—Yes, I should say so.

3871. Would not the establishment of two sets of books in one department of expenditure be a retrograde movement instead of a progressive one, looking at the example of the navy?—Yes.

3872. There were formerly three or four sets of books in subordinate naval departments, which it was the great object in 1831 to abolish, and to open a common ledger, and one system of account, was not that so?—Yes.

3873. Time and experience have shown that it was not only feasible, but that it was a satisfactory arrangement?—Yes.

3874. Judging from experience, and the success of that arrangement, would you not now recommend the complete operation of the same system as to the army accounts, the Army and Ordnance being united?—I would.

3875. And when that shall have been done, would you say that the accounts of the navy on the one hand, and of the army embracing the ordnance on the other, would be established on a satisfactory footing?—Decidedly so.

3876. And as relates to the audit, the system of double entry gives every facility you think to the system of concurrent audit as now carried on, so far as is consistent with the fair play of discretionary power, subject to the control of the concurrent audit?—I think so.

3877. Mr. Henley.] You have stated in answers to questions just put to you, that in the Army department the accounts at present are kept in two different places; one at the Horse Guards, and the other at the Ordnance?—I did.

3878. They being branches of a great establishment in two different houses, that is no reason why there should not be one set of accounts?—It would be I think extremely inconvenient to have a branch in Pall-mall and a branch at the Horse Guards, and only one place where the accounts were recorded.

3879. Is not part of the naval business carried on at Somerset House, and part of it at the Admiralty?—Only the superintending part of it at the Admiralty; the whole of the cash accounts and the record of the accounts is kept at Somerset House.

3880. Why should not one part of the business be carried on at Pall-mall and the other part at the Horse Guards, and why could not they have one superintendence, and one set of accounts, the same as at the Admiralty?—So they could, if they were placed under one roof.

3881. A portion of the naval business is carried on at Somerset House, and the superintendence is at the Admiralty, and why cannot the same matters be carried on at the Army department, though a part of the business is transacted in two different houses?—The cases are not similar. While a record of the accounts of the navy is kept at Somerset House, in the army a portion of the business is at the Horse Guards, and a portion at Pall-mall, and the superintendence is at the War department in Whitehall.

3882. Why could not the whole of those accounts be kept in one of those places as well as in two?—That is what I would suggest that they should be. I should very much prefer their being under one roof.

3883. Sir James Graham.] Everything relating to expenditure and accounts in the navy is conducted at Somerset House, under one roof?—Yes.

3884. With regard to the expenditure in the army it is conducted under two roofs?—It is.

3885. And so is the accounting?—Yes.

3886. Sir Henry Willoughby.] Assuming that the Army and Ordnance expenditure were massed together, the number of heads of appropriation would be reduced nearly one-half, would it not be so?—I think not; not quite to that extent.

3887. But to a very considerable extent?—Yes.

3888. Does it give you any facilities in your office having the appropriation classified in very minute portions?—It would give no greater facilities; it is of no moment to the audit whether the appropriation is under several or under few heads, the audit could be carried on just as easily.

3889. Are the financial accounts for the year ending the 31st of March 1856 audited?—

audited?—No, they are not; the accounts to be received from foreign stations up to March 1856 cannot have reached this country.

3890. I understood you to say that the vast expenditure of the war had been successfully audited?—I referred to the naval account for the year 1854-55.

3891. I am only referring to the Army and Ordnance account?—The Army account for the year 1854-55 has not been yet transmitted to the Commissioners of Audit; the whole of that account has been examined as far as it is entered in the books of the War department. The Ordnance accounts and the Navy account for the year 1854-55 have both been delivered. The Navy account has been printed and is before The House.

3892. Then a very small portion of the accounts for 1855-56 has been audited?—A large portion. It is a daily audit; almost the whole of the expenditure which has been recorded in those books has been examined and audited.

3893. Parliament voted 6,766,268*l.* for the transport service; has that sum been audited?—Almost all that has been passed to account in the books of the Navy has been examined and audited.

3894. Can you state what balance there is, if any, upon that sum unexpended?—It would be impossible to say, unless we had the whole of the accounts in.

3895. Then that fact is not known?—It cannot be until the accounts come in.

3896. Those accounts may not come in for one year?—No; it depends upon where the expenditure has been incurred; it may have been incurred all over the world.

3897. Therefore, it cannot be said that the account of the expenditure in that year, ending March the 31st, 1856, is known?—No.

3898. That will apply to any other item, will it not?—It will.

3899. Chairman.] What is known is the sum that is issued from the Exchequer as to each vote, and the sums paid by the Paymaster as to each vote within the year?—Yes; and also a portion of the expenditure which is incurred through the accountants of the department, which has been examined and passed to account in the books.

3900. But the finally audited account for the year cannot at present be ascertained?—No.

3901. Mr. Wilson.] And with that view Parliament has given eight months to the Navy, has it not, to render their accounts?—Yes; and 12 months to the Army, Ordnance, and Commissariat.

3902. For the purpose of producing their finally audited and adjusted accounts?—Yes.

3903. Mr. Henley.] Is there any reason why both the Army and the Navy departments should not be limited to the period of eight months?—Yes, I think there is a very good reason for not doing it. The whole of the naval expenditure abroad is incurred at seaports from which there is frequent communication with England; while the troops in the various colonies are frequently at a distance from head quarters, and the accounts have to be collected from various places, and it is some time before they can be sent home. I think that the Navy have much greater facilities for getting their accounts.

3904. Is it not practicable by any alteration of the present mode to bring the Army accounts to audit within the same time as the Navy accounts?—I do not think it is practicable to make up the Army account within the same time, without excluding from it a great deal of expenditure which has been incurred abroad.

3905. Sir James Graham.] And which, to frame an accurate account, it is very desirable to include?—Yes.

3906. Mr. Wilson.] And without which the account would not be accurate at all?—It would not.

3907. Sir Henry Willoughby.] How do you know, for instance, what is for the transport service?—We see all the documents upon which entries in the books are made, and we see them carried to that head in the books of the navy; and we should not allow a payment for the Transport service to be carried to any other head, without bringing it under the notice of the Commissioners of Audit.

3908. Sir James Graham.] A partial severance of the transport branch from the general naval department took place at the commencement of the war?—Yes.

3909. How did you arrange your daily audit of the Transport service when

Charles Vine, Esq.

10 July 1856.

that partial severance took place; did you vary your system of naval audit in any degree, or not?—No; the vouchers in support of the payments for the Transport service were recorded in the books of the Navy in the same manner as the expenditure on account of any other vote.

3910. The principle so established was easily capable of expansion, even when that partial severance took place?—Yes.

3911. And it was satisfactory, in your judgment?—Yes.

3912. Chairman.] Would there be any difficulty in furnishing, at the end of the financial year, an estimate of the outstanding claims with regard to the navy? Suppose an account were to be laid before Parliament of the sums actually paid up to the 31st of March, and an estimate of the sums still remaining outstanding, could it be done without much difficulty?—That is a question that I think the Accountant-general of the Navy should answer.

3913. Mr. Hankey.] Do you not think that after a certain time it would come to the same thing, in showing to Parliament the expense of one year, if you were obliged to return the accounts within eight months for the army; because, though a certain number of sums would still remain unpaid during those four months, that would be taken out of the period which you have now to complete them. It must be a matter of very little importance, as far as Parliament is concerned, whether the payment was made exactly during one part of the year or another; eventually you would equally give the total payment during one year?—I think it would very materially affect a comparison of the expenditure against the estimate.

3914. Sir James Graham.] Is it not the great object of an account that it shall be an accurate representation of the facts?—It is.

3915. And therefore no account can be said to be perfect for a year which does not represent all the transactions of the year?—It cannot.

3916. Therefore a change not bringing everything which took place within the year to account might be just as well done on the 31st of March, giving the latitude of eight and twelve months respectively before the final close?—Yes; you would presume that you left out of one year just as much as you did out of the next.

3917. It would cease to be an account, would it not?—Yes; it would destroy the value of the account.

3918. Mr. Wilson.] And entirely destroy any comparison with the Parliamentary appropriation?—Yes, I think it would entirely destroy any comparison with the estimate.

3919. It would give the average expenditure for each department for a number of concurrent years; but that average expenditure, taken for any one year, would have no relation to the votes for that year?—None.

3920. Sir Henry Willoughby.] Is there no inconvenience, with regard to the accuracy of the expenditure, in reducing the number of the heads of appropriation?—It will not be shown in the abstract account which is rendered to Parliament, but the detailed heads will be shown in the account which is laid before The House somewhat later.

3921. Suppose Parliament declares that such and such sums shall be appropriated to such and such services, is there not a security for the expenditure in defining clearly and minutely those particular objects?—Yes.

3922. Is there not a danger, if you lump large sums together, that the check will be altogether lost?—Yes.

3923. In point of fact, when such a sum as 4,000,000*l.* is voted for clothing, provisions, forage, and a number of items, is there in fact any check at all?—Yes, decidedly; because the estimate for each of those services would be shown in the detailed account, and the expenditure on account of each of those services would also be shown; and it would also show whether less had been expended than had been estimated, or more than had been estimated. That would not be shown in the abstract account.

3924. In point of fact, if there were any disposition to misappropriate money, would not such large sums as 2,500,000*l.* for stores, 4,000,000*l.* and odd for clothing, give a facility for that sort of expenditure?—No expenditure incurred under either of those heads could be passed to another without being brought under the notice of the Commissioners of Audit. If the whole vote were not exceeded, a department might certainly spend more money for provisions and less for forage, but the head "provisions" could not be charged with the forage. It would be clearly shown in the detailed account the amount which had been expended under each head.

3925. Sir James Graham.] Those large aggregate sums are broken, in posting in the ledger, into items?—Yes, they are.

3926. And each item, before being posted, must be vouched?—It must.

3927. And each item so vouched before posting is brought before the Audit?—It is.

3928. Does not that, as to the sum total, the items being so broken, vouched, and inspected, afford a security against malappropriation?—Yes.

3929. Mr. Hankey.] Is the Army account, as now made up, exhibited in such a comprehensive form as to enable any person, by comparing that account with the Appropriation Act, to see how the money that has been voted by Parliament has been expended?—Certainly.

3930. Is that account delivered to Parliament?—Yes, an abstract account, under each of the heads of the Appropriation Act, is laid before Parliament by the Treasury on or before the 31st of June in every year, and afterwards a detailed account, containing all the heads opened in the departmental ledgers, accompanied by a balance sheet, is also laid before The House about the latter end of July, or the beginning of August.

3931. That account shows the closed account as audited by the Audit-office, up to what period; say the account now closed to the 30th of June last; when will that show the account, as compared with the Appropriation account?—Up to the 31st of March 1855. One year is allowed to collect the accounts from foreign stations, and to examine them, and to record them in the books, and one month to make the account up; and during the next month the account is laid before The House. The Army account has not yet been delivered; the Ordnance and Commissariat accounts were sent to the Treasury in May.

3932. Referring to the Appropriation Act of 1854, when will that account so audited be delivered to Parliament, or has it yet been delivered to Parliament?—The Army account has not yet been delivered to the Audit-office.

3933. I am referring to the Appropriation Act of the Session of 1854?—There has been some delay in making it up, in consequence of great difficulty in the departments, from the deaths of paymasters, and other difficulties which have been occasioned by the war.

3934. Are the Committee to understand that the expenditure of the army, as voted by the Appropriation Act of the Session 1854, cannot be exhibited to Parliament until the commencement of the Session of 1857?—No; I have reason to believe that that account is now ready, and will, within a day or so, be sent to the Audit-office. The whole of the books of the army have been examined up to the latest date, and a very few days at the Audit-office will accomplish all that is necessary, and that account will be immediately transmitted to the Treasury to be laid before The House.

3935. Practically, as the Session is now within two or three weeks of its close, I suppose that the account cannot be seen as delivered to Parliament until the meeting of Parliament in 1857, supposing that Parliament does not meet again in 1856?—Perhaps not; but that is an exceptional case.

3936. On former occasions what has been the period at which that account has been generally laid before Parliament?—Invariably before the 1st of June.

3937. Chairman.] After the Army and Ordnance Estimates have been voted?—The Act of 9 & 10 Vict. provides that those accounts shall be rendered to the Audit-office on or before the 30th of April, and that they shall be laid upon the table of The House before the 1st of June.

3938. That is, practically, after the Army and Ordnance Estimates have been voted?—Yes.

3939. Mr. Hankey.] Then I gather that it is your opinion that the accounts of the votes referred to in the Appropriation Act cannot be delivered to Parliament before two years after the Appropriation Act has passed, or thereabouts?—Less than that; the Appropriation Act, I think, usually passes the last thing in the Session.

3940. The Appropriation Act of 1854 was passed at the end of July 1854; under ordinary circumstances that account cannot, according to your opinion, be delivered to Parliament until June, 12 months after the Appropriation Act?—It cannot; the Appropriation Act is passed before the year terminates; it does not terminate till the 31st of March, and the account is delivered 13 months and a half after the termination of the service.

3941. Do not you think that any mode can be contrived by which Parliament in

Charles Vine, Esq.
10 July 1856.

in the ensuing year could have an audited account of the expenditure of the previous year?—They certainly could have an account, but it would be a most imperfect one.

3942. Sir James Graham.] And it would lead to wrong conclusions, would it not?—I think it would.

3943. And particularly as bearing upon appropriation it would prove nothing?—I think so.

3944. The circumstances of 1854, with regard to the Army, were very peculiar, were they not; it was the first year of the war, and the first year of the consolidation of the Ordnance and Army departments?—It was the first year of the war, but not of the consolidation; that consolidation does not take place till 1856-57.

3945. Before the Ordnance was broken up and brought under the war minister?—Yes; but the Estimates were separate, and the accounts will be made up separately until 1856-57, and that will be the first account in which they will be all joined together; up to that date separate accounts will be rendered of Army, Ordnance, and Commissariat.

3946. Then this regulation which you have just mentioned as to the consolidation which is to take place in 1856-57, would make the right adjustment of the accounts in a single book at that time doubly important?—Yes.

3947. Mr. Henley.] You have stated that eight months are allowed by law to the Navy, and 12 months to the Army, to send in their accounts?—Eight months are allowed to the Navy to transmit the accounts to the Audit-office, and 13 months to the Army, Ordnance, and Commissariat; that is, the Navy close their books at the end of seven months, and they take one month to make up the account. The Army, Ordnance, and Commissariat close their accounts at the end of 12 months, and they take one month to make up the account, so that the Navy account is sent to the Audit Board on or before the 30th of November; and the Army, Ordnance, and Commissariat, on or before the 30th of April.

3948. Practically, you are able at the Audit Board, not speaking now of exceptional years, but in ordinary years, to lay the Naval account before Parliament five months earlier than you could lay before Parliament the Army account?—Yes.

3949. You have stated as your opinion, that you do not think the Army could furnish their account within the same period as the Navy could, and you stated generally that you thought the Navy had greater facilities; will you state further, the reasons which induce you to think that the Army accounts could not be submitted, there being now a greatly increased and more rapid communication from all foreign places, within a less period than 12 months?—By far the larger proportion of the Navy expenditure is incurred in this country upon bills, the accounts of contractors, and those are recorded as final payments which take place at once; but nine-tenths of the Army expenditure is through accountants, and through paymasters. Imprests are made to all those paymasters; and all those accounts have got to be collected, examined, and recorded. Final payments by the Army in the first instance are few, comparatively speaking.

3950. Is there any reason why those accounts which you say are much more distributed in the Army than the Navy, might not be transmitted from time to time from the respective parties, and the business pushed forward so as to prevent the accummulation of a mass of accounts at the end of the year, and to be 12 months before they are transmitted?—They are transmitted quarterly, the accounts of the paymasters.

3951. What is the reason that the last quarter's accounts cannot be transmitted to this country in less time than 12 months?—They are transmitted certainly within a period of 12 months; but when received they have to undergo an examination before they can be recorded in the books.

3952. Is there any reason why that period of transmission should not now be shortened; how long has that period of 12 months obtained?—It has not been found practicable to get the accounts audited and posted in a shorter time; on the contrary, I believe it to be the opinion of those who are well acquainted with the War-office, that the time allowed is hardly sufficient to accomplish the object.

3953. Will you state how long that period of 12 months has obtained?—It was by Act of Parliament, the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 92.

3954. Do you know what the period allowed was before that time?—This was the

the first Act that provided for the examination of the Army and Ordnance accounts. Charles Vine, Esq. 10 July 1856.

3955. Have you given such attention to the subject as to know what the time of transmission from the most distant parts of the empire would be, so as to give a confident opinion that the several accounts would not be transmitted in less time than is now required?—I am not prepared to say what time the accounts take coming home from distant colonies; but the troops are at out-stations, and those accounts have to be collected and sent home. But it is not the mere transmission of them home; it is the examination of them after they have been received.

3956. But of course, the sooner they are transmitted the more time there would be for examination here?—I cannot speak with any confidence as to the time in which the War-office accounts are received; but in taking up the Commissariat Chest accounts, very often they have been received from Western Australia and from New Zealand, at the last moment; and great exertion has been necessary to incorporate them into the Commissariat Chest account; and that being the case, I should imagine that there is great difficulty in the War Office.

3957. You have stated that in point of fact, an account has only been received from New Zealand, which is probably one of the most distant possessions, within 12 months; but that does not go to the question of whether that account might not have been transmitted from New Zealand in less time?—I think we have had several letters stating the impossibility of sending the documents earlier; the Audit-office has complained of the accounts being sent home for three months, for instance, at a time; and the explanation has been, that there has been no opportunity of sending them.

3958. Do you mean to say that there is any colony in which there is a Government establishment, with which, in the ordinary course of affairs, there is no communication within three months?—I believe that has been the case.

3959. Do you believe that to be the case now?—That I cannot say; in point of fact, the period given to the Navy of eight months is that which would enable the accounts for the Navy to be in the hands of Parliament in the year but one afterwards?—Yes.

3960. But with regard to the Army that is not now possible?—The Army and Ordnance accounts are made up and presented to The House on or before the 1st June.

3961. Then that is always long after the Estimates for the then current year are brought before Parliament and voted?—Yes.

3962. Is it your opinion or not that there is a tendency in every party, if there is a certain time fixed, not to get the work done within that time?—I can confidently state, from my experience of all the departments, that the greatest possible exertions have been used to prepare these accounts in the Navy, Army, and Ordnance; and I am quite certain that there has been no lack of assiduity on the part of the persons employed to prepare them. In the War department, the amount of attendance which has been given by the men there has been excessive.

3963. I am not speaking of making up the accounts in this country, the time for which appears to be very short, and no doubt great diligence must be used to complete them; but what I wish to call your attention to is this: you say that accounts have now been rendered from New Zealand just within the time allowed by law. Is it your opinion that if that time were shortened two or three months, you would not receive them just within the time allowed by law?—There is a certain time allowed to transmit the accounts to the Audit-office. The account which is made up in compliance with the Act must be submitted to the Audit-office by the War Department within 13 months after the expiration of the service; and to accomplish that they must have received all the accounts from the different out-stations, and they must also have examined them and recorded them in their books.

3964. You stated in the commencement of your evidence that seven months and one month were allowed for the Navy, and twelve months and one month for the Army, making 13 months?—Twelve months to collect the accounts, and examine and record them, and one month for the purpose of making up the account.

3965. What I want to know is this, the 12 months being given for collecting and

Charles Vine, Esq.

10 July 1856.

and recording, may not that have a tendency, for instance, at New Zealand, to make parties there postpone, till the end of 12 months, sending in their accounts?—I have no reason to suppose that the War-office would allow the paymasters to take a longer time than was necessary in transmitting their accounts, especially as the late receipt of those accounts must cause great inconvenience to that department.

3966. What is there in the nature of an Army account, under ordinary circumstances, that it cannot be made up and transmitted within 12 months?—The magnitude of the account, and the number of the sub-accountants' accounts which have to be examined and recorded in the books.

3967. Take New Zealand or any of the Australian colonies, what is there in the nature of the Army account there, after the year is closed and the payments are made, to prevent parties making up the account, and transmitting it within 12 months to this country?—They must transmit it considerably within that period, otherwise the War department could not make up the account.

3968. What is the reason why those Army accounts cannot be made up within 12 months; what are the difficulties which stand in the way of that being done?—The difficulties are, examining and recording the expenditure which has taken place, and the examination of all the paymasters' accounts.

3969. The paymaster's account is the payment of officers and men, is it not?—Yes, and payments under almost every head of the estimate.

3970. Whatever those are, they are not more complicated than the naval accounts; there is less material, is there not?—The Naval accounts are much fewer than the Army accounts. In the year 1853–54 there were 428 accounts against colonels of regiments and paymasters, 222 accounts against colonels and acting paymasters of militia, and 151 accounts opened against staff officers of pensioners. I have not the slightest doubt that those accounts, during the next succeeding year, have been nearly doubled, in consequence of the war.

3971. What is the whole aggregate number of accounts during the year that you have been speaking of?—One thousand one hundred and ninety-seven.

3972. Is an account, consisting in number of 1,197 accounts, such a formidable matter that it is not capable of being made up and set right within 12 months?—I do not think it could be done quicker than it is.

3973. Your opinion decidedly is, that it cannot be done more quickly, though it does not appear that you can assign any reason for it, except the number of the accounts?—Yes; the number of the accounts, and the difficulty of examining them and placing them on record.

3974. Will you be kind enough to explain what is the special difficulty in the account; what is the character of the account that makes the difficulty?—The detailed examination takes a considerable time.

3975. What is the length of those accounts?—I am not competent to give you a history of the detailed examination of them; that does not come under my notice.

3976. If you are not acquainted with the details of it, are you quite competent to speak of the difficulty of passing them?—I can only speak so far as they come under my notice.

3977. Mr. Wilson.] Would not 1,000 accounts branch out probably into 3,000 or 4,000; suppose 1,000 accounts came home to the Army department here, from those who account directly to the Army department, would they not branch out each of them into several sub-accounts before they could be made up?—Yes, they would branch out under every head that was opened.

3978. Take the Cape of Good Hope, for example; there there is a naval station and an army station. With regard to the Navy department, the Paymaster of the Navy would be at the port, and he would have the whole of the expenditure almost under his own control, and at the close of the year he would have little or nothing to do but to send home his accounts. But with regard to the Army, the head paymaster at Cape Town would have the accountants and colonels at all the stations in the interior of the country to communicate with, and those colonels would again have sub-accountants as paymasters to different branches of each regiment; and at the close of the year all those sub-accountants would have to account to their immediate superiors, and those accounts would then have to come to the head accountant at Cape Town?—Yes.

3979. Whereas in the navy the thing would be under the control of one person, the accountant of the army at Cape Town would have to draw in his accounts through innumerable branches from the different military stations in that province, before he could close the final accounts, and before he could send home his own account; which would represent only one of the thousand, there being contributions from various streams, down to a single paymaster of a single regiment?—Yes.

3980. That really constitutes the great difference between the two services?—Yes.

3981. Mr. Henley.] There being that difference between the two services, the detail being somewhat explained and enlarged, you have stated that all those things are made up quarterly?—Yes.

3982. Then can you explain, even with this detail, if they are made up quarterly, what the general average arrear is of each quarter, and state what the practice is?—No, I cannot.

3983. Sir Henry Willoughby.] In the last financial year a sum of money was voted for the militia, 3,813,333 l.; can you state to what extent that account has been audited?—As far as it is recorded in the books of the army.

3984. Is it audited in part, or wholly?—The appropriation audit is complete as far as the accounts have been examined and recorded in the books of the army; I cannot tell you how far the detailed examination has been conducted.

3985. Is that account closed for the year ending 31st of March 1856?—No.

3986. Would the accounts show what balance there is of that amount unexpended?—No, unless the whole accounts of that expenditure have been examined and recorded.

3987. At this moment it is not known what balance of the three millions remains unexpended?—I should say not.

3988. What effect has a vote of credit upon your audit; there was a vote of credit for three millions for the financial year ending the 31st of March 1856?—That vote of credit, I think, was taken in aid of the expenditure for the Army, Navy, and Ordnance services; and the Treasury Minute, I think, directed that those departments should conduct the expenditure of a similar character to that which is usually included in their estimates; and if their expenditure exceeded the estimates, upon a statement being made showing the amount by which their expenditure had been exceeded in consequence of the war, the excess of the expenditure might be taken out of that vote of credit.

3989. Then, in point of fact, it might increase either head of expenditure under the Army, Navy, or Ordnance?—Yes; but all under the Treasury control.

3990. Then that vote of credit completely alters the amount of the appropriation practically, does it not, as stated in the Act of Parliament?—It may be applied to cover an excess of expenditure in either of those departments.

3991. Might it not be carried to any one of those departments?—No, I think not; not the whole; because the intention was to apply it to an excess of expenditure by any one department which was shown to have been occasioned by the war, and not otherwise.

3992. Then would the Audit-office exercise a discretion as to what was occasioned by the war, and what was not, in any department?—With respect to the Commissariat account for the year 1853–54, 59,901 l. 4 s. 10 d. was taken out of that grant of 3,000,000 l., in consequence of the increased expenditure at Malta for purchases of supplies for the use of the military expedition, then under orders to go to the Mediterranean, the Commissariat vote having been exceeded in consequence of this expenditure.

3993. That explains the expenditure that took place under that head; but, assuming that it had been under any other head, could the Board of Audit have exercised any discretion in allowing a payment, supposing that it had occurred under any head, Army, Navy, or Ordnance?—The payments under the Army, Navy, or Ordnance would be of a similar character to those included in the estimate; it would only be that the expenditure on account of those heads had exceeded the sum estimated.

3994. Whether these matters were occasioned by the war or not, would not that belong to the judgment of the department?—Yes; the Audit could not deal with the purchase of a large quantity of stores by the Navy, whether it was in consequence of the war or not, but that purchase might make the Navy exceed the vote.

3995. Then, in point of fact, it may come to that amount of expenditure, to the extent of 3,000,000 l., under either of those three heads?—No.

3996. A vote of credit of 3,000,000 l. might occasion an additional expenditure to

Charles Vine, Esq.

10 July 1856.

to the extent of 3 000,000*l.* beyond the amounts appropriated by Parliament for those several purposes?—I do not see it quite in that light.

3997. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Supposing there were a vote of credit for 3,000,000*l.* in aid of the war, and suppose that war were waged entirely by sea, and no military operations took place, would it not then be a legal appropriation to give it entirely in aid of the Navy Estimates?—If it was found by the naval account that the Navy Estimates had been exceeded in consequence of that war.

3998. Sir James Graham.] In your audit, as laid before Parliament, any such application of the vote of credit in excess of the votes would be set forth in the account presented?—Yes, decidedly.

3999. Sir Henry Willoughby.] That would be two years after it had occurred, and it would not come to the knowledge of Parliament for two years?—Not until the account was laid before Parliament.

4000. Sir James Graham.] And the Treasury that had authorised that transfer would be responsible for the order?—Yes.

4001. Parliament would be cognisant of the permission given so to apply to it?—Yes.

4002. Mr. Wilson.] The votes to the Army, Ordnance, and Navy last year, when there was a vote of credit, were made, were they not, upon the responsibility of those three departments, the usual votes for the Army, Navy, and Ordnance?—Yes.

4003. With regard to the vote of credit, it was not a vote to any one of those departments, but to the Treasury?—Yes.

4004. The appropriation of the usual votes for the Army, Navy, and Ordnance would be dealt with in the usual way, as if there had been no vote of credit?—Yes.

4005. Any expenditure beyond that must be upon specific Treasury authority, as coming from the vote of credit?—Yes.

4006. Therefore your audit of the accounts in the departments would be precisely the same as in ordinary years; you would deal with the Parliamentary authority, so far as the votes went; but for anything beyond them, you would require Treasury authority for part of the vote of credit given to the Government?—Not exactly that; the expenditure would be shown, and it would be only when the account was made up that the amount could be ascertained as to what proportion of their expenditure, beyond the estimates, had been incurred in consequence of the war.

4007. That would have to be supplied by a Treasury Order upon the vote of credit?—It would.

4008. Therefore the vote of credit is a vote for which the Treasury is responsible?—Yes.

4009. Each department being in that case, as in all others, responsible for its own vote?—Yes.

4010. The Board of Audit would accept the votes of Parliament, so far as they went, as to the department, and the Treasury authority upon the vote of credit, so far as it had been used for each department?—Yes.

4011. Sir James Graham.] The excess beyond each vote, in the case supposed, would be fed from the vote of credit?—It has been so in the Commissariat service.

4012. In the Army and Navy, where there has been an excess, how has that been fed?—In the Navy, by an additional vote; a supplemental one.

4013. In the Army, how has it been fed?—I do not know what the state of the Army is for the year 1854-55.

4014. But by a Treasury Warrant from that vote of credit, it would be possible to make good any deficiency in any vote?—It would.

4015. That warrant would be an authority to you to post that sum so exceeding the vote in the ledger?—Yes.

4016. Would you note it as an excess?—Certainly.

4017. And having noted it as an excess, would the Board of Audit, in laying the annual account with its annotations before Parliament, so mark it?—Yes.

4018. Parliament, when that account was presented, would be cognisant of the excess, and the Treasury might be called upon by Parliament to explain the circumstances?—Certainly.

4019. Sir Henry Willoughby.] In votes of credit you look to the Treasury for your authority?—Yes.

4020. And to the Treasury only?—Yes.

4021. Chairman.]

4021. Chairman.] You look to the Treasury for authority to apply the vote of credit to particular departments, but the Treasury does not give an authority for the additional expenditure does it?—No.

4022. That is incurred by the departments?—Yes.

4023. Sir James Graham.] But accounted for to Parliament in the annual account?—Yes.

4024. Marked under each head where the excess has been?—Yes; if there is any excess beyond the grants it is invariably shown in the account.

4025. For instance, if there has been an excess under the head of machinery and stores for the Navy, that would be marked in the account?—Yes.

4026. Why has there been a supplemental vote in the case of the Navy, and not in the case of any other great branch of expenditure?—I am not aware.

4027. Has the naval expenditure been aided, in point of fact, by the vote of credit, or have the supplemental votes supplied all the deficiences?—The supplemental votes have supplied all the deficiencies.

4028. As to the Navy, there has been no appropriation from the vote of credit?—None.

4029. Mr. Wilson.] There was a supplemental vote for the Ordnance?—Yes.

4030. Practically, as to this vote of credit, does it not take the place of the old army extraordinaries, and is it not practically applied through the commissariat chests abroad?—Yes.

4031. And the expenditure abroad is supplied partly by remittances to the commissariat chests, and partly by bills drawn upon the Government at home?—Yes.

4032. And the vote of credit is applied to the greatest extent to meet those bills?—Yes.

4033. And until the accounts are finally adjusted it is impossible to say what portion of those bills belong to the Army services, and what portion to the Ordnance, and what portion to the Naval services?—Certainly.

4034. Therefore the vote of credit has proved of the greatest possible assistance to the general votes, for the purpose of putting the paymaster in funds to meet those large bills, and to transmit those large sums for the use of the army abroad during the time of war?—Yes.

4035. And until those accounts are finally adjusted it is impossible to say in what branches it has been employed?—Quite impossible.

4036. Mr. Williams.] The application of the vote of credit requires the authority of the Treasury for its expenditure?—Yes.

4037. How is the application made to the Treasury, is it through the different departments, such as the Army or Navy, or in what way is the application made?—An application is made to the Treasury, stating—I will take the Commissariat—that the expenditure of the Commissariat has exceeded their estimate in consequence of the payments which had been made connected with the war, and submitting a statement, showing that such has been the fact, and requesting that the Treasury will authorise the payment to the Commissariat of a portion of the vote of credit, sufficient to cover that excess of expenditure beyond the estimate.

4038. Do they incur the additional expenditure without any authority from the Treasury?—That expenditure has been incurred abroad by the proper authorities. It is impossible to say how an account stands till it is made up.

4039. Sir James Graham.] Do you see any reason, or can you state any, why the Army should not be compelled to come to Parliament and ask for a supplemental vote to meet an estimated deficiency or an ascertained deficiency, exactly as the Navy has been compelled to do?—No, I see no reason.

4040. Why should they not, for the Army as for the Navy, in case of an ascertained deficiency, come to Parliament and ask for a supplemental vote, instead of drawing upon the credit given to the Government for general purposes?—I see no reason why.

4041. Chairman.] How would they have ways and means, supposing they exceeded their vote by three millions, as they seem to have done?—That is invariably stated in the report which the Audit-office make. The deficiency in the grants for the year 1854–55 is reduced to 284,982*l.* 1*s.* 5*d.*, which having been temporarily disbursed out of the Supplies of 1855–56, remains to be made good by an additional grant.

4042. Mr. Wilson.] But that excess was to be made good out of the previous supplies?—

Charles Vine, Esq.

10 July 1856.

supplies?—Yes, out of the supplies for the subsequent year. That would be the case with the Army.

4043. Sir James Graham.] You see no reason why the same practice should not apply to the Army?—It would apply to the Army if the Army had exceeded their estimate.

4044. Chairman.] That might do very well for small sums; but if the Army exceeded their vote by three millions in the course of the year, not upon the settlement of account, but an actual excess over the vote by three millions, where will you get the money?—You could not possibly do it without you had fresh grants in the Exchequer.

4045. Mr. Wilson.] This vote of credit has in point of fact been all used through one single vote, the Commissariat vote, has it not?—Yes, at present.

4046. Is not this the practice, that at the seat of war the Commissariat chest is the only source from which supplies are drawn?—Yes.

4047. The Commissariat vote proper is a very small vote, is it not?—Yes.

4048. But the Commissariat officer has to discharge not only his own services, but he has to supply means for the whole Army expenditure on the spot?—Yes.

4049. Whatever the Commander-in-chief on the spot demands, the Commissariat officer is bound to supply?—Yes.

4050. He must therefore replace in his chest by drafts from home, or remittances from home, money to supply every service?—Yes.

4051. A vote of credit is issued therefore by the authority of the Treasury, from time to time, from the Exchequer to the Paymaster, to meet those large bills which come home on that general service?—Yes.

4052. Therefore no other means could be found for a great accidental expenditure but a vote of credit or Army extraordinaries?—I think not.

4053. Sir James Graham.] This Commissariat expenditure, conducted as you have just stated, is not susceptible of any estimate?—I should think not.

4054. Mr. Wilson.] And it must be accounted for finally, as all other expenditure is, in the final account?—Yes.

4055. Sir Henry Willoughby.] In the present year there has been voted 1,346,000*l.* for services in excess of expenditure beyond the grants in the year ending the 31st of March 1856; that is provided for in the present year; why could not the same system be pursued with regard to the Army?—The Army could, no doubt, if the amount was ascertained, pursue the same system.

4056. If you can provide for an excess of expenditure, such as 1,346,000*l.*, out of the ways and means of the present year, why could not you provide for a similar excess in any branch of the service?—I see no reason why.

4057. Mr. Wilson.] You have been asked some questions with regard to the removal of the audit of certain accounts from the Audit-office to the War department; the description of accounts that have been removed is not what is called the audited accounts, but an examination in detail of those accounts, is it not?—In the Commissariat services it is an examination and audit of those accounts.

4058. But what you did in the Audit-office before with regard to those accounts you did on behalf of the Treasury; the first examination, which has always been done in the Naval and Army departments for themselves as well as the audit of the accounts?—Yes.

4059. It was that examination of accounts which was removed from you to the War department in order to make the practice the same with regard to all those services?—Yes.

4060. You still retain the same control of audit over the Commissariat expenditure that you had before, and that you have now over the Naval and Army expenditure?—Yes; the appropriation audit.

4061. And that which was removed from you was the examination of the accounts, which has always been done by the other departments for themselves?—Yes, the detailed examination.

4062. The authority for which could only be given by the head of the department, who was responsible for the expenditure?—Yes.

4063. Therefore there has been no change made with regard to the Commissariat account which in any way interferes with the functions of the Audit Board, as to the appropriation of the monies?—None.

4064. The change with regard to other Army services which has been alluded to, has been to this extent only: that the receipts which are given by colonels and different deputy paymasters to the paymaster, when they receive the money, now go go back to the Army department, whereas formerly those receipts went to the Audit-office?—Yes.

4065. That is the only change?—Yes.

4066. But the Paymaster-general furnishes to the Audit Board a certified statement of the sums that he has paid in behalf of each of those departments, only he does not receive the receipts of the persons who receive the money, but they are lodged in the Army department where the payment was authorised?—Yes.

4067. You have been asked several questions as to an account being made up earlier, and you have stated that it would be impossible to make up the account perfect in a shorter period than that which is now occupied. I would call your attention to an example, to show the difficulty and impossibility of making up these accounts at the close of the year. The account of the Ordnance up to the 31st March last year, for the preceding year, showed an amount overdrawn, 12,160 l.?—Yes.

4068. In the month of August the adjustment of the accounts had proceeded so far, that instead of there being an overdrawn balance against the vote, there was a balance in favour of the vote of 290,000 l.?—Yes.

4069. At the close of the year there was a balance of 253,000 l.?—Yes.

4070. That was a final adjustment of the account?—Yes; there was less expended than there was voted.

4071. Whereas on the 31st of March there was actually the appearance of an overdrawn account?—Yes.

4072. So that, in point of fact, any account made during the currency of that year, before the final adjustment, could not have been correct?—No.

4073. Would it not show the reverse of the facts?—Yes.

4074. And that is merely what would occur in every other vote throughout the service?—It would occur in a good many votes, particularly store votes.

4075. Because as to those store votes, stores are furnished to various other branches of the public service abroad and at home, which require final adjustment?—In the Navy the store vote might appear to be exceeded on the 31st of March; whereas at a subsequent date the usual declarations from the different dockyards might come in, showing that a large quantity of stores had been issued for other departments for which that vote would be entitled to credit, and the account might then show that the estimate had not been exceeded.

4076. Mr. Hankey.] Might not that be corrected by a certain amount of expenditure being left out of that year and brought into the following year, so that though in the first instance the account would not exhibit the exact amount in accordance with the Appropriation Act in the one year, yet in future years it would be corrected, and Parliament would have a much more rapid mode of ascertaining the great bulk of the expenditure in any one year?—It might be more rapid, but it would be, I think, an incorrect one.

4077. Might it not be a correct one up to a certain extent?—Yes, to a certain extent.

4078. And, therefore, when the accounts of a certain number of years were looked over, anybody could perfectly well ascertain what had been the expenditure of any amount which had been appropriated by Parliament?—Each year would be incorrect, but the aggregate would be right.

4079. Incorrect so far as not being complete?—Yes.

4080. But not incorrect as being a wrong statement?—I think it would be calculated to mislead.

4081. Sir James Graham.] In the cases put, the account of the 31st of March would present a statement of facts the reverse of the truth, for, in the naval store account, occasionally there is at the close of the year an apparent deficiency with an outstanding debt due to the account which would cover the deficiency; would not Parliament upon the presentation of the account to the 31st of March, draw conclusions from those false data, the reverse of what the facts would justify?—I should say they would.

4082. Chairman.] You have stated that the Paymaster's account would be wrong as to particular votes. In the separate votes for the Army and Navy services, would the sums total be wrong; Mr. Hoffay stated that it was quite possible that at the close of the year the Paymaster's accounts would show a surplus, when on all the three services they had exceeded their estimates?—It can very easily be so, because the accounts show the excess of the expenditure on a given year; the accounts of the Paymaster-general show the balance in the Exchequer for

Charles Vine, Esq.

10 July 1856.

for that and the succeeding year, a certain time being allowed to elapse to make make up the account; and as is stated in the Report on the Naval Accounts, the deficiency is temporarily disbursed out of the supplies for the succeeding year. The balance in the hands of the Paymaster-general would not be a balance of the votes for the year when that deficiency took place, but it would be a general balance in his hands of Navy monies.

4083. It arises from the mode in which he keeps his account, does it not?—No, I think not; I do not see how he could keep it otherwise.

4084. With regard to the balances in the Exchequer, if there are Exchequer credits there, will you explain how it is that there is money to the credit of the Navy, when the Navy has exceeded considerably its votes?—The balance in favour of the Navy is upon the subsequent year's grants.

4085. Surely you cannot apply to Navy service monies which have been voted for one year to the services of the subsequent year; you cannot mingle, as you can in the Miscellaneous Estimates, the votes for one year with the votes for another?—Supposing the whole of the votes for the year 1855-56 were exhausted, the Paymaster draws upon them for 1856-57, and an account would be furnished, and when made up it would be ascertained upon the year 1855-56 that there was an excess of expenditure, and that expenditure must necessarily have been taken out of the votes for the subsequent year. The account of the Paymaster-general on the 31st of March would show a balance in favour of the Navy, whereas the accounts for the Navy for the preceding March would show an excess of expenditure beyond the estimate.

4086. Then the paymaster would apply the votes of the years 1855-56 for the service of 1854-55, according to that?—Yes.

4087. Mr. Wilson.] That is quite necessary according to practice and according to law?—He cannot do otherwise.

4088. There is no attempt to divide the services of the year in the payments?—No.

4089. The payments within the year come out of the vote of the year?—Yes.

4090. That is by the regulations which have been made since 1831?—Yes.

4091. Sir James Graham.]—Are not these the words in the Act, "to meet the payments coming due in the course of the year"?—The estimate is taken for sums which shall come in the course of payment.

4092. Sir Henry Willoughby.] Do you say that the excess of expenditure would be paid out of the supplies voted for the next year?—Yes.

4093. Would that be a temporary arrangement until a vote was sanctioned by Parliament?—Yes, it would.

4094. And the money would be actually disbursed?—Yes, it would.

4095. Therefore monies appropriated to one purpose are applied to another?—To that extent.

4096. To the extent of any excess?—Yes.

4097. Mr. Wilson.] You make up your accounts to the 31st of March of payments made up to that day all over the world?—Yes.

4098. With regard to the payments at home, all those payments come out of monies voted in the proper year?—Yes.

4099. With regard to the payments abroad, the time of actual payment in that case might be two or three months afterwards, and it would come out of money issued the next year?—No.

4100. The bills drawn?—No.

4101. Suppose a payment of money at the Cape on behalf of the Navy, on the 20th of March; that payment finally comes into the year ending the 31st of March, does it not?—Yes.

4102. The actual payment at home by the Paymaster does not take place till the bill is paid in June?—The bill would be paid out of the Commissariat Chest account.

4103. But at home in June?—Yes.

4104. Chairman.] But the Pay-office balance does not show the real state of the vote, whether the votes are exceeded or not?—It is impossible.

4105. Mr. Wilson.] It not only does not show the real state of the expenditure between the various votes of the same department, but it cannot show the real state of the expenditure of the different departments themselves?—No.

4106. Because

4106. Because one department is in advance to another in foreign stations?— Yes. Charles Vine, Esq. 10 July 1856.

4107. You were asked a good many questions about appropriating in the daily issues of monies with regard to the Army, and separating the militia from the other votes of the Army; is it not the case that the Appropriation Act does not contemplate any separation of those votes in the first instance, but only an adjustment in the audit finally?—The Appropriation Act states that there shall be so much granted for Army services; the whole amount, and then subdivides it under the different votes.

William George Anderson, Esq., called in; and further Examined.

4108. Mr. Wilson.] HAVE you any explanation to make with regard to your last day's evidence at the Pay-office?—I am anxious to offer some observations on one or two points connected with my examination on Monday last, on which I was either not sufficiently clear or not strictly correct. I was called upon suddenly, without having received any intimation as to the year's accounts which were to become the subject of investigation, to explain cash operations which extended over a very wide field, and which took place four years ago, without having been afforded the opportunity of previously examining the transactions. I am therefore compelled to trespass on the attention of the Committee for a few minutes, for the purpose of correcting or explaining part of my former evidence. The Chairman put several questions to me respecting the delay in drawing credits for certain Consolidated Fund services and for Naval services, in the month of April 1852; and in answer to question No. 3438, I stated that the reason for it, so far as I recollected, was, that at that time the Treasury were issuing Ways and Means Bills, and that we had very little money in the Exchequer. I have since Monday had an opportunity of consulting the Treasury books, and I find that I was wrong in supposing that Ways and Means Bills were issued at that time. On reference to these books, the reason for not drawing credits appears obvious: it is the practice of the Treasury on each quarter-day to issue to the Paymaster-general such an amount as will suffice to carry on the public service until the revenue of the succeeding quarter shall have accumulated a sufficient balance to enable them to resume the daily issues. On the 5th of April 1852, the Treasury issued to the Paymaster-general credits to the amount of 785,000*l.*, to enable him to carry on the service from the 5th to the 17th of the month, and according to his instructions he was bound not to draw additional credits until that sum, as well as the balance on his cash account, were exhausted. It is usual in regard to these large issues to make them with the concurrence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as they affect his arrangements as to deficiency bills, and I have no doubt that if the usual course was adopted on that occasion, Mr. Disraeli had sufficient and proper reasons for giving his sanction to the issue in question. These explanations fully account for the delay in drawing the credits to which the questions of the Chairman pointed. In regard to a similar delay in numerous instances in drawing credits for the Civil Service votes in the course of the year 1852, I find on looking into the cash receipts for that year, that independently of the ordinary cash receipts applicable to the votes, and which become absorbed in the vote accounts when expended, there existed throughout the year 1852 a balance of cash belonging to deposit accounts, not subject to Parliamentary appropriation, varying from 180,000 l. to 320,000 l. The Committee must be aware, from the evidence before them, that the Paymaster-general is bound by his instructions to exhaust these monies in making his general payments, and that he must consequently leave in the Exchequer on the several votes to which such monies are applied balances to cover such deposits whenever they may be called for. It must be therefore evident that to keep every vote account in credit by Exchequer issues, would entirely defeat the object which the Treasury had in view in the Exchequer Regulation Minute of 1834, and in the various Pay-office Minutes, by which the cash receipts are to be exhausted in order to leave the largest amount of balance in the custody of the Exchequer. Those are the only two points upon which I have any observation to make with regard to my former evidence. W. G. Anderson, Esq.

4109. Chairman.] As to the deposited accounts, have they been increasing of late years?—Yes, they have been increasing very much since the original consolidation.

4110. What was the old practice with regard to those deposits?—The largest amount

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

10 July 1856.

amount of deposits came from the Paymaster of Civil Services. On the consolidation of that department in 1848 with the Paymaster-general, they were used then the same as any other monies in the cash account; but they have increased since then very largely, owing to the transfer of new services, and owing to the Treasury having taken away from various public accountants balances which stood to their credit at the Bank, and placed them in the hands of the Paymaster-general.

4111. Supposing that the system of keeping within your credit is a proper system, those deposited accounts very much interfere with it, and almost render it impossible?—Clearly. If you use the deposit monies to save the Exchequer monies, you must not draw Exchequer credits, otherwise you will have money in excess of the sum required for the payments.

4112. Can you devise a plan by which you might use those deposit monies by paying them to the Bank, keeping a separate account of them, and taking interest in that way, without bringing them into your account, and using them for your general drawing account?—The old plan was to leave them unproductive in the Bank.

4113. But could you make them productive to the public without absolutely putting them into your drawing account?—Each account would require a separate consideration.

4114. Do you not think that by an arrangement with the Bank that might be done?—I can hardly answer that without consulting the Bank; it is contrary to their principle of business to allow interest on deposits.

4115. With regard to all the Consolidated Fund payments; you referred to particular years; is it not the usual practice to issue salaries and those payments before you draw?—Yes, and for the same reason which I have given as to this particular year; only that in 1852 it was for a longer period than usual; in fact, the issue had been larger at the end of the quarter, and it had taken a longer time to exhaust it before fresh credits were drawn.

4116. Is it not the habit to make those payments from the general drawing account before the credits are drawn from the Exchequer?—They are always made out of the issue that is granted before the close of the quarter, and no issue from the Consolidated Fund for the quarter can take place before the 5th of the month; the issue before the Consolidated Fund account for the quarter is closed must be out of supply services, and you pay to the extent of that issue before you commence drawing afresh upon the revenue of the succeeding quarter; it may vary sometimes three, sometimes four, and sometimes five days; but in this case it went on for a much longer period.

4117. You have Exchequer Bills in your custody; the Exchequer send you Exchequer Bills, do they not?—Ways and Means Bills are sometimes issued in lieu of money; but they are usually issued to the Bank, and the Bank places the amount of those Bills at par to the credit of the Paymaster-general's cash account.

4118. How long do you keep those Bills?—They are securities issued to the Bank; they are issued to the Bank for an advance of money to the Government.

4119. I am speaking of the actual custody of the Bills; how do you keep them?—Those Ways and Means Bills never pass actually into the hands of the Paymaster-general; they go direct from the Exchequer to the Bank of England.

4120. Have you no Exchequer Bills?—The ordinary Supply Bills which are issued by the Exchequer to the Paymaster-general to exchange bills which are advertised to be paid off are issued to the Paymaster-general.

4121. Under what custody are they kept?—They are in the custody of three officers of the department, and are placed in an iron chest having three different locks, each officer holding a separate key.

4122. Are you satisfied with the custody of those bills?—Yes, quite so; I think them quite safe; they are only issued to the Paymaster-general the day before the bankers call for them; and, generally speaking, nearly the whole amount is issued on the first day of the exchange.

4123. What is the largest amount at one time?—The largest exchange may have been about 9,000,000 l.; probably the next day they might be reduced to 100,000 l.; and until the day previous to the issue they remain in the custody of the Exchequer, under similar regulations.

4124. There is a return which has been sent in of advances made for any services not voted by Parliament or sanctioned by statute. I see that for Labuan there has been an expense, from the 1st of April 1854 to the 4th of April 1855, of 1,564 l.,

1,564 l., advanced from the general balance, and not yet repaid; will you explain how that is?—With regard to Labuan, for several years it was a voted service, and it was determined at last to discontinue the vote; but subsequently to that, bills, which had been previously drawn from Labuan, were presented for payment, and the Treasury were bound to accept the bills; but there has been, I believe, a correspondence with regard to the recovery of them from the colonial funds; they will ultimately be repaid.

4125. Where from?—Out of colonial monies.

4126. Then it is an advance?—Yes, which may be considered as belonging to the civil contingencies for the period; it is the practice of the Pay-office when an account is overdrawn, to show the overissue, and not to sink it under civil contingencies.

4127. There is 564 l. prior to April 1854?—That was the sum; there were two sets of bills drawn and presented subsequently to the vote having been discontinued, and both sums are in the same condition; they were bills drawn, and probably sufficient notice was not given to the colony after the discontinuance of the vote; the bills were drawn in the interval.

4128. But there was an excess over the vote of 1853-54?—There was no vote after 1854, I believe.

4129. There was an excess over that vote?—Yes, there was an excess over that vote owing to those bills coming in after the vote had been discontinued; those bills would have been paid out of the vote of 1854-55, if it had been continued.

4130. There has been not only an excess for that year, but a further expenditure in the year after?—Both of them are in the same condition; both sets of bills were drawn after the final vote had been taken.

4131. There has been no vote taken this year for it?—No, nor the last year; I am not certain whether there was anything the year before.

4132. Mr. Wilson.] It is expected to be repaid?—Yes.

4133. That is the reason why it has not been voted; that a correspondence has been going on with a view to its repayment?—Yes.

4134. Chairman.] There has been a correspondence between the Treasury and the Pay-office?—No, between the Treasury and the Colonial-office, I believe.

4135. Can you furnish the correspondence?—It is not a matter that rests with my department; that is the explanation I have received from the Colonial branch of the office.

4136. I see also by a paper delivered by the Assistant Paymaster-general, 4th of July 1856, that there is a sum of money payable to the Exchequer of 53,959 l.; can you give an explanation of that?—All those are monies which probably have arisen from transfers from the various departments of the Army, Admiralty, and Ordnance, which accumulated to the end of the quarter, and are paid over to the Exchequer in one sum.

4137. But they were not paid over to the Exchequer?—No, they were not paid over at that date; they were held as payable to the Exchequer at the usual period.

4138. They are held as deposits?—Yes, payable to the Exchequer, under Treasury regulations.

4139. Why were they not paid over on the 31st of March?—Because under the Treasury Minute of May 1848, it was decided that they should be paid over every quarter. They arise from transfers and not from cash paid in. The great bulk of those receipts come in at the end of the second month of the quarter; they are generally paid over early in the following month.

4140. If that is the general practice, I want to know how, if those were received in February, the second month of the quarter, there remained at the termination of the year 53,000 l.?—In all probability those were transfers on the very last day of the year, on the 31st of March, from the different departments; these transfers are made on the last day of every month.

4141. Would there be any difficulty in preparing an account of the monies paid over, and when they were paid into the Exchequer?—No. For all old stores, the monies are directed to be paid over once a quarter, because they are only accounted for quarterly to the Naval and Military departments.

4142. Sir James Graham.] You, with your own hand, laid the foundation of the Naval ledger?—Yes, some 25 years ago.

4143. And know it thoroughly?—Yes; but I have not seen the books since I left that department in 1838.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

10 July 1856.

4144. You know the principle of it?—Yes, I do; I framed the books, and I know the practice.

4145. Were you consulted when that system of account was extended to the Army department?—Yes; I was the person who framed the books in the War department.

4146. Are the books in the War department framed exactly on the model of the Naval books?—Yes, they are framed precisely on the same plan as the Naval accounts.

4147. We have heard to-day, from the Inspector of Audit, that there are some changes in practice in the Army accounts, varying from the distinct practice of the Naval accounts; are you cognizant of that variation in the details?—No, I have no recollection of having been consulted with regard to any changes in the mode of keeping the accounts; when once my duty of introducing the books was completed, I had nothing further to do with them.

4148. With your knowledge of the Naval accounts, and your experience of the working of that system, would you be slow, if consulted, to sanction any change in the details?—I should be very unwilling to sanction any change, unless it were such improvements as could be extended to the whole, in order to preserve a uniform arrangement of the whole of those great accounts.

4149. You think that uniformity, with reference to those great accounts, not only facilitates the audit, but is sound in principle, and ought to be maintained?—Certainly.

4150. No changes in the one varying from the other would à priori receive your sanction?—I think not; I think those are matters which the Treasury should, perhaps, look more into than they do at present. Each department should receive from the Treasury instructions as to the mode of keeping its accounts; and the Treasury should inspect them in all the departments, that they may be established upon some uniform basis; for if we are ever to embody the whole of the public accounts into one, they should be kept on the same system.

4151. We hear of two sets of accounts being kept in the Army, whereas there is only one great account kept in the Navy; you are aware that the great object in the Navy was, to establish one large account, and to get rid of the sub-accounts?—Yes. The Army is now undergoing a great change, by throwing together several departments, and the accounts will now necessarily be consolidated. It might be very desirable to watch the change that is going on in that office, to secure uniformity.

4152. Is not this a good opportunity for having one Army ledger, the same as there is one Naval ledger?—I think it might be difficult at present, because the departments are not under the same roof; one is at Whitehall and the other is in Pall-mall.

4153. That is so with regard to the Navy, excepting that all the expenditure, as well as the account, is conducted under one roof?—Yes. It is not so in the Army.

4154. Would it not be possible to make the arrangements as to the Army correspond with those of the Navy, and have under one roof all the expenditure and only one set of accounts?—That is absolutely necessary, and I believe they are building new offices for that purpose.

4155. A letter from Mr. Brooksbank to Mr. Lichfield has been given in to this Committee, bearing date the 30th of January 1849; are you cognizant of that letter?—Sir Charles Trevelyan begged me to lay it before the Committee.

4156. Have you read it?—Yes.

4157. Does that letter, or not, confirm your view of the prudence of keeping only one book in the Paymaster's office, and that of a simple kind, a debtor for receipts and a creditor for payments, getting rid of the two sets of books?—Mr. Brooksbank's views and my own entirely coincide upon that point.

4158. Therefore all the experience of Mr. Brooksbank, so far from being at variance with what you recommend, sustains your recommendations?—Yes, I think so; that letter proves it, I think, clearly.

4159. Mr. Cardwell.] You have said that for the imperfect control of the Exchequer might easily be substituted a perfect Parliamentary control, through the medium of a concurrent audit?—That is an arrangement, I think, which it would be desirable to adopt.

4160. If such Parliamentary control should be established through the account of the audit, would it not be possible, without any inconvenience to the public service, to subject the cash account of the Paymaster-general to that control?—There

There is no difficulty at all in doing that. I am afraid it would be very inconvenient to disturb the present mode of dealing with the cash account; there is a large business connected with it, and it is very much connected with those great accounts which are kept in the Naval and Military departments; if you were to take it away from the Paymaster and place it elsewhere, the result would be that those great departments, instead of receiving a simple debtor and creditor account from the Paymaster of all the receipts and payments applicable to their accounts, would receive two accounts, one-half from one department and one-half from another. The Paymaster could not carry on his business unless he was fully cognisant of the whole of those cash transactions; he would not know what sums he had to draw upon; you must leave the cash account with the Paymaster-general. If it is thought necessary, there will be no difficulty in subjecting that account to such an audit or revision as you have already established in the great departments; all those transactions which appear in the cash account of the Paymaster-general, and which have reference to naval and military votes, do now pass under the review of the auditor; and although in the accounts of those great departments, to that extent, it would be duplicate work, still there are other monies with regard to the deposit accounts which do not pass under the review of the auditor, and the attention of the local auditor might be especially directed to those monies.

4161. Such an audit as you have last spoken of would have the effect of extending to the Paymaster's cash account that control which the Comptroller of the Exchequer cannot exercise over it, and does not now, even in theory, exercise over it?—It would place those accounts under a control which no Exchequer system, such as is now established, can ever reach.

4162. Sir James Graham.] I find that Mr. Brooksbank states his conclusion in these terms: "I come to the conclusion that either the Pay-office should be united to the Exchequer, or the Exchequer to the Pay-office, and that the basis of our accounts should be again, as formerly, payments, not credits;" is that a summary of your view?—Yes, precisely; in several of the answers I have already given I have endeavoured to express that as strongly as I could. I find, in looking through Dr. Bowring's Reports on the French accounts, that at a very early period of their reforms, the French found it necessary to lay down that principle before they could proceed with them.

4163. Mr. Brooksbank's preconceived opinions were opposed to the changes that were introduced?—He had been brought up entirely under the old system; but his knowledge of all those matters was very extensive.

4164. His letter bears date in 1849, and is the result of his last experience?—Yes; I believe he died not very long after.

4165. Chairman.] Will you explain how you would propose that the Pay-office should, without any check, issue money on order to the different departments, without any sanction of the Treasury?—The Pay-office must always have the sanction of the Treasury for those issues, because they must obtain the money from the Treasury as they now do; at present the Treasury does not interfere with the regulations of the great departments with regard to drawing upon the Paymaster, they merely place the funds in the hands of the Paymaster to remain at the disposal of the departments that are empowered by law to draw upon them.

4166. The theory was, that the Treasury by issuing a credit for the department was a check upon the expenditure of the department?—Yes. It is very necessary that the Treasury should continue that control; in the last year, it was found necessary that the Treasury should communicate with the departments when their expenditure was proceeding at too great a rate, and which threatened to involve them in difficulties at the close of the year. The Treasury in all cases where they find that the departments are spending money faster than they think right, call upon them for explanations, in order that they may judge whether it is proper that they should go to Parliament for further powers.

4167. You think that the Treasury should hold some check upon the issues to the different departments?—I think the Treasury should have a far better check than it has at present. I would increase the check, and for this reason, that the system of credits embarrasses the Treasury as much as it does the other departments; I think the Treasury should have a daily return of all the payments by the Paymaster, and that they should charge actual payments against the votes in their books instead of charging the credits.

4168. Will you explain to the Committee how the Treasury is to exercise that check upon the department without looking to the votes?—I think the Treasury should keep a daily account of the expenditure applicable to the votes.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

10 July 1856.

4169. The Treasury must upon each vote have an account of the expenditure?—They should have the annual vote, and they should have the daily payments out of that vote returned to them by the Paymaster.

4170. Supposing, for instance, the Woods and Forests were to be expending largely, how would there be any check upon the department?—In this way. It would give the Treasury a knowledge of the progress of the expenditure, and they might call upon that department for such explanations as they thought necessary from time to time.

4171. Supposing the department still went on, and brought in large demands, as I understand you, provided they did not exceed their vote, you would pay them whether you had credit or not?—As long as the department kept within its grants, the Paymaster would be justified in paying.

4172. There would be no check upon the Paymaster whatever, nothing to prevent him from paying from day to day, the whole vote in that month?—If the Treasury had a daily return from the Paymaster, they would always be able to check that; they would see the progress of the expenditure as compared with the vote, and call for explanations in time.

4173. What would be the practical way in which the Treasury would desire the Paymaster to stop the votes?—If the Paymaster returned to the Treasury, the amount of his payments under all the separate votes, the Treasury, when they came to record them in their books, afterwards, would see at once whether the departments were spending more than they thought they ought to expend; they would not wait till the vote was exhausted before they called for explanations; they would call for them at a much earlier period, and they would be able to establish some check to prevent an excess upon the aggregate of the grant.

4174. What practical means have you at the Treasury to stop further payment of the expenditure; would you write to the Paymaster not to continue his payments or in what way would you check it; it is now checked by the Treasury not giving credit, or it ought to be?—There is no greater check at present than would exist under the other plan; the Treasury could as easily stop the payment as the credit.

4175. Not as construed by the Pay-office, but as framed in the Bill as supposed in the Report. It was one of the views of the Report that the Treasury should previously see what the deficiencies were, and return what was expected to be wanted, and that it should be examined at the Treasury, and the Treasury should then send the credit that was necessary?—The same thing would arise now. Suppose a larger credit were demanded than remained upon the balance of the vote, the Treasury would have to state to the Paymaster whether he was to stop payment or not.

4176. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Do you remember that at the end of last July it happened that the Army and Navy were in advance of their Estimates, and that the Treasury called upon them to prepare increased Estimates to be laid before Parliament?—Precisely; that was done before Parliament broke up.

4177. Instead of calling upon the department to diminish the expenditure, they called upon it to make supplemental Estimates, in order to enable the Government to provide additional ways and means?—Yes. The Treasury called upon the departments to review their expenditure with reference to the Estimates they had already submitted to Parliament; and the consequence of that was, that they convinced them that their Estimates were too low, and they prepared supplemental Estimates, which were laid before Parliament, and additional votes were obtained. Then the Treasury came forward to Parliament and took additional ways and means.

4178. Those additional Estimates were prepared in consequence of suggestions from the Treasury?—In consequence of the Treasury control over those departments.

4179. Sir James Graham.] You presume a daily knowledge on the part of the Treasury, under the system suggested, of the exact state of the cash account under each vote; and also you presume the subordination of all the departments to the supreme authority of the Treasury?—Clearly so.

4180. Those are the two assumptions?—Yes; I apprehend that without subordination there can be no control at all.

4181. Upon those two assumptions of daily knowledge, and the effective control which which should be exercised, you think, with concurrent audit, the system would be perfect?—I think it would be very stringent.

4182. You would also recommend early and frequent communications by the Audit department to Parliament?—As frequently as necessity might arise.

4183. Sir Henry Willoughby.] If the control of the Treasury breaks down, who is to carry into effect the powers given?—Parliament must be the last resort in all those cases.

4184. Do you deny that there is a necessity for some controlling power?—I think that the Treasury control upon the public expenditure at present is weak, and that it is owing in a great measure to a defective knowledge of the actual proceedings of the departments.

4185. The Chancellor of the Exchequer.] And partly to a mistaken reliance upon a system of control which is not really operative?—The theory is, that that control rests now not so much with the Treasury as it does with the Exchequer; but the Treasury, wherever they can, bring their control to bear too.

4186. Sir James Graham.] Is not the object of the Legislature to concentrate and accumulate control in the Treasury?—I think it should be so, as the responsibility ultimately rests with the controlling department of the Government.

4187. Chairman.] Is it posssble for the Treasury, without knowing as much as the Admiralty, to control the Admiralty expenditure?—The Treasury have exercised a general control. I do not say that they can do it in details, but they can in great matters, such as the Admiralty taking a short vote; last year the Treasury forced that department to go to Parliament with a supplemental estimate. They did the same thing with the Ordnance. The Ordnance again broke down, towards the close of the year, and the Treasury forced them a second time to lay before Parliament another supplemental estimate. In great matters of that kind the Treasury control can be brought to bear, but it cannot reach details.

4188. With regard to the supplemental estimate, there was a vote last year and a credit for 3,000,000*l.*; what has become of that vote?—It has been issued; the whole of the extraordinary expenses of the war are conducted through the Commissariat Chest account. The whole of that money is issued for the payment of Treasury bills, which are drawn on account of the extraordinary expenses; an account will be prepared by the Audit Board itself, showing the application of that vote of credit.

4189. You have already a vote in excess on the part of the Navy, have you not?—Yes; but there is a very large excess in the Commissariat, an excess also in the Army, which the vote of credit covers.

4190. Have you already a vote of excess on the part of the Ordnance?—No, I think not. The second supplemental estimate which the Treasury forced the Ordnance to take on the meeting of Parliament, was taken before the year had expired; it was not an excess upon the closed account; the final account of the expenditure for the Ordnance will not be prepared till next year.

4191. It is the same with regard to the Navy, is it not?—The Navy took a vote this year for the excess of 1854-55; the Ordnance were supplemental votes for the year ending March last; those accounts will not come forward till next Session.

4192. But they are supposed to meet, so far as the Navy is concerned, the whole of the expense of the year 1855-56?—The year ending March 1855.

4193. It is not so with regard to the Ordnance?—The vote which appears in the Appropriation Act of this year was to provide funds to carry on the Ordnance service up to the 31st of March 1856.

4194. Was it expected to cover the whole, or is there a deficit for the year 1855-56?—We shall not know that till next year, when the accounts will be furnished.

4195. Still you have 3,000,000*l.* to meet the Army deficit?—That vote of credit was not taken solely to cover the deficit upon the estimates of those departments, but to meet a number of extraordinary expenses which are not provided for in those estimates. There are numerous expenses incurred in the Crimea and at Constantinople which are not provided for in the ordinary estimates of those departments.

4196. Any excess on the votes you will have 3,000,000*l.* to meet, will you not?—Yes; the final Army account for 1854-55 came in only yesterday. There is no large deficit on that account; there is a very large one in the Commissariat; and probably next year there will be another large deficit in the same account, the whole of which will have to be made good out of that vote of credit.

W. G. Anderson, Esq.

10 July 1856.

4197. What I want to know is this, whether Parliament, having given you 3,000,000*l.* over the votes for the war, you have not also taken a further supplemental vote to meet your deficit in the Navy and in the Ordnance?—Those supplemental votes apply to the ordinary estimate of the department, and not to the extraordinary expenditure at the seat of war.

4198. Besides this supplemental vote on the part of the Navy, are you going to apply any part of the 3,000,000*l.* to the Navy?—I do not think the Navy will want any part of it; it will be entirely required for the Army, the Commissariat, and the Ordnance.

4199. But with regard to the Ordnance?—I think, very likely the Ordnance will require part of the vote of credit on closing those accounts; there are various expenses which are not considered to belong to the ordinary estimates of the department, and which will be thrown upon the vote of credit. A separate account of the application of that vote of credit will be prepared by the Audit Board, and submitted to Parliament as a separate account, next year probably.

THE RIGHT HON. SIR FRANCIS T. BARING, BART., IN THE CHAIR.

Edward Romilly, Esq., and Charles Macaulay, Esq., called in; and Examined.

E. Romilly, Esq., and C. Macaulay, Esq.

14 July 1856.

4200. Chairman.] (To Mr. Romilly.) WHAT office do you hold?—That of Commissioner of Audit.

4201. How long have you held that office?—Since the beginning of 1836.

4202. How long have you been Chairman of the Board?—Since May 1854.

4203. (To Mr. Macaulay.) What office do you hold?—That of Secretary of the Board of Audit, since March 1854.

4204. (To Mr. Romilly.) What is the tenure of the Audit Board?—The tenure of the Audit Board is during good behaviour. Quamdiu se bene gesserint.

4205. Are they appointed by the Treasury?—Yes.

4206. They hold under Act of Parliament?—Yes, and their salaries are payable out of the Consolidated Fund.

4207. Is it the same with the establishment?—No, it is not; and their salaries are voted by Parliament.

4208. Does Mr. Macaulay hold during good behaviour, or during the usual tenure of official men?—During the usual tenure. The Board have the power of dismissing any of their officers; but although they have the power of dismissing any of their officers, practically, there is always an appeal to the Treasury from the decision of the Board. Under our patent we have the power of dismissing any of our officers, but the Treasury would in reality have the power of re-appointment, if they thought fit.

4209. I suppose, practically, that that never or rarely comes into operation?—Practically, it does not.

4210. The Committee have had before them the officers who inspect the accounts of the Army and Navy, and Ordnance, in the Appropriation Audit; are those officers appointed by you, or are they appointed by the Treasury?—Those officers are appointed by the Treasury. We have the power of promoting within our own office. The inspectors, however, are appointed by the Treasury, upon our recommendation, and of late years the Treasury have always acceeded to our recommendation; but with respect to the Inspector of the Army and Navy Accounts, he is appointed by the Treasury without our recommendation.

4211. Direct?—

4211. Direct?—Yes.

4212. Had the officers who were appointed been officers of your department?—The first officer who was appointed was Mr. Hoffay, who was temporarily employed in our department; Mr. Vine, the second who was appointed, was an established officer.

4213. Were they both appointed by your recommendation, or not?—Not upon our recommendation. I may, however, be allowed to add, that no one can think more highly of those two gentlemen than I do.

4214. Mr. Hoffay had been in the Commissariat, I believe?—Yes. But being still in the Commissariat, he was attached to our office at the time of his appointment.

4215. Are those officers solely responsible to you, and do they report to you, or do they report direct to the Treasury?—They report direct to us.

4216. Have you the power of removing those officers if you should be dissatisfied with them. I do not mean of dismissing them; but if you thought that an officer, however good he might be, was not particularly adapted for the work that he was employed upon, have you the power of changing him?—I imagine that we have the power under the patent of doing that, but I doubt whether we should exercise that power without referring to the Treasury, as the appointment was made originally by the Treasury for that special duty.

4217. With regard to those under him, what is the case with them?—They are placed there entirely by us.

4218. You would remove them as you please, would you, according to your own opinion?—Certainly.

4219. Will you state to the Committee what the accounts are that you audit, and what are the accounts that you do not audit?—The accounts which we audit will be best found by a return which has been already made to Parliament as to the present state of our business. In addition to that, there is a printed list of accounts which we audit, which could be put in, if the Committee wish it. That is the general register of the accounts of the Audit Office (handing in the same).

4220. Have you got a list of those accounts which you do not audit?—I have had a short statement made out, taken from the Miscellaneous Votes, showing under that head the number of accounts which we do not audit.

4221. How many are there?—I think they must be somewhere under 100. Out of the Miscellaneous Estimates, and the Revenue Estimates together, which in 1855-6 amounted to 11,329,392 l., there is examined in the Audit-office, 9,184,500 l., and not examined in the Audit-office, 2,081,197 l., leaving 63,695 l., a portion of which may be examined in the Audit-office; but this statement may not be perfectly accurate.

4222. Of that 9,000,000 l. that you audit, can you tell the Committee how much is finally examined, or how much is what is called checked by the appropriation audit?—None of it is checked by the appropriation audit, with the exception of the sums voted for the Woods and Forests and Works departments.

4223. The whole of that is finally audited, is it not?—The whole of that amount is finally audited in this way: imprests are made to public accountants; they are charged with those imprests in our books, they are called upon to account for the sums which have been so issued to them, and we see that they have duly accounted for those sums by proper vouchers.

4224. What power has the Treasury of sending accounts to you?—The Treasury, I imagine, have the power of sending to us any accounts that they think fit, with the exception, perhaps, of some accounts which by Act of Parliament have been directed to be accounted for in some other way; but even with respect to those, it has happened that the Treasury have called upon us to report upon those accounts in some instances. There was the instance of certain accounts of Mr. Swabey, who was the Registrar of the Admiralty Court. That account was directed by Parliament to be disposed of in a different way; but the Treasury sent us those accounts to report upon. We did not audit them, but we reported upon them.

4225. When once an account is sent, what power has the Treasury of withdrawing an account from you?—The Treasury have the power, I imagine, of issuing money without account if they think fit; and therefore, although they may have issued money upon account, yet they may change their minds afterwards, and withdraw that account from us.

4226. With reference to the question of the army expenditure and the commissariat

E. Romilly, Esq., and C. Macaulay, Esq.

14 July 1856.

commissariat expenditure, the commissariat expenditure used to be fully and finally audited by you?—Yes.

4227. That was transferred to the army, was it not?—Yes.

4228. Have the Treasury full power at any time, without the sanction of Parliament, to withdraw any account from you and to send it to any other auditors?—I should imagine so, unless Parliament directed that the account should be audited by us.

4229. Can you state to the Committee whether there are any accounts which are specifically sent to you by Parliament, which the Treasury cannot withdraw. With regard to the navy expenditure, by Act of Parliament the appropriation account would be fixed with you, and probably the Treasury could not get rid of it?—Certainly not. There are the Army and Navy Votes of Parliament, the sheriffs' accounts, the county courts accounts, and many others which come to us under Act of Parliament.

4230. With regard to the great accounts, are they generally sent to you by Act of Parliament, or by the power which the Treasury have of sending to you any account which they please?—I think that the larger number of accounts, and certainly the most important, have come to us under Act of Parliament, and not under the Treasury. The Revenue accounts, the Bank accounts, the Colonial accounts, the Paymaster-general's account, the account of the Paymaster of Civil Services in Ireland, the Poor Law accounts, have all come to us under Act of Parliament, and many others might be mentioned.

4231. I see that the salaries of the Public departments, the Votes of the two Houses of Parliament, the Treasury, and the three Secretaries of State, all those do not appear to be audited by you at all?—No, they are not.

4232. The prosecutions at assizes and at quarter sessions are not audited by you?—No; they are not.

4233. The greater part of those, if I am not inaccurate, appear to be comparatively small sums that are not audited; though there are a good number of votes, yet those seem to be not very large sums that are not audited by you?—Their amount is not large.

4234. The civil contingencies are not audited by you, I see?—The civil contingencies are not audited as civil contingencies. There may be issues made out of civil contingencies which may possibly be audited by us. That is to say, there may be an account which we do audit, and a portion of that expenditure may be charged to civil contingencies afterwards; but we do not audit the account as the account of civil contingencies.

4235. Will you state to the Committee the course that an account takes with you?—An account comes to us either by the direction of an Act of Parliament; or from the circumstance that the Treasury have made an issue upon account; or that bills have been drawn, and that the Treasury, having sent to us the advices of those bills, states that they have been issued upon account, or that payments have been by a head accountant to others upon conditions which render them liable to account. We then charge the accountant in the books of our office with the sums so issued to him, and then a requisition letter is sent to the accountant to render an account of that sum so issued to him; and the account, when it comes back into the office, is placed in the hands of an inspector, and is inspected, in order to see that the balances are in safe custody, and to see whether there is any unusual or large expenditure which should attract attention immediately; the account is then put into the hands of the examiner, who goes through the examination of that account with the authorities and vouchers, and the inspector frames queries where it may be necessary. When those queries have been answered, he lays the queries and the answers before a committee of the Board, which always consists of two, to decide upon those answers, and then the account is made up into what is called the state of the account, which is first audited by a committee of the Board, consisting of two, and the account is then transmitted to the Treasury, for their final warrant. It is returned to us with the warrant of the Treasury, and it is then signed for declaration, or for passing, as the case may be, and it is subsequently declared before the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

4236. What do you mean by the final warrant of the Treasury?—An account is sent to the Treasury, under the Act of Parliament, in order that they may consider all the particulars of the account. The words of the Act, I think, are, that that after due consideration of all particulars, the Commissioners of the Treasury shall grant their warrant.

4237. What does their warrant do; does it approve it and pass it?—It is a warrant to declare the account; it is approving of it.

4238. It is authorising you to prepare it for declaration?—Yes.

4239. With regard to the declaration by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, what is the effect of that; is that the final settlement of the account?—That is the final settlement of the account.

4240. The account is then closed?—Yes.

4241. Now, what power, during the course of these proceedings, have the Treasury to allow items, or at all to interfere in the arrangement of the account, or in the settling of the account, before it comes before them in a formal shape?—The Treasury, we consider, have no power whatever of directing us as to the mode in which we are to examine or audit accounts; but, in consequence of their authorising the expenditure, and as it not unfrequently happens that we find that an item is not, as we consider, duly authorised, we write to the accountant and ask for the authority justifying that payment. In many cases the accountant, instead of answering our question, goes to the Treasury with the view of supplying what he considers the authority for that payment; but we have always considered that the authority given in long after the expenditure has actually been incurred, is, in point of fact, not an authority, but an ex post facto sanction; and though in such cases we have received Treasury letters, directing us to allow the amount in the accounts, we have thought it right to disallow the amount, because it was not duly authorised; and we have been enabled to do that in consequence of the specific provisions of an Act of Parliament to the effect, that we are not to allow in any account any sum which is not duly authorised; and having so disallowed it, we leave it to the Treasury, in their warrant upon the account, to allow that sum which we have disallowed; by such means compelling them to make it their act, and not ours.

4242. Has the Treasury no power at all, while the account is going forward, to direct you to allow a certain sum?—We consider that they have no such power as that; and I believe that it is an opinion which is also entertained at the Treasury, that they have no power of interfering with our mode of auditing accounts. The auditors have been always excessively jealous upon that point. Soon after the constitution of the Board, in 1806, there was a very important remonstrance written by the Board, in consequence of the Treasury at that time having directed them as to the way in which they were to audit some particular account; and the Treasury acquiesced in the views of the auditors, and withdrew their former directions.

4243. When an account came before them, the Treasury had the perfect power of allowing or disallowing anything?—I believe they have then the power of allowing or disallowing anything that they think fit. I look upon them, therefore, as the ultimate auditors of the accounts.

4244. You do not mean practically; but that gives them the power of really setting aside the audit, in whatever way they please, in particular items?—It gives them that power.

4245. It is not very much in the habit of doing it, I suppose, except upon the recommendation of the auditors?—Hardly ever; I do not think it is their habit.

4246. The Treasury have the power, have they not, of issuing money without an account, or with such an account as they may direct, so that the account will not be audited by your Board?—Yes, they have full power of issuing money without account; I do not imagine that that power is limited, except by Act of Parliament, in any way.

4247. What is the meaning of a covering warrant?—(Mr. Macaulay.) Perhaps the honourable Chairman is referring to the Royal Sign Manual Warrant; that would cover many things which a Treasury warrant could not reach. (Mr. Romilly.) I think it means merely a warrant to authorise the expenditure; to cover the expenditure; covering all the items contained in a particular list.

4248. It is not a word that is properly used?—It is not used in any technical sense.

4249. At present you audit all the revenue accounts?—Yes.

4250. If the Committee want any information with regard to the revenue accounts, and the mode of auditing them, probably the inspector would be the

E. Romilly, Esq., and C. Macaulay, Esq.

14 July 1856.

the proper person to call?—He would probably be able to give the Committee more accurate information upon the subject than I could.

4251. As to the Miscellaneous Estimates, can you state in what way they came to be audited by you; those that you do audit; are they audited in the Paymaster's accounts only, or do you audit the accounts themselves?—With respect to the list I have put in the accounts themselves are audited, independently of the Paymaster-general's account, he being merely the banker, who, among his payments, makes issues to be accounted for by others.

4252. Did you audit the Duke of Wellington's funeral account?—No. Payments would, however, be made on account of the Duke of Wellington's funeral in the Paymaster-general's account.

4253. In auditing the Paymaster-general's account do you look at all to the dates of the monies issued, the credits, and the payments?—No, certainly not. We should not examine the issues and expenditure on account of the Duke of Wellington's funeral with reference to the vote for that service.

4254. It appears from the evidence we have before us, with reference to large sums issued for the Duke of Wellington's funeral, that payments for some time were not at all equal to the amount drawn; would that in any shape come before you?—In no shape whatever, that I am aware of. We should not know the amount standing at any particular date to the credit of the Paymaster-General on account of that service; nor, if we did, should we remark upon it.

4255. You would not in any way, then, check the sum that was issued to the Paymaster for the Duke of Wellington's funeral?—No; in no other way than this. We should ascertain that the Paymaster had duly charged himself with this sum, as with all other sums issued to him from the Exchequer, as shown by the statements of the Comptroller. We should also see in the Paymaster-general's account that payments taken credit for on account of the Duke of Wellington's funeral, were made on a proper authority from the Treasury, and that there was a proper receipt which showed that that authority had been duly carried into effect. We should be satisfied with this.

4256. You would not ascertain what had become of the remainder of the money in any shape, or would you ascertain that?—No; they would be simple sums brought to credit and payments taken credit for by the Paymaster in his general account; we should not keep a separate account at all in respect of the expenses of the Duke of Wellington's funeral.

4257. How would you ascertain, that 80,000*l.* having been drawn for the Duke of Wellington's funeral, and about 40,000*l.* having been spent, that the Paymaster had that 40,000*l.* still remaining in his hands?—We should simply see that the gross balance at the end and termination of his general account was the proper balance.

4258. And looking into the particular balance of the Duke of Wellington's funeral?—Certainly not; no account would be rendered to us of that expenditure.

4259. In these payments, what do you take as a good authority; do you enter into an inquiry whether the authority has the power of issuing those orders, or do you merely take the authority of the Treasury, or the different departments?—With respect to the Paymaster-general's account, we should consider the Paymaster as an officer subordinate to the Treasury; and if the Treasury gave the Paymaster-general directions to make a payment, and he made that payment in accordance with that authority, he would be entirely exonerated, and we should give him credit for the sum paid under that authority.

4260. Without entering into the question of whether the Treasury was the proper authority, or whether it had given the proper order?—Without questioning whether the authority issued by the Treasury was a proper authority for the Treasury to issue.

4261. Would you consider that any order from the Treasury was a sufficient authority for the Paymaster to proceed upon?—If we saw that authority had been given by the Treasury, which we conceived to be contrary to any Act of Parliament, or our attention was drawn to it with that view, we should point out to the Treasury that such was the case. We should certainly give the Paymaster credit for the sum he had taken credit for under that authority.

4262. I will put to you the case of one of the departments paying in to the Paymaster old store money, and that that properly would have to be paid into into the Exchequer; supposing that was not paid into the Exchequer, but by an order of some department, say the Treasury, it was applied to any other service, would you think it your duty in that case, at the Audit Board, to object to that payment?—I think we should question it. If the Admiralty had given an order that a sum should be paid into the Exchequer, and it was not so paid into the Exchequer, although owing to an order of the Treasury, I think we should question it.

4263. In what way would you question it?—We should point out that the Admiralty having given that order, it had not been carried into effect.

4264. But supposing an order had been given by the Treasury to pay this money not in the proper direction, how would you represent it to the Treasury, or to whom or in what way would your objection be made?—I think we should report the circumstance to the Treasury, and submit to them that this order appeared to us to be an inadvertence.

4265. That they had issued an order inadvertently?—That the Admiralty having given that order to pay money into the Exchequer, and it having been stopped by the Treasury, I should think we should point it out to them. It is a hypothetical case, and it is very difficult to say how we should act. It is a case which is not likely to occur.

4266. How do you ascertain that monies received by the Paymaster on account of payments of that kind are paid into the Exchequer?—The Paymaster-general takes credit for all the payments into the Exchequer by order of the Admiralty, or otherwise, and we receive from the Exchequer certificates of the sums the Comptroller has received.

4267. Do you compare them in your office?—I cannot say that the list of sums stated to have been paid into the Exchequer, and appended to the Admiralty accounts laid before Parliament, is compared with the Exchequer certificates sent to our office. I believe they are not. The appropriation inspector has a knowledge of the payments which are made on the Admiralty account, from a list of the payments received by the Admiralty from the Paymaster-general; and on that statement from the Paymaster-general (viz., of Admiralty bills returned as paid) he certifies that the payments have been made into the Exchequer. The actual receipts in support of those payments made into the Exchequer would appear, not with the Admiralty accounts, but in the Paymaster's account; and in the examination of the Paymaster's account, we should see that all payments made into the Exchequer had been made on a proper authority. I do not, however, conceive that a comparison is made between the two accounts.

4268. Do you check at all the dates of the order, or of the receipt in the Paymaster's office, and the date of the payment into the Exchequer?—I think not.

4269. For instance, suppose the sum of 10,000 l. were received at the beginning of the month, and not paid in till the end of the month; would that be observed upon in your department, or would it be sufficient if the money was paid in at the end of the month?—I do not think that would be observed upon in our department; but if, in examining the Paymaster's account, we observed any great discrepancy between the date of the order to pay and the date of the payment actually made, the Paymaster-general would be called upon for explanation.

4270. Your accounts come monthly, do they not?—The great majority of them come monthly; an alteration of that kind was made in 1848.

4271. Before that it was quarterly, was it not?—Annually: almost all the accounts that come by Act of Parliament come to us annually. The Paymaster's account comes monthly.

4272. And that used to come quarterly?—Yes, it did.

4273. Do you exercise in the Pay-office any check as to the appropriation. There appears in the account before the Committee, that sums have been spent for Labuan without any authority from Parliament. Would that be a subject of observation to you?—No, certainly not.

4274. You do not then compare the expenditure at all with the Votes of Parliament?—We do that only with respect to those services as to which we have been directed by Act of Parliament to do it.

4275. If you saw that there was the authority of the Treasury to make a payment for Labuan, that would be sufficient, and you would give the paymaster credit in his account for that expenditure?—Certainly.

4276. You have stated, have you not, that you do not audit the Civil

E. Romilly, Esq., and C. Macaulay, Esq.

14 July 1856.

Contingencies, except so far as they come before you in the paymaster's account?—Yes; yet there may be accounts which we do audit, a portion of the expenditure of which would fall on Civil Contingencies, but we do not audit Civil Contingencies as a separate account.

4277. With regard to the accounts of the Comptroller of the Exchequer, do you audit them at all?—No, we do not.

4278. Do you think that you ought to audit them?—I think that we ought.

4279. What part of his accounts ought you to audit?—I look upon the Comptroller of the Exchequer as an accountant. Public money is placed in his name; he gives a warrant for the issue of that money, and every warrant that he gives for the issue of that money seems to me to be a payment; and I think that, on those grounds, his accounts ought to be audited.

4280. Supposing there was a Treasury warrant which the Comptroller of the Exchequer had passed, how would you check it, or would you exercise authority to say that that was not a sufficient warrant?—I do not think that we should.

4281. It would be merely ascertaining whether there were sufficient warrants in point of number?—Just so. But there is another point of view in which it is important, as it seems to me, that those accounts should be audited, or at all events, that these should be sent to us with those accounts, the documents upon which the issues are founded. The Comptroller-general of the Exchequer sends us statements of the issues of money which are made with or without account. Now, the Comptroller-general has no power of issuing money with or without account, and his statement is therefore founded upon Treasury directions or upon Royal warrants, and we are satisfied with secondary evidence instead of having primary evidence. If the Treasury have got the power of issuing money without account, we ought to have that direction, as it seems to me, from the Treasury, not second-hand through the Comptroller of the Exchequer.

4282. As to the Comptroller-general of the Exchequer, everything in his office is by Act of Parliament a record, I believe; and therefore I suppose you could not have the actual record sent to you?—We might then have certified copies of them.

4283. You audit the accounts of the Woods and Forests and Works, by Act of Parliament, do you not?—Yes, we do.

4284. Did you audit them before the Act of Parliament, or to what audit were they submitted?—It was by the 10th of George the 4th that they came to the Audit Office originally.

4285. Since the passing of the Act which emanated, I think, from a Committee of the House of Commons, they have been audited by you entirely, have they not?—Exactly.

4286. They are so reported by you, and laid upon the Table of the House of Commons, are they not?—Yes, exactly; there is the appropriation audit as well as the ordinary audit to which they were subjected before the appropriation audit was directed.

4287. There is the audit and the appropriation report?—Yes. (Mr. Macaulay.) The account formerly came to the Audit-office under the 10th of George the 4th, c. 50, which abolished the auditors of the Land Revenue. Since that time they have been audited in detail by the Commissioners of Audit, until the 14th and 15th Vict., c. 42, was passed, which subjected those accounts not only to the detailed audit, but to the appropriation audit also.

4288. (To Mr. Romilly.) In what state are those accounts of the Woods and Forests now?—The accounts are laid before Parliament now annually; and I believe that they have always been laid before Parliament at the regular time.

4289. With regard to the account of the Woods and Forests, is that laid before Parliament this year?—The last year for which the account of the Woods and Forests has been laid before Parliament is for the year ending 31st of March 1855, which was laid before Parliament in March last.

4290. That is the regular time, is it not?—Yes.

4291. I see here "Commissioners of Her Majesty's Woods, Forests, Land Revenues, Works and Buildings. Usual period for which the account is rendered: Annually. To what date received in office: 9th October 1851. To what date examined: 9th October 1851. To what date finally audited: 31st of March 1848." And again, the Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues do not seem to have been finally audited since 1848?—That is the detailed audit of the accounts.

4292. And "Commissioners of Her Majesty's Works and Public Buildings." They do not seem to be finally audited; no particular date appears to be given given when they were finally audited; but they were only examined up to the 31st of August 1855?—The final audit of those accounts has been very much delayed, in consequence of the difficulty which we have had in getting what we consider to be proper authorities and vouchers in support of the expenditure of the accounts.

E. Romilly, Esq., and C. Macaulay, Esq.

14 July 1856.

4293. I see, in this Report, that you have made what you call a classified abstract of the account; that year after year there are complaints of your not being able to get the necessary authorities and the necessary information to enable you to frame your report; is that so?—There has often been very considerable difficulty in getting the necessary information.

4294. What means have you of obtaining the information, supposing the department, year after year, fails to give it to you?—We have power, no doubt, with respect to the ordinary accountants, of issuing our precept, and obliging them to come before us with the documents that we require.

4295. Have you represented to the Treasury that you have not been able to get those Returns?—We have, on several occasions.

4296. What steps have the Treasury taken upon that?—The Treasury, I believe, have referred our report to the department in question, with an injunction that they would use their best endeavours to give us those documents which we required.

4297. When was the date of the Act of Parliament which referred to you this classified account?—The 14th & 15th of Vict. c. 42.

4298. What year was that in?—In the year 1851.

4299. Since that time, have you each year pointed out the inconvenience that has arisen from not getting sufficient data?—Yes, on several occasions.

4300. And you have not received those data yet?—We have not got the whole of the documents that we require.

4301. Have the Treasury done anything that you are aware of besides referring your report to the department?—I am not aware of any particular steps which they may have taken.

4302. How many reports of yours have come in and been laid before Parliament?—I am unable to answer that question.

4303. There was some question in the course of the correspondence with regard to the examination of the accounts that had already been checked by professional officers; I think they were for buildings which professional officers had checked, the particulars of how much was done under the contract; as to those accounts, did you complain of not having received the proper information?—I am not sure whether I might be allowed to suggest to the Chairman of the Committee that as the inspector of those accounts happens to be present, I believe that he would give more accurate information than I could upon the subject of those accounts.

Henry Thomas Dundas Bathurst, Esq., called in; and Examined.

H. T. D. Bathurst, Esq.

4304. Chairman.] YOU inspect the accounts of the Woods, Forests, and Works?—Yes, I do.

4305. There is certain information which you have not received from the department which has been required by the Commissioners of Audit for several successive years; is not that so?—Yes; there is a great deal outstanding upon the old accounts, prior to those which come under my inspection.

4306. Of what nature is the information that you require?—Principally it consists in the want of authorities; in a great many cases of the actual want of the vouchers themselves, but principally the want of authorities.

4307. The want of authorities for what?—Treasury letters, directing them to make the expenditure in discharge of their accounts; the approval of salaries, or the authority of the Treasury for salaries paid by them, and for wages of persons employed.

4308. With regard to the vouchers, what is the nature of the vouchers in which you are deficient?—The bills of particulars containing the charges, and describing what the work is which has been performed, and in some cases the receipts are wanting.

4309. There has been a correspondence with the Treasury in which they state that they thought it was unnecessary to examine in the department certain work that had been already examined by the professional officer; does this relate to the same class of work?—Yes; that does in a more recent account since 1851.

4310. But not in the older accounts?—No.

H. T. D. Bathurst, Esq.

14 July 1856.

4311. Since 1851 (I am not speaking of the old accounts, but since the transfer), has there been a difficulty in getting information with regard to those accounts which are annually reported to Parliament?—Yes.

4313. Then, that want of information is a want of information during those years?—Yes.

4314. You have not been able to get that information?—No; that is the bills of particulars and contracts for works

4315. Of what nature is that information which you cannot get in those cases?—It is the bills of tradesmen, showing where the work had been performed; the actual bills themselves, stating what the work is, such as bricklayers' bills, joiners', upholsterers' bills, and those things which are supplied out of the grant of Parliament.

4316. Those are not furnished to you?—No.

4317. Mr. Williams.] What is the last year for which the accounts of the Woods and Forests have been finally audited?—The year ending the 31st of March 1848.

4318. And no year subsequently to that has been thoroughly examined?—Yes; they have all been examined; they have never been brought to audit, and the state prepared and signed by two Commissioners of the Board. The state of 1848-49 is now under consideration.

4319. The accounts that were presented to Parliament in the month of March last year, as well as of the former years, have not been audited by you?—No.

4320. Sir Henry Willoughby.] Therefore, in point of fact, the provisions of the 14th and 15th of Victoria have never been carried out?—So far as examining the accounts we have examined them completely, and put all the questions which arose out of them; but it has never happened yet that we have got the queries answered in time, when the account was laid before the House of Commons.

4321. There are seven years' accounts outstanding still without a complete audit?—Yes, there are; from 1848.

4322. The accounts are published annually, are they not?—Yes.

4323. In the last account there was an item for expenses incurred in the management of the Woods and Forests put under one sum of 49,000 l. odd; how would you proceed to audit that sum in relation to repairs and other charges?—In the Woods and Forests we have the vouchers, and we should have all the details of that sum where all those repairs were made, the bills of particulars, and receipts, and the Treasury authority for having incurred that expenditure.

4324. Have you in the Audit-office that sum in detail?—Yes; I do not recollect any sum in particular; but whatever sum there is, we have the detail of it.

4325. Do you find any difficulty in getting the proper vouchers?—Yes; there has not been so much latterly as there is relating to the old accounts.

4326. But the fact is, that there has been no complete and legal audit account of the Woods and Forests subsequently to 1848?—No; there has not been.

4327. Mr. Williams.] Are you aware upon what authority the Commissioners of Woods and Forests make those payments, of which they cannot furnish you with the vouchers?—The proper authority which they should produce is the Treasury authority; but these vouchers have been wanted, not from the Commissioners of Woods, but from the Commissioners of Works and Buildings as a separate Board.

4328. Are those payments that you refer to made by the Woods and Forests?—Yes; it is from the Commissioners of Works that we want the bills of particulars. From 1833 up to 1851, they were all one Board, called the Commissioners of Woods, Forests, Land Revenues, Works and Buildings; but by the 14th & 15th Vict., in 1851, they were separated, and from October 1851 to the present time, they have been two separate Boards: the one is the Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues; and the other is the Board of Works and Public Buildings.

4329. The Commissioners of Woods and Forests, if I understand you rightly, made payments from the year 1848 to 1851, of which they cannot furnish the Audit-office with vouchers?—Yes.

4330. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] You were asked a question as to the sum sum of 45,000 l., which consisted of charges upon the land revenue; had you any difficulty in auditing the items composing that charge, or were you aware of the exact meaning of the question. It had no reference to the Board of Works, but it referred exclusively to charges upon the land revenue?—Yes.

4331. Have you had any difficulty in auditing the charges upon the land revenue?—No.

4332. Have your difficulties been confined to charges incurred by the Board of Works, for works done under the direction of Government?—Yes.

4333. Mr. Wilson.] Is it not the case that from the nature of the works the officers of the Board themselves must necessarily examine those accounts in detail. Take, for example, brickwork; the officers must examine the quantity of brickwork done; the officers must measure it, and from that they must determine the amount to be paid; all those accounts are therefore, in that way, necessarily examined in detail in the department?—Yes; but I think that we should see those certificates, that they have examined them in detail.

4334. But that is the distinction in the Board of Works which does not apply in any other department, that those accounts are examined in detail within the department?—Yes.

4335. There would be no difficulty in seeing, as your officer in the War Department sees, the vouchers relating to those accounts?—No, I think there would be no difficulty if I saw them.

4336. That is the great distinction between the Board of Works now, as a separate department, and that portion of the Board which was conjoined in account when they were a joint department, which distinguishes it from all other departments which you have to audit?—Yes.

4337. Sir Henry Willoughby.] In auditing the accounts of the Woods and Forests the officers of the Audit-office exercise no judgment as to whether the charges are right or wrong?—No, provided they are authorised by the Treasury.

4338. What is it that you look to?—We look to see that the expenditure has been incurred under the Treasury authority; and that the Treasury have directed them to make the payment.

4339. When you say the Treasury authority, what do you mean by the Treasury authority?—They have always been in the habit of submitting their expenditure to the Treasury, and having it allowed by warrant; but those we have not had since the 1st of April 1849. The Board seem to have entertained the idea that what was paid out of the Estimates voted by Parliament, and entrusted to them, might be spent without going to the Treasury, but the Treasury decided that that was not the case.

4340. But, adhering to the department of the Woods and Forests, what is the Treasury authority for expenditure in that department?—A Treasury letter or warrant allowing the expenditure; and, with regard to the Woods and Forests, they submit estimates annually, which the Treasury authorise them to pay during the year.

4341. What do you mean by a Treasury letter?—A letter signed by one of the secretaries of the Treasury.

4342. In point of fact, a Treasury letter signed by one of the secretaries of the Treasury is the authority under which you pass the accounts of the Woods and Forests?—Yes, the detailed expenditure.

4343. Mr. Williams.] Are the Committee to understand you distinctly to say, that the accounts of the Woods and Forests annually presented to Parliament have not been audited?—No, they have not.

4344. Mr. Hankey.] You referred to the accounts of the Board of Works previously to 1851 as not having been completely audited for the want of certain vouchers; have you any reason to suppose that those vouchers will ever be forthcoming?—Yes, I think in a good many instances it is very likely that we shall have them.

4345. To what do you suppose the delay of six years can be owing in not producing the vouchers for which you have applied?—I have no reason to know.

4346. Have you any reason to suppose that those vouchers for which you have asked will ever be produced?—Yes, I think they may; it is probable that they may.

4347. The subsequent accounts to 1851 have not been produced to Parliament, as audited by the Audit Board?—No. The detailed audit has not taken place;

H. T. D. Bathurst, Esq.

24 July 1856.

place; but the audit comparison with the Votes has been made regularly every year within the limited time.

4348. Has the complete audit which would, under ordinary circumstances be made, been delayed in consequence of the want of vouchers in those previous years?—Yes, it has.

4349. Then has there been a delay in producing the accounts of the years 1850, 1851, 1852, 1853, and 1854, owing to the want of the production of vouchers merely relating to a time previous to 1851?—As to the want of bills and particulars of contracts, that goes on to the present time.

4350. In every subsequent year, from 1848, there is a deficiency of vouchers?—Yes, of those vouchers, in every year.

4351. And yet application has been made to the Treasury, to show that that deficiency exists, and that the account, therefore, cannot be finally audited?—Yes. I am speaking of the want of bills of particulars, where the Treasury have stated that they did not think that they should come to us, and that they concur in the opinion that the professional examination is sufficient.

4352. Have you reason to think that it is on a question of principle that the Treasury refuse?—As to those bills of particulars, I think it is the case.

4353. Chairman.] Have you compared the course which you pursue in auditing those accounts with the course that is pursued at the Ordnance and the Admiralty in auditing their accounts; they have the same question with regard to their works which you have at the Woods and Forests?—So far as the Audit-office has to deal with the navy, I believe the Admiralty themselves have all the bills. The Audit-office only compare the expenditure upon the examined vouchers with the vote. In the Woods Department we have to examine the vouchers themselves.

4354. Mr. Williams.] You have stated that the amounts of the Parliamentary Votes have been audited in the Woods and Forests Department?—In the Works Department. There is only a very small vote for the Woods; it is only their salaries.

4355. But a very large amount of the expenditure of the department of Woods and Forests takes place without the authority of Parliament, upon the responsibility of the Commissioners and the Treasury?—Yes.

4356. The items are not examined, if I understand you correctly, before the accounts are sent in to Parliament?—Yes, we examine the account in detail complete.

4357. But not before the accounts are presented to Parliament about the month of March?—Yes, we do; the accounts have been examined in detail complete; we have gone through every item charged, and seen whether there is a proper voucher for it, and whether the expenditure was duly authorised or not.

4358. I understand you now to say that the accounts of the Woods and Forests presented to Parliament have not been completely audited?—No; they have all been examined; we call them audited when the state is drawn up and laid before the Committee of the Board, and considered by them, and signed by two Commissioners of Audit; that is what we call the final audit.

4359. Chairman.] Are the Committee to understand that the Appropriation Accounts since the passing of the last Act, the Abstract Accounts, are delayed in consequence of the difficulty arising from not furnishing the vouchers for those works, and as to which the Treasury say it is unnecessary to have the vouchers, or is there other information which you have not been able to get?—The authorities are wanting throughout all that period, namely, the Treasury warrants approving of the expenditure; and we can hardly proceed to audit them, because of bringing forward the balances from year to year, and therefore, the earlier accounts not being audited, we cannot audit the later ones.

4360. But the Commissioners state that they are unable to perform their duty satisfactorily in consequence of the want of information?—Yes; that is so.

4361. Does that want of information apply only to the vouchers for those works, with regard to which the Treasury, upon principle, think that you should be satisfied with the vouchers of the department, or is there other information besides, which is not furnished?—It expressly related to a great number of queries which had been sent, calling for vouchers, a great number of which had not been replied to.

4362. Mr. James MacGregor.] Does that answer apply to other business than the Board of Works?—No; to the Board of Works, I think.

H. T. D. Bathurst, Esq.

14 July 1856.

4363. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Is there any difficulty as to the final audit of the last year's accounts of the Board of Works, or is the audit of the last year's kept open on account of the impossibility of closing the previous year's accounts?—They are kept open till the previous years are closed.

4364. Of course you cannot close the audit of the later years till you know what balance is to be brought forward?—No.

4365. If you knew what balance was to be brought forward, could you close the audit of the later years?—Yes; I think we could.

E. Romilly, Esq., and C. Macaulay, Esq.

4366. Chairman.] (To Mr. Romilly.) What power have you to compel the accountant to give in his information?—We have the power of calling the accountant before us by precept; we have the power then of swearing him, and of getting information from him in that way. The mere fact of the accountant being put to the expense of travelling, sometimes a considerable distance, for that purpose, is found in most cases to be sufficient to produce its effect; we get the account after we issue our precept.

4367. Is it practically with regard to ministers a power of the slightest value, or one that can be used?—It is not one that can be used as to the great departments; to call the Commissioners of Woods and Forests before us is a course which could not practically be taken, and therefore the remedy which we apply in such cases, is that of reporting to the Treasury on the subject, and getting such assistance as they can afford us.

4368. Supposing an accountant finally does not furnish his account at all, what is your sole remedy in that case?—We have a power by which we can apply to the Court of Exchequer. There is a clause in one of our Acts, viz., 1 & 2 Geo. 4, c. 121, s. 26, which states, "That if any person or persons whatever, who shall be required by the said Commissioners for auditing the Public Accounts, or the Commissioners of Colonial Audit, to attend them for the purpose of being examined upon oath, or who shall be required to produce any accounts, books, returns, vouchers, or other papers and documents relating to any public accounts, before the said Commissioners respectively for examination, shall fail to comply with the lawful requisitions of the said respective Commissioners, every such person so refusing shall be liable to the payment of such fine to His Majesty as the Court of Exchequer, on application made to the said court by the said respective Commissioners, or by His Majesty's Attorney general, shall think fit to set and impose; which fine the said court is hereby authorised and empowered to set and impose accordingly." Though that power is given to us, it is one which may be said not to have been exercised for a great number of years.

4369. Can you suggest to the Committee a mode with respect to accounts of this kind, where there has been a delay, which would be more effectual than the remedies which seem to be in your power now?—I have a strong opinion that it may be done by the very simplest process, which is somewhat similar to that adopted in France, where an accountant is liable to a fine of from 50 to 500 francs for every month's delay in returning his accounts. I believe that if that fine was imposed upon accountants, it would effectually check the delay in rendering accounts to us.

4370. Do you think that such a remedy would have any effect upon a Minister; say the First Lord of the Admiralty?—I was speaking rather of the ordinary accountants that we have to deal with, than of any very high functionaries.

4371. I want to ascertain how you would catch the great fish, not the small ones. Is there any means that you could suggest by which an office like the Woods and Forests should be brought before the public, or any other way, in order to bring the accounts right?—I think that there is only one remedy, and that is publicity; reporting to Parliament every year is the only way to set matters right.

4372. How many years have you reported to Parliament now that you have not obtained the necessary information to enable you to do your duty satisfactorily?—I think that is producing its effect. We are getting the accounts and documents much more regularly now than formerly.

4373. How long has that been so; since the appointment of this Committee?—There was a Report which the Audit Board sent on the subject of the last Report of the Woods and Forests, which has been laid before Parliament, of 3d March 1856. That Report of the Woods and Forests was not sent to us until the 7th; it came to us by a Treasury letter of the 5th; the Report itself was laid upon the Table of the House and ordered to be printed on the 4th; and in answer to that Report, for we thought it necessary to answer it, we state at the end of the Report: "As, however, it now appears that the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Woods and Forests entirely concur with us as to the expediency of a regular transmission of monthly accounts, and have, as they state, already shown evidence of the exertions they are making with that view, we trust that no further difficulty will arise; and care will be taken in our office that no delay occurs in transmitting future queries." That is dated the 15th of March last.

E. Romilly, Esq., and C. Macaulay, Esq.

14 July 1856.

4374. With regard to the appropriation audit, what do you consider the appropriation audit to be; is the duty of the auditors that of audit or is it the duty merely of seeing that the sums are posted under the proper heads of the Votes?—It is to see that the sums are posted under the proper heads of the Votes.

4375. So far as the audit goes, they are not auditors?—No, not of those accounts; that is to say, of the Army and Navy accounts; but as to the Woods, Forests, and Works, they are the auditors of those accounts.

4376. As well as the reporters upon them?—Yes.

4377. With regard to the War accounts, the audit of the greater part of the War accounts is transferred now from the auditors to the War department itself, is it not?—Yes.

4378. Will you state what are those that have been transferred?—The Commissariat accounts have been transferred; I mean by that the expenditure on account of the Commissariat vote; that has been transferred to the War department ever since the War department took that vote. Formerly that vote was taken by the Treasury; it is now taken by the War department; and that latter department now undertakes the detailed examination of that expenditure.

4379. Is there any other part of the army expenditure which, previously to the consolidation of the departments, was audited by the auditors, and which is now audited by the War department?—There are also the effectives and non-effectives of the army.

4380. The non-effectives were audited completely at the Audit Board?—Yes, they were; we saw all the final vouchers; the Paymaster made the payments on account of the non-effectives of the army; and the audit of them in his account was a complete and final audit.

4381. That is now tranferred to the War-office, is it not?—Yes, it is. Orders have been given to that effect; but it is not finally decided what is the document upon which we can pass that expenditure in the Pasmaster-general's account. We entertain doubts how far it will be in our power to pass in the Paymaster-general's account the payments which he makes on account of that expenditure upon certain certificates proposed by the Secretary of State for War, and whether we should not require the actual vouchers.

4382. As to the effectives of the army, what change has taken place with regard to them?—Formerly the Paymaster-general received from the War department an order to make a payment on account to the colonel of a regiment or an army agent, and so on. That payment so made to the colonel of the regiment, or to the army agent, was to enable him to make detailed payments out of that sum he had so received, and the Paymaster-general sent to our office the receipt of the colonel, or of the agent to whom he had made that payment. Therefore, so far as the Paymaster-general's account was concerned he was fully entitled to credit for all those sums which he had so paid, and those vouchers were proper vouchers, upon which we could pass the amounts in the examination and audit of his accounts; but the payments so made were in the nature of imprests, and the detailed examination of those imprests was always conducted by the War department, they being the only persons who were supposed competent to examine accounts of that description. In future, it is proposed we should not have those orders given by the War department to the Paymaster-general, or the vouchers showing that those orders have been complied with; but that we should receive instead a certificate from the Secretary of State for War, stating that payments to such an amount have been made on account of the effectives of the Army, the result of which will undoubtedly be to make the Secretary of State for War the auditor of that portion of the account of the Paymaster-general, because the proper vouchers will not be sent to us. How far it may be in our power to admit those vouchers is a question.

4383. With

4383. With regard to the Ordnance, can you state to the Committee what change has taken place as to that expenditure?—The same as with respect to the Army.

4384. Did you audit the non-effectives of the Ordnance?—Yes; we did.

4385. With regard to the transfer of the audit to the War department, will you state to the Committee whether you consider that the audit of the department is effective, so far as regards the Treasury directions. Do you consider that the regulations sanctioned by the Treasury can be carried into effect now as they were before, with respect to the Commissariat vote?—The whole of the expenditure under the Commissariat vote was conducted under the Commissariat regulations which were drawn up by the Audit-office and the Treasury, and issued under the authority of the Treasury. The Secretary of State for War, I apprehend, may, if he thinks fit, adopt those regulations and carry them into effect himself, but I imagine that they would have to be issued on his own authority. As he takes the vote for the Commissariat service, he would have to deal with that vote in the same way as he deals with any other vote that he takes, and the detailed audit of that account would be accordingly left with him.

4386. With regard to the non-effectives, I apprehend that no change in the regulations for half-pay can be made, except with the concurrence and sanction of the Treasury?—The whole of the non-effectives, I think, depend upon Royal warrants. We have lists of the names and amounts payable to the persons entitled, and we always were in the habit of checking the payments with those Royal warrants, countersigned by the Treasury.

4387. No Royal warrants could issue as to expenditure from the Royal office in olden times without the sanction of the Treasury; is that so now?—I thinkthat those Royal warrants are now countersigned by the Secretary of State for War.

4388. In your paper which has been published, the Commissariat Paper, I see that you state, secondly, "I do not well see by what means the audit can maintain a check over the observance of established regulations;" what is the alteration that you think would be occasioned by that change?—Although I have no reason to doubt the opinions generally there expressed, I ought to state that that paper was published without my knowledge at the time, and there are some observations in it which I might wish to correct.

4389. You state, "With respect to the passage marked A., I do not well see by what means the Audit-office can maintain a check over the observance of established regulations, except by an examination of the vouchers in detail. To do this in the case of rules emanating from the Secretary of State for War seems idle. He can do it better himself by officers of his own. In all cases, however, in which the rules emanate from or are sanctioned by the Treasury, I see the importance of a body independent of the War department ascertaining for the Treasury that their rules have been duly observed"?—It seems to me that all expenditure of that kind is conducted either under rules which emanate from the head of the office itself, or under rules which emanate from the Treasury or under Orders in Council or Acts of Parliament. It seems to me unnecessary that there should be any independent audit with respect to that portion of the expenditure which depends entirely upon rules which emanate from the head of the department; he can do that much better himself by his own officers; since the rules which he himself has established he can at any time abrogate, and it would be useless to point out to the Secretary of State for War, for instance, that he had set aside rules which he had the power to set aside. With respect, however, to all that portion of the expenditure which depends upon Orders in Council, Treasury warrants, or Acts of Parliament, there it seems to me that the Secretaries of State or high functionaries are in the place of trustees, and that it would be very desirable that there should be an independent audit with respect to that portion of the expenditure; how far that can be practically carried into effect I am not quite prepared to state, but it seems to me that it would not be a matter of very great difficulty that, in all cases in which any Order in Council, or any Treasury warrant, or Act of Parliament had been deviated from, the observation that they had been so infringed should be laid before an officer from an independent Board. I think that it would be desirable that some such principle as that should be adopted.

4390. Is it done now with regard to the navy; does the officer who checks the appropriation audit enter into a consideration whether the orders and regulations of the Treasury have been strictly obeyed?—Certainly not.

4391. Do you think he could do it without interfering with the authority of the department?—I apprehend that if any order for payment is sent down to the proper officers of those departments, the Accountant-general's, for instance, and that it appeared to him that the order given was one which was contrary to any superior authority, it would be his duty to point that out to the head of his own department. But he might, notwithstanding, be directed by the heads of his department to make the payment, they taking upon themselves the responsibility of the infringement of the rule. Nevertheless the body from whom that rule emanated, whether it be the Treasury, the Council, or Parliament, ought not to be kept in ignorance of its own rule having been infringed; and to prevent this, I think it desirable that when the subordinate officer points out to the head of his department the objection to which the order is liable, it should also be part of his duty to send a copy of such objection to the officer of an independent Audit Board, or that the books in which such objections may have been recorded should be open to the inspection of the officer of the Audit Board; and if it were then their duty simply to make known the fact to those whom it concerned, I think there would be no interference with the authority of the department. It is idle to lay down rules without providing for their enforcement, and there can be no real responsibility without publicity; and the question involved would be one affecting rather the legality than the propriety of the order.

4392. I apprehend that the mode in which it would be done would be this, that the department would not grossly violate the order, but consider it in a lax way, and slightly relax the order from time to time, till ultimately it became quite a different order from what had been originally sanctioned by the Treasury; do you think, unless there is a final audit, it could be possible to check by an appropriation audit?—No, certainly not.

4393. It would entirely depend upon the good faith of the department itself?—Entirely; we take the audit of the accounts in those departments upon their authority alone.

4394. It has been proposed to alter the mode of voting the money for the Miscellaneous Estimates and those estimates which are now voted loosely, and introducing a system first of accounts as they are in the navy, and voting for the payments within the year, and closing them at the end of the year, and then not altering the audit, but having a similar report to that which you have or ought to have from the Woods and Forests annually, an appropriation report; do you see that there would be any objection to that, not only as to miscellaneous votes, but the Civil Service expenditure?—I think it would be a very great advantage and a very great improvement. I certainly do not see why a different rule should be laid down as to the army and navy and the great services from that which is adopted as to the Miscellaneous Estimates.

4395. You see no difficulty in it?—None.

4396. It has been suggested that it should be done by one of your officers being at the Treasury and checking the expenditure; have you so far considered the mode of doing it as to be able to give an opinion upon that point?—I think that that would not be a desirable mode of doing it.

4397. Why?—Because I think if a subordinate officer from a subordinate office were placed at the Treasury for such a purpose, it would be a system that could hardly command confidence, and would not be entitled to it.

4398. In point of fact, is there not considerable difficulty in an independent Board like yours checking the great public departments?—Very great difficulty. We have had little difficulty in performing the duty we have been called upon to perform by Parliament with respect to the Army and Navy, but if other great duties, such as that of checking the Treasury, were imposed upon us, the difficulty would be very considerable. In the case of the Army and Navy accounts there is an appeal to the superior authority of the Treasury; and the Treasury themselves are invested by the provisions of the 9th & 10th Vict. with full powers of deciding on any disputed points; and also of themselves laying before Parliament the account examined by us. The Audit-office inspector of those accounts has also been appointed by them. The check, therefore, is one over which the Treasury have full control; and in the success of which they are greatly greatly interested. But the case would be very different if the check were to be exercised, not by, or on behalf of, the Treasury, but over them.

4399. If you are the only check to all the public offices, can you point out any way by which you think we could strengthen your hands to enable you to give a firmer resistance to the pressure from without?—I think, if you made us thoroughly independent, and officers to report directly to Parliament, that, in itself, would produce a great effect. If, however, the auditors are to be in any degree an efficient check upon the Treasury, it is essential that the accounts to be checked should be sent to their office, and that the examination should be carried on under their own roof. There is always a risk in checking the accounts of any department by officers placed in that department, that these officers will become part and parcel of that department—be more influenced by the views and feelings of that department than by those of the office to which they belong; and that, instead so much of checking, they will often be advising and carrying on the work of the department in which they are placed. This danger is increased very materially when the department in question is the highest in the State, and has the greater amount of the patronage of the country at its disposal. In order, therefore, to prevent this check from either degenerating into an idle form, and becoming a mere delusion, or giving rise to interminable difficulties, I think it essential with respect to the Treasury that the necessary returns and accounts should be periodically sent to the Audit-office, and that the auditors should be invested with a power of local inspection. With a view, also, of ensuring that independence to which I have referred, the Commissioners of Audit ought to have the power of appointing from among their own officers, and changing as often as they think fit, the inspectors of these appropriation audits. They ought also to have the power, if not of appointing, at least that of dismissing any of their other officers, without appeal to the Treasury, or to any political body. The salaries of the subordinate officers of the establishment, which have lately been made subject to the annual votes of Parliament, should be paid out of the Consolidated Fund, as they were formerly, by the fifth section of 25 Geo. 3, c. 52. The efficiency of the check would depend upon the adoption of these principles, and upon the Commissioners of Audit having the power of reporting directly to Parliament whenever they thought it necessary to do so. This is the great safeguard.

4400. I understood that you reported directly to Parliament; the appropriation reports are reports to Parliament, are they not, and do they not go direct to Parliament?—No, not from our Board direct to Parliament. By the 9th and 10th Victoria they go through the Treasury. I have always thought that that alteration in the Act was not one for the better. By Sir James Graham's Act the navy accounts were formerly laid before Parliament direct by the auditors. Now they are sent to Parliament through the Treasury, that is to say, they are laid by the Treasury before Parliament. The Treasury by that Act have also the power of sending back the accounts to be amended if they think fit, or of deciding in what way any irregularity or anything that may be wrong in the accounts is to be presented to Parliament. The mere drawing of an Act in those terms necessarily places the Audit-office in a position more subordinate to the Treasury than they were formerly, when they reported direct to Parliament.

4401. Do you know at all what the object of the alteration in that Act was?—I am not aware what the ground of it was.

4402. Have the Treasury exercised lately more power over, and interfered more with the Admiralty Board than was the habit before?—No, I think not.

4403. Have they not interfered so much?—I think not. With respect to the very great power which is given to them, of ordering the accounts in question to be returned for amendment, it may be said that it has never been exercised. The Treasury have asked our opinion on one occasion whether the account should not be returned. They have not ordered the account to be returned without asking our opinion upon the subject.

4404. Have they withdrawn the accounts more than they used to do, or the contrary; or do they give you the same information that they used to do; or have they been withdrawing from you the information that they were accustomed to give you, or have they been diminishing your functions?—No, I think not.

4405. With regard to the check upon the departments as to paying, have you the same check that you used to have?—There has no doubt been a considerable change as to the mode of paying salaries of departments. Formerly the salaries were paid by issues being made to some officer in each department, and he having received an imprest in order to make those payments, necessarily became the accountant to us for those payments which he had made, and had to produce vouchers for them. The practice now is, that the Paymaster-general pays upon the orders issued by the heads of the departments; and the effect of that is, that in auditing the Paymaster-general's account, he produces the order of the particular department to pay a certain number of persons, whose names are set forth, with the amounts payable to each; and having paid those persons, and produced their receipts, he is, of course, entitled to credit for those payments, but non constat, that the orders which are given by the officer of the department, who draws out that list, may be all in accordance with the Treasury directions; and as that officer considers that he has neither received or paid public money, he often demurs to being made a public accountant; but as we are aware that that is the important part of the account, we have persisted in calling upon the officers who gave those orders to render us accounts, or to insert in their accounts the amount of those cheques—for they are nothing else—which they draw upon the Paymaster-general; and we have to look to the Paymaster-general's accounts in order to find the receipts applicable to each of the payments so ordered.

E. Romilly, Esq. and C. Macaulay, Esq.

14 July 1856.

4406. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] To revert to the question, as to the Navy and Army, and Miscellaneous Estimates, the rule with regard to the Army and Navy Estimates is, that the account is closed at the end of each financial year, but the rule as to the Miscellaneous Estimates is, that the account is not closed?—Yes.

4407. You stated that you saw no reason why a similar rule should not be applied to both sets of services. Is there not this difference between the two, that with regard to the army and navy, the vote is taken every year, and therefore there is a power of closing the account without difficulty for each year; but that as to many of the Miscellaneous Estimates, a single vote is taken in one year, and no similar vote is taken in the subsequent year, unless a necessity should arise. Does it not occur to you that in cases of a specific vote of that sort some inconvenience might arise from the application of the same rule to Miscellaneous Services?—It is possible that it might be so; but what I intended to state was, that if Parliament gives particular directions, they ought to see, or to have some independent body to inform them whether those particular directions have been carried into effect. I think that that principle is just as applicable to the miscellaneous votes as it is to votes for the army and navy.

4408. There is no doubt that the principle is a sound one, and ought as far as possible to be applied, and it could be applied without inconvenience to those votes for miscellaneous services which are taken every year; for instance, the votes for the salaries of the departments, which occur annually; but take the case of a vote for a harbour, or a vote for a building, which is taken once for all, and will not recur; would there not be a certain inconvenience in closing the account at the end of a year, and thereby establishing the necessity of coming to Parliament again in the subsequent year or in subsequent years for fragments of the expenditure?—I think there might be some difficulty if the whole expenditure were not confined to payments which come in the course of the year.

4409. Suppose that the sum of 10,000 l. is voted this year for building a pier, and assume that of that 10,000 l. 6,000 l. is in fact only expended; in that case it would be necessary to go to Parliament again for a vote of 4,000 l. next year, thereby voting the same sum twice over?—Yes, no doubt.

4410. If the account were closed at the end of the year that would be so?—Yes.

4411. Then supposing that in the second year the whole of that 4,000 l. were not expended, it would be necessary to go to Parliament again a third time for a vote of 1,500 l. or 2,000 l., thereby voting a proportion of the money three times over; would not that be the effect?—Yes; no doubt you might have a vote taken for such a purpose as that by the House of Commons, and then a portion of it only having been expended at the end of the year Parliament possibly might doubt whether they would go on with it; it would be a reconsideration of the question.

4412. Does it not appear to you that there is a difference between the question of of votes for the army and navy, or the salaries of the departments, and the votes that are taken once for all?—I believe the same thing takes place as to the Ordnance votes.

4413. Mr. Williams.] There is a certain portion of the votes for the army and navy, I believe, which are not expended in the course of the year, and the balance is paid back into the Exchequer, is it not?—Yes.

4414. Do you see any difficulty in the case referred to by the Chancellor of the Exchequer of a vote for any public work, for instance, a harbour; supposing only 6,000 l. out of 10,000 l. were expended, that the 4,000 l. should be paid back to the Treasury, and a new vote taken?—I see no difficulty in it.

4415. It would not be, in point of fact, voting the same sum over again, for all that you want is 10,000 l. for a harbour; and for many of those public works an estimate is given of the entire cost, and so much is required as is supposed to be necessary for the expenditure of one year?—Yes.

4416. And they come again next year for another vote?—Yes.

4417. Under these circumstances, do you see any difficulty in following out the same principle as to those votes, as with regard to the army and navy paying the balance into the Exchequer, and taking a new vote?—I do not think that there is any difficulty in it.

4418. Mr. Hankey.] Would it not lead to very great practical inconvenience; the work going on; payments being made from week to week, and only a portion of the contemplated work being finished at the close of the financial year, to repay that money into the Exchequer again, and bring the same question forward by estimates during the ensuing year?—It is the same thing which is done as to the army, navy, and ordnance now.

4419. Mr. Wilson.] There would be no difficulty if the miscellaneous estimates were voted before the close of the financial year?—No doubt; that is the essential point.

4420. With regard to the army and navy, you could not conduct those great services unless you had the votes before the 31st of March?—Certainly not.

4421. If the miscellaneous votes were to be voted after the 31st of March down to July, works of the kind alluded to would then stand still?—Yes.

4422. Unless some provision were made for a temporary advance?—Yes.

4423. Mr. Williams.] The army, navy, and ordnance accounts are audited in the office of those departments, are they not?—Yes.

4424. You stated, did you not, that the clerks are appointed by your department, and that the inspectors are appointed by the Treasury, and the audit is to take place in the department?—The detailed audit of those accounts takes place in those departments by the officers belonging to those departments, and not by officers belonging to the Audit-office at all. The duty which the latter perform in those departments is the comparison between the votes and the expenditure on account of those votes; and that duty is performed by the inspector, who is one inspector over the two departments, with subordinate officers under him, one in each department.

4425. Then, in point of fact, the Audit Department do not audit those accounts of the War Department?—Certainly not.

4426. They are audited by their own clerks?—Yes.

4427. Mr. Hankey.] Are these inspectors not appointed by your office?—We have an inspector, not appointed by our office, and three clerks under that inspector who are, and who superintend the comparison between the expenditure and the Votes of Parliament; they are our own officers, but no portion of their duty consists of finally auditing the expenditure of those great departments.

4428. Mr. Williams.] Would it not be a much more efficient audit if the accounts of those departments were audited by the officers of the Audit Department?—It might be a more efficient audit.

4429. Do you see any difficulty in getting those accounts audited by officers of your department?—It would occasion delay, I think.

4430. It has been stated to the Committee, that one of the grounds of objection would be the interference with the books; do you think there would be any difficulty in getting the books so arranged as to come within a near calculation of what would be required for any given period, say one, two, or three months, so as to send the books and the vouchers to the Audit-office, there to be examined?—If the accounts and vouchers were sent to the Audit-office to be examined, I think it would occasion very much greater delay than exists at present.

E. Romilly, Esq. and C. Macaulay, Esq.

present. You might have, no doubt, a more perfect check than there is now; but if the check were made as perfect as it is possible for a check to be, I think it could not be attained without expenditure of time and money. According to the French system, it is only three years after the expenditure that they can check their accounts. Now the army, navy, and ordnance accounts are checked in this country at a much earlier period, and are reported to Parliament within 10 months in the case of the navy and 15 months in the case of the army, after the expenditure has been incurred. In France it is only after three years that they are able to do that. The check may, however, be more perfect there.

4431. Do not you think that an efficient audit would compensate for any delay that may take place in order to accomplish it?—I think that as to all that portion of the account which involves expenditure incurred under the authority of the Secretary of State for War, for instance, he can carry on its examination and audit very much better by officers of his own than by other officers; and I do not see any great object in having an independent detailed audit for that portion of the account. But with respect to all that portion of the expenditure which depends upon rules laid down by some authority superior to his own, there I think it is a matter of importance that there should be an independent check.

4432. I understand you to state that the Audit department look into the expenditure of the specific votes for those services; I think for the navy last year there were 16 votes, and for the army 21; do you see that the amount of money expended upon each of those votes corresponds?—Yes; we see that the expenditure has been properly classed, but we do not see the final vouchers in all cases.

4433. Then in point of fact, you are not an effectual check even upon that class of expenditure?—We do not audit the accounts; we are not the auditors of the accounts in detail.

4434. Of either the army, or the navy, or the ordnance?—No, certainly not.

4435. You stated, that an Act was passed by Sir James Graham, which produced a more efficient system of checking the accounts?—Not that it produced a more efficient system of checking the accounts, but that it made the auditors more independent, or apparently more independent; it may be a matter rather of appearance than reality.

4436. Has that Act been repealed?—Another Act relating to the same subject has been passed. The Act passed in 1832, called Sir James Graham's Act, had reference only to the department of the navy. An Act was substituted for that in 1846, which contained not only the navy, but the military departments. But by the former Act, the Navy Act, the auditors themselves laid the accounts, which they checked, before Parliament; and by the subsequent Act, it is the Treasury that is to do it. The words of the Act passed in 1832 are, "And the account when so made up and attested shall be compared with the vouchers by the Commissioners for auditing the Public Accounts, who are hereby required, on or before the 31st day of January following, if Parliament be then sitting, and if not, then within one week after Parliament shall be assembled, to lay before the House of Commons a copy of the said account, certifying thereon as to the correctness of the said account with the vouchers."

4437. That is Sir James Graham's Act?—Yes.

4438. That has been repealed?—Just so. By the Act which is now in force, "after the accounts have been compared with the books and vouchers of the several departments, the Commissioners are required to transmit copies of the accounts so examined and certified to the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury." And in another place the Act says, that the accounts in question "together with the Reports of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury as aforesaid, shall be laid before the House of Commons by the said Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury on the days after mentioned, if Parliament be then sitting, or if not, then in each case within one week after Parliament shall be next assembled."

4439. You have stated, that in some cases the Treasury send back the accounts that you furnish them with to be amended?—I stated, that in one case the Treasury had asked our opinion upon the subject, and that the opinion which we expressed was not favourable to the accounts being sent back, and the accounts were not sent back. Some years ago, I believe there was a case in which they were sent back to correct some clerical error, which was very unimportant, and the accounts were sent back.

4440. In the first case to which you referred, did the Treasury lay the statement ment before Parliament in the way that you stated it, or in the way that they amended it themselves?—No, the account was not amended at all. This case has, in fact, reference to accounts now under consideration; and the correspondence will no doubt be laid before Parliament in due course. The other was a case which was perfectly immaterial, in which some clerical error had been made, and the form was gone through of sending the account back, and it was sent back by direction of the Treasury at the request of the department.

4441. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] With regard to the delays which are alleged to have taken place in the audit of certain accounts, can you state generally that the state of the audit now is as forward as it has been at any previous time?—I think that it is very much more so.

4442. With regard to the general state of the audit of public accounts, should you say that it is closer and in better condition than it has been in previous times?—Infinitely closer.

4443. Is the office of Public Works the only department in which any serious delay now exists?—There are some other accounts that are apparently very much in arrear, but the Committee ought to understand that, with respect to many of those accounts, which appear a great many years in arrear of audit, they are really not in arrear of efficient examination; but the reason that they have not been formally brought to audit is that it has been thought desirable to wait for certain documents. Very often there are only one or two outstanding questions, which have prevented the account from receiving the formal audit of account.

4444. You would say that generally since you have held your present office, the audit of the public accounts has never been in a more satisfactory state?—I do not think that the accounts have ever been so nearly up as they are at present. There is an arrear, but it is an arrear which I think will be before long overcome.

4445. With regard to the detailed audit of the Naval and Military Departments, is it not the fact that those accounts are the accounts of persons who are wholly unconnected with the departments, and with respect to whom the departments stand in as independent a position as the Board of Audit itself?—As to a portion of that expenditure, it is so no doubt.

4446. Take for example the Army Department: are not the accounts of the paymasters, and the accounts of the colonels of regiments, rendered by accountants wholly unconnected with the central office in which the examination takes place?—I imagine so.

4447. Does not a similar statement apply to the Admiralty?—I conclude that it does.

4448. Has it not been the invariable practice for the detailed investigation of the military and naval accounts to be conducted by the military and naval departments, and not by the Board of Audit?—Yes.

4449. If a change in that practice were now made, and if that detailed examination were transferred to the Board of Audit, would it not be necessary to break up the establishments of the War Department and the Admiralty, and to transfer a large portion of those establishments to the Audit Board?—I conclude that it would be so.

4450. Would not that imply a total change in the manner in which the expenditure for military and naval purposes has been hitherto controlled?—Certainly.

4451. Does it appear to you that, upon the whole, a more scrupulous examination of the accounts would compensate for the disadvantage of that examination being conducted by persons who would necessarily have a less special acquaintance with the subjects of the accounts?—I think there would be no adequate advantage in having an independent audit of that expenditure which is incurred entirely under rules which are framed and may be altered by the head of that department.

4452. Can you form any idea of what proportion of the expenditure comes within that description, and what proportion of the expenditure of the army and navy is incurred under general instructions from the Treasury or by Orders in Council?—I cannot answer that question; but I imagine that the establishments of those great departments are authorised by the Treasury; and it appears to me that the Treasury ought to have some knowledge of whether those establishments have have ever been exceeded or not, and that ought to be done by an independent body, and might be done with advantage.

E. Romilly, Esq., and C. Macaulay, Esq.

14 July 1856.

4453. (To Mr. Macaulay.) With regard to the existing rules for half-pay, do you not suppose that the officers at the War Department may be thoroughly relied upon for seeing that those rules are observed, or how is the audit of the non-effective service in the army now regulated?—That was done in detail by the Board of Audit; that is to say, till very recently. The Treasury have lately ordered the transfer of the examination of the non-effective services from the Audit Office to the War Department, but hitherto the detailed examination of that expenditure has been with the Audit Board.

4454. Does that apply to all pensions, as well as to all half-pay?—Yes.

4455. (To Mr. Romilly.) Would not that include a very large portion of the army expenditure, which is not within the power of alteration, which is lodged in the head of the department?—It is not in the power of alteration by the head of the department, but it depends upon certain Royal warrants, which have been always sent to the Audit-office, and the payments have been checked with those Royal warrants. The army non-effectives included in the Estimates for 1855-6 amount to 1,956,237 l. The effectives to 11,764,921 l.

4456. Mr. Wilson.] As to the functions of the Audit Board, do you not regard them as being Parliamentary functions, and that they are to see rather to the Parliamentary audit than to a separate and distinct examination of the accounts belonging to special expenditure, for which the heads of the departments are responsible?—The Audit-office has never considered that the functions which they had to perform had any connexion with Parliament till the Act of Sir James Graham was passed. Their duty, until that time, was confined to seeing that the persons to whom public money had been impressed accounted for it, and did not put it into their own pockets.

4457. One of the chief functions of the Audit Board now is to see to the Parliamentary appropriation of grants of money under Act of Parliament?—Yes.

4458. Is there not a great distinction between the auditing of accounts and the examination of accounts?—I cannot see the distinction; accounts are examined first, and having done that, the audit is merely a formal signature to the account, to say that it has been duly examined.

4459. Does not the audit consist rather of seeing that payments have been made under proper authority, and that the expenditure has been applied under the proper head; and that the intentions of Parliament have been carried out in respect to the public expenditure?—This is, no doubt, a correct description of what we term, appropriation audit.

4460. Would it be possible for the Audit Board to examine in detail all those accounts of the Army, Navy, and Ordnance, as to which alone the departments can make their rules and regulations, and the authority for which is derived exclusively from the heads of those departments; do you think it is possible for the Audit Board to conduct that examination with the same facility or convenience as the departments themselves?—No; I do not think they could do it with the same facility or convenience as the departments themselves.

4461. A hundred questions might arise in the minute examination of the accounts, as to the correctness of the accounts, say of inferior officers, and which alone the heads of the departments could properly judge of or determine?—If we had to examine or audit those accounts, we should do it by simply seeing whether we had got the proper authorities and vouchers; we should not go into the question whether the authority was a proper one to give; but whether it was signed by the person entitled to issue it.

4462. You could not go into that detail without interfering with the responsibility of the heads of the departments?—If we questioned the propriety of such orders, we should then interfere with the Executive, which I think would be very objectionable.

4463. When the Commissariat audit was removed from your Board, was it not simply the removal of the detailed examination of the accounts, similar to those details which had always been examined in the Naval and Military Departments?—They were the vouchers in respect to the expenditure, on account of a Vote which had been taken formerly by the Treasury, and we, as the Treasury auditors, were directed to examine those vouchers; but the moment that Vote was taken by the War Department, it followed the same rule as every other Vote taken by the War Department.

4464. With regard to the Commissariat expenditure, before the change was made you examined, on behalf of the Treasury, the accounts in detail, the same as the War Department and the Naval Department examined their own accounts in detail. You also conducted the appropriation audit of those accounts the same as you now conduct the appropriation audits of those other departments?—Yes.

4465. The change was this, that when the Commissariat expenditure was transferred to the War Department, it was only put upon the same footing as the whole of the rest of the army expenditure?—No doubt.

4466. With regard to the Commissariat vote now you have the same control, and you audit it in the same way with a concurrent audit in the department, as you do the whole of the rest of the military expenditure and there is no difference?—No; there is no difference.

4467. When you have appealed to the Treasury upon any difference arising between you and the other departments, have you usually found the Treasury disposed to support the authority of the Audit Board, or have they been more disposed to support the departments?—I think they have shown a disposition to support the Audit Board.

4468. You have been asked several questions to-day with regard to a supposed case; suppose the Navy were to direct the Paymaster-general to pay into the Exchequer a sum of 100,000*l.* for old stores, and suppose the Treasury, being aware of that fact, should violently lay their hands on the money in passing through the Paymaster's hands, and direct it to be assigned to some other purpose, would you not discover it immediately by finding that the Naval Department had in their accounts taken credit for that sum, for which no corresponding debit appeared in the Paymaster's accounts?—I suppose it would be discovered by the inspector of naval and military accounts. It should, however, be borne in mind that the system of appropriation audit is distinct altogether from the ordinary system of audit to which the Paymaster-general's account has always been subject; and there has been no connexion between the two.

4469. Have you a statement of the Paymaster's account sent to you once a month?—Yes.

4470. Would the statement of the Paymaster's accounts necessarily show the receipt, transfer, and credit on behalf of the Navy for the 100,000*l.* paid in for old stores?—Yes.

4471. And the Naval Department would take credit for that in their account?—Yes, no doubt.

4472. Therefore unless there was a corresponding debit, and unless it was paid into the Exchequer with a corresponding debit, you would immediately discover it?—Yes, on a comparison between the two accounts being made.

4473. In a very short time?—No doubt.

4474. Chairman.] How if the money was paid in to the Crown's Nominee Account. I see a sum of 33,525*l.* on the 31st of March 1856 to the Crown's Nominee Account; supposing that that sum, instead of being Admiralty money, had been transferred to any other account which the Treasury pleased, how would that have been discovered?—I do not suppose that we should have any check upon that.

4475. I believe the solicitor of the Treasury pays it in?—I suppose so.

4476. It would not be so rapidly discovered?—No.

4477. Mr. Wilson.] You would have no information of that account, should you?—I think not.

4478. Would you not find a receipt in the Paymaster's account of a sum of money which he had received under that head in the monthly account he rendered?—No doubt, if it is there.

4479. If you did not find a corresponding debit, would there not be that sum to be accounted for, if it did not appear?—He would merely bring that sum to account, but we should not see the corresponding account.

4480. If he did not pay it into the Exchequer, it would be so much more added to his balance?—Yes.

4481. Therefore the Paymaster-general must be accountable for it?—No doubt.

4482. If there was not a corresponding debit, there would be an increased balance?—Yes.

4483. Chairman.] But if there was an order from the Treasury to pay it into the Civil Contingencies, would you take that as satisfactory?—We do not examine the Paymaster-general's accounts as to particular heads of service; we examine it as we do any ordinary account, to see that he properly takes credit for the sums he is entitled to take credit for, and that the balance remaining at the end of his account is the correct balance.

E. Romilly, Esq., and C. Macaulay, Esq.

14 July 1856.

4484. Then you only see that there is 33,000 l. in hand; you do not see whether that is paid over to the Exchequer or not?—No; it is no part of our duty to see that it is paid into the Exchequer, unless it be so directed. If that sum were paid to the Paymaster-general with directions from the Treasury to pay it over to the Exchequer, we should ascertain that he had duly charged him with it, and that he had paid it over to the Exchequer.

4485. Mr. Wilson.] If anything is paid on behalf of any department whose accounts you audit, then you must discover it?—If the authority of that department were given that that money should be paid into the Exchequer, it would come into the Paymaster-general's account, and we should see that it was paid into the Exchequer.

4486. Therefore, in the monthly account you would discover it, if it was not paid into the Exchequer?—Yes; directly we see there is an authority to pay the money into the Exchequer, we should see that it was paid into the Exchequer.

4487. Chairman.] In the Admiralty, or in those great departments, they do not pay money, but they direct certain monies to be paid in; but where the actual money is paid in, you do not know by accident whether the order is to pay the money into the Exchequer?—I imagine that the order is to pay the money into the Exchequer, and that the Admiralty would have from the Paymaster-general a list of the payments that he had made on account of the Admiralty, and in that list would be inserted those sums which had been directed to be paid into the Exchequer; and then, on examination of the Paymaster-general's account, we should see the orders given by the Admiralty, and the receipts of the Exchequer showing that those orders had been duly carried into effect.

4488. In the case of the Admiralty and those departments, there is a specific order to pay from the monies issued from the Exchequer to the Paymaster-general for the naval services, and to repay into the Exchequer certain sums; but supposing, from the county courts fund or any other, the money was paid in, how would you know in that case?—In all cases where an accountant renders an account to us, and pays money into the Exchequer, we check that in the examination of the account; we check all our accounts with the Exchequer statements which are sent to us, and we should see at once whether money taken credit for as having been paid into the Exchequer had been paid into the Exchequer.

4489. Where you got the original account?—Yes.

4491. And to every other accountant the same observation would apply, would it not, that he could not pay money into the Paymaster's hands to pay to the Exchequer without taking credit for it in his account, and you would discover it?—Yes; just so.

4492. Chairman.] Take the case of a specific order, illegal if you like, given by the Treasury, with respect to any one sum of those monies, how would Parliament know it?—I imagine that it would only come before Parliament in those accounts as to which we report to Parliament.

4493. Do you report to Parliament the money paid for old stores?—Yes.

4494. That report states that it is paid in, does it?—Yes.

4495. You do not look at the time when it is paid in at all?—No.

4496. Mr. Wilson.] You have been asked how Parliament would become cognisant of that; would there not be a deficiency in the accounts of the department to whose credit it ought to be carried?—With respect to those reports which are reported to Parliament, undoubtedly.

4497. Therefore, unless it was paid into the Exchequer, the Admiralty accounts would be by that sum short?—Yes.

4498. You have been asked with regard to a change in the mode of paying salaries?—Yes.

4499. That arose entirely in consequence of the consolidation of the paymasters, did it not?—I am not aware whether it was in consequence of the consolidation of the paymasters, but it gave a facility for making payments in that way.

way.—(Mr. Macaulay.) I think it might be attributed more to the practice of paying so generally through the Paymaster's office instead of making imprests to the accountants of the several departments for the expenses of such departments.

4500. Sir Henry Willoughby.] Have you any Audit-office book, called a Query-book?—There is a Query-book or rather a journal, which is kept by each of the examiners of the accounts, and in that journal he notes down anything which he observes wrong in the account, and upon that the query is framed and recorded in the office.

4501. Would that book afford any information to the Committee?—It would as to the mode of transacting the business of the office, and especially as to any difficulties that may arise in the examination of the accounts.—(Mr. Macaulay.) There is no regular office book kept of queries that could be called a Query-book, but the examiner in charge of the account raises such queries as he thinks he ought to raise upon the account, and those queries are sent to the accountant to be answered. Of course all those queries which are sent by the inspector will form part of the records relating to that account, and are kept with it; but there is no distinct book belonging to the Audit-office embodying all the queries issued from the office to the different accountants.

4502. You have no book that will afford information to the Committee as to any difficulties which may have arisen in the office in carrying on the Audit?—(Mr. Romilly). No one book that we could lay before the Committee; the whole of the objections, which are, of course, very numerous, would afford the information.

4503. Chairman.] You could give the queries, for instance, on the Public Works' Account?—Yes, as to any particular account we could give all the queries respecting it.

4504. Sir Henry Willoughby.] With regard to the detailed account in the Army, Navy, and Ordnance departments, is that made by the clerks of the departments over whom you have any control, or no control?—It is made entirely by clerks over whom we have no control; the detailed examination we have nothing to do with.

4505. Therefore you know nothing about the detailed audit?—No, except that we see that it has been subjected to the proper audit.

4506. Then does it come to this, that that detailed audit is conducted by the department itself?—Yes.

4507. Then, in point of fact, do they not audit their own accounts?—The audit is done in the department itself, no doubt.

4508. Is that audit any check on the expenditure?—It is a check upon the sub-accountants of that department.

4509. Suppose anything goes wrong, who is to detect it?—The head of the check branch of the department; it would be his duty.—(Mr. Macaulay.) The Accountant-general of the Navy.

4510. What check is there on the Accountant-general himself?—(Mr. Romilly). The heads of the department, I suppose.

4511. It is quite clear that of that audit you are in no way cognisant at all?—We are not responsible for it in any way.

4512. Do you understand the details; are the details in anyway brought before you?—No, not of that detailed audit.

4513. Can you state roughly to what extent the expenditure goes?—It depends upon the votes.—(Mr. Macaulay). While it is true that the Audit-office enter, in no sense, into the detailed audit of that expenditure, as I understand it, the inspector, who is charged with the duty of the appropriation audit, examines the vouchers, with the view of seeing that they have been previously examined, that they bear about them the evidence of previous examination, and also, that the orders for payment are drawn in conformity with the Regulations of the Service.

4514. Assuming that the Army, Navy, and Ordnance votes were 35,000,000 l., would the detailed audit by the clerks of those departments extend to that amount?—(Mr. Romilly.) Yes, it would extend to the whole of the amount of the votes taken by those several departments.

4515. The detailed audit of the whole of that 35,000,000 l. would be by the clerks of the departments?—Yes.

E. Romilly, Esq., and C. Macaulay, Esq.

14 July 1856.

4516. And the officers of the Audit-office would in no way be concerned in that audit?—No.

4517. Mr. Wilson.] Would it not be the case, that a very great portion of those accounts would be examined away from London altogether; for example, take all the outside paymasters, the sub-paymasters all over the world; they must examine their accounts in detail from their immediate subordinates, and send home their accounts to the departments, examined in those details, upon their own responsibility?—They would examine those details in order to avoid objections that might otherwise be raised at home. They would all be subject to the check of the detailed audit in this country.

4518. Therefore, through every branch of those services, before they come to the head of the department, this detailed examination must take place?—The accounts would be prepared with the greater care, because subject to that subsequent check.

4519. It would be impossible, would it not, for the Audit Board to conduct such a detailed examination as this?—I do not see how they could do it with their present strength.

4520. Take an officer in an out-station, at Woolwich, or Plymouth, or Portsmouth; he is accountable to the head of the department for the money placed at his disposal, and he has all the interest that a man can have to see that that money has been properly expended, and that the accounts that he receives are accurate, has he not?—Yes.

4521. He immediately then has to account to the Accountant-general of the Navy?—Yes.

4522. It is equally to the interest of the Accountant-general of the Navy that he shall again examine the accounts sent from those intermediate accountants, and see that they are correct?—Yes.

4523. Therefore, in all those intermediate steps, there is always the interest of the immediate superior of the expending officer to see that those accounts are strictly accurate?—Yes; I imagine so.

4524. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.] When, for example the military expenditure in the Crimea is audited by the clerks in the War department, in London, it cannot be said with any truth that the department is auditing its own accounts?—It is an audit by officers of their own.

4525. But those officers are not the persons who either made, or controlled, or managed the actual payments?—No.

4526. Those payments were made by the paymasters in the Crimea?—Yes.

4527. With regard to those persons, do not the clerks in the War department stand in as independent and unconnected a position as the clerks in the Audit-office would stand?—Yes, they have just as great an interest in having the audit well performed.

4528. When it is said that the War department audits its own accounts, is there not a great distinction between their case and the case of a department which actually makes the expenditure according to the specific votes, and audits the account of that expenditure?—Yes.

4529. The same persons making the expenditure and auditing the accounts?—Yes; no doubt.

4530. Was not the origin of the present Audit Board this, that the functions of the auditors of imprests in the office of the Exchequer were abolished somewhere about the year 1780, and a new Board of Commissioners was created, to whom their duties were transferred?—I believe it was.

4531. The present Audit-office arose from the transfer of certain duties of audit which had previously been performed in the office of the Exchequer?—By the auditors of imprest.

4532. Mr. Williams.] Take the War department and the Navy department; the expenditure in those departments is made by officers appointed by the heads of those departments, and the account of the expenditure is examined by other officers appointed by the heads of those departments?—Yes; I suppose it is so.

4533. Mr. Hankey.] Is there not an annual account delivered to Parliament of the expenditure of the navy and army, signed by the Commissioners of Audit, as having been examined and certified by them to be correct?—Yes; as compared with the books and vouchers of the department. Those words were purposely put into the Audit-office certificate some years ago, that Parliament might might not be led to suppose that we undertook a detailed examination of those accounts.

4534. To what extent are the Audit-office responsible for the correctness of those accounts which are signed by them?—They are responsible for seeing that those accounts have had a proper examination in those several departments; seeing that those accounts have been duly examined and passed in those departments; and that the sums which are taken credit for under any particular vote are placed to the proper vote; but they do not go through the calculations and computations of the vouchers, nor do they see every sub-voucher for every payment. They have the power of calling for every voucher; but they have not the power of questioning them, except for the purpose of ascertaining that the expenditure is duly classified under the proper votes; and they examine the vouchers for that special purpose, and none other.

4535. Is not the account of the navy, which is delivered in to Parliament, given under the responsibility of the Commissioners of Audit, that they have examined and seen that the same is correct?—Certainly.

4536. Mr. Williams.] In point of fact, you see no vouchers at all for the items of expenditure in those great departments?—That depends upon what you mean by the word "voucher;" it is a very general term.

4537. I mean an authority for the expenditure?—We see all the authorities for the expenditure; but cannot question them. The word "voucher" is used by us in the most general sense, but you mean the receipt; that is, the document which proves that the payment has actually been made, and that has a more specific meaning than the word "voucher." We examine all those accounts with vouchers in the different departments; but, as the Paymaster-general makes the payments, the actual receipt in respect of those payments would appear with the Paymaster-general's accounts. The evidence of the payment would appear there.

4538. But the Audit-office do not examine into that. That voucher has been received by him for a payment made by him?—They see that the accounts have been duly marked and passed by the department, and they examine all their books and all necessary documents to see that the payment is carried to the proper head of service.

4539. That is to say, they look at the gross amount?—They would trace all the several payments through the several books till they came to the result, which is laid before Parliament.

4540. But they do not examine the items of expenditure. The detailed expenditure, as I understand you, is examined by officers of the department?—The detailed expenditure is examined by officers of the department.

4541. How is it that you ascertain, from the expenditure of the departments, grounds upon which to certify the correctness of that expenditure?—I am afraid that that is entering very much into the detailed examination of those accounts. The Inspector of the Naval and Military Accounts will be better able to answer those questions than I can; I cannot describe all the different modes by which he traces those items through the various books.

4542. He sends that final result to the Audit-office, does he?—No; every objection which he makes he would lay before the Commissioners.

4543. Who is the person that you now speak of?—The Inspector of Naval and Military Accounts.

4544. Not a person appointed by you?—A person appointed by the Treasury; but he is an officer under our directions, though originally appointed by the Treasury.

4545. Upon his statement do you certify the correctness of the account?—We do.

4546. Chairman.] There was laid upon the table of The House this year a report from the Audit Board of all the accounts that were audited, and the state in which they were audited?—Yes.

4547. Would it not be an advantage if, by an Act of Parliament or by regulation, the auditors were annually to lay a similar account upon the table of the House of Commons?—I think it would be a great advantage.

4548. Why?—I think there would be this advantage; I think it right that Parliament should know exactly the state in which the issues they have made stand, and the mode in which those issues have been accounted for. I think that it would also be an advantage to our office. Auditing accounts is a work that does not necessarily press. It is not like the work of an executive department; whether you audit an account to-day or to-morrow, or the next day, apparently seems to be of little consequence, and the result is, that there is rather a tendency towards arrears; but if we were obliged every year to make a statement of the condition in which our business was, this would prevent arrears. I think it has always been of great use that the auditors should be compelled to come before the Chancellor of the Exchequer twice every year, to declare to their accounts. As far as the Treasury is concerned, this appears to be an idle form and an unnecessary trouble; but with respect to the Audit-office, it is most useful that twice every year we should see how matters really stand, and that we should whip up our accounts.

E. Romilly, Esq., and C. Macaulay, Esq.

14 July 1856.

4549. It would be a useful check upon the Audit-office, would it not?—Yes.

4550. As to the accountants themselves, would it be any advantage if it appeared on the face of the return that an accountant had not sent in his accounts?—Yes, it would act, no doubt, upon the accountants, both upon them and upon ourselves.

4551. You have stated that you thought, with regard to the great departments and some officers, that publicity would be a more effectual check, and that the power of fining them is merely nominal. Do you think that it would be sufficient to bring an accountant before the public if he had not sent his accounts in, or would you suggest any other means?—I think that the power we still have ought to remain in our hands; but I think the other would be an additional check, and so far an advantage.

4552. I see, in some of these accounts, that you state that "other accounts were more pressing." Is the delay in the Audit-office a delay chiefly from your establishment being insufficient, in consequence of the pressure of the accounts during the war, or is it from the accounts themselves not having been sent in in time?—I think it is partly owing to the establishment not being sufficient, and partly owing to the circumstance that we have had to examine the first year's war accounts, i. e. the whole of the Commissariat cash and store accounts also. Those were excessively heavy; and it has been a very great labour. The delay is also owing to other circumstances, which perhaps may be susceptible of improvement in our own office. One thing certainly we have been in the habit of doing from time immemorial, that is, giving our different accountants too much facility to set their accounts right before we audit them. When an account is sent in, the accountant ought to send it in with all the vouchers and authorities complete; if he does not, we ask him for them; he delays sending them; and sometimes, when he does send an answer, perhaps he does not send the proper documents. Then there is another communication, and a third, and a fourth; and that occasions very great delay, not in examining accounts, but in auditing them. I think that might be prevented by ourselves, and it would have been prevented before this if it had not been for accidental circumstances. Whenever an accountant does not send the proper authorities and vouchers with his accounts, we ought to come to a decision at once without waiting for them, and disallow the amount imperfectly vouched, informing him that he will have allowance for the amount in his next year's account, or whenever he sends the proper documents: and that intimation would have been made to accountants long ago, had it not been considered that it would not be right to do so until they had had a complete set of regulations; regulations in accordance with which they should make up their accounts, and in accordance with which those accounts should also be examined by us. Hitherto, the directions issued by the Audit-office to general accountants are only to be found, with some slight exceptions, in the queries addressed to them from time to time, without being all consolidated and put together in a separate form.

4553. You have no general set of regulations, then, for the accountants?—We have regulations for colonial accountants and for some other special services, and we have lately drawn up a set of regulations for accountants generally, but they have not been issued yet, because it was considered not unlikely that alterations might take place with respect to our Acts; and it was very undesirable that, immediately after issuing our regulations, they should have to be altered.

4554. But you have them prepared, have you not?—They are all drawn up; and immediately after issuing those regulations it was the intention of the Board to have informed the accountants, "You have now those regulations, and unless you comply with them we shall immediately on receiving your account disallow all

all claims imperfectly vouched, without giving you any opportunity of setting them right before we audit it."

4555. You state that the delay has arisen from the establishment probably being below the mark in time of war; is it sufficient in time of peace?—It is a very difficult thing to make an accurate estimate as to the amount of business that we have to perform, because, in addition to the accounts which come regularly before us for audit, the Treasury have the power, and are in the habit of not unfrequently sending to us papers to report upon, including long and complicated references from the colonies, and we have a great deal of business of that kind; sometimes also accounts are sent to us which we had no reason to expect, so that it is difficult to make an accurate estimate of the amount of our business. But I think that the establishment is hardly large enough for a time of peace.

4556. Before the war, was there any delay as to the Commissariat accounts which are now transferred to the war department; are they audited now more quickly than they were audited before?—The change has only just taken placed we have audited the whole of those Commissariat accounts up to the latest period for which we are responsible; within a year after the terminating period of those accounts we have examined them and audited them all.

4557. The War-office accounts were audited within 12 months, were they not, before they were sent to you to make a report upon?—Yes.

4558. Was your report as to the Commissariat accounts made at the same time as the War-office Report under the old system, before the transfer?—It was at the same time as the war expenditure.

4559. I wish to know whether, when the Commissariat accounts were with you, the audit then was slower than the audit of the war accounts at the War Department?—I think not. We had examined the whole of the expenditure in respect of the Commissariat Vote at the time when we reported the army accounts to Parliament.

4560. So far as you know, there has been no gain in point of quickness?—There has been no time to ascertain that; the transfer did not take place above two months ago.

4561. I see, with regard to the "Turkish Embassy, Repairs and Furniture, Maintenance of Junior Attachés, Dragomans and Students," that some of the accounts have not been examined since 1845, others not since 1849, and others not since 1848. Can you give me any explanation why those accounts have not been sent in, some of them for above 10 years? (Mr. Macaulay.) There has been a great deal of correspondence between the Audit-office, the Treasury, and the Foreign Office, for the purpose of getting those accounts; that correspondence has extended over a very considerable time, and all that we can say is, that we have been unable to get them. We cannot get the vouchers for the accounts; at least they are for the most part wanting. A part of the expenditure relates to the furniture and the repairs that were provided for the ambassador's house at Constantinople, and the vouchers for a part of this expenditure, we were given to understand, would be furnished to us by the Board of Works. We have received some of them from the Board of Works, but not sufficient to enable us to complete the examination of the accounts.

4562. Chairman.] (To Mr. Romilly.) I see that Mr. Hoffay, in his evidence, was asked this question with regard to what goes by the name of the great mud question: "You have stated that you remember a case in which, though the Treasury had given their opinion, yet the department proceeded against the opinion of the Treasury; will you have the goodness to call to your mind whether the Admiralty Board did not say that it was not a very important question, and that they would obey any regulations that were laid down, if the Treasury would lay them down?—I cannot bear in mind particularly, but the fact is, that the money was not paid into the Treasury; it was carried to the credit of the vote against the opinion of the Treasury, against the opinion of the Admiralty Board." "Did the Treasury give any opinion?—Yes, they concurred entirely in the view of the Audit Board, and I think that they went so far as to direct the Admiralty to pay it into the Exchequer, or in terms amounting to that, and the Admiralty did not pay the money into the Exchequer." He was then asked, "Therefore the Admiralty had their own way?" To which his answer was, "Yes." You probably know what that transaction was. Is it correct that the Admiralty did anything contrary to the opinion that the Treasury have expressed, when they had ascertained that opinion?—No; it appears to me that the auditors auditors entertained a particular opinion upon that question of the mud; they thought that the value of the gravel ought to be paid into the Exchequer; the Admiralty were of a different opinion, and they expressed their reasons for it, and stated that they did not concur. The question was referred to the Treasury, and the Treasury concurred with the auditors, and said that they thought the amount ought to have been paid into the Exchequer. I am not aware that any direction was given to pay the amount into the Exchequer; and as the opinion of the auditors, supported by the Treasury, and that of the Admiralty, were both laid before Parliament, I do not see that more could have been done.

4563. Mr. Hankey.] I have before me a copy of the account of receipt and expenditure for the Army and Militia Services for the year ending the 31st of March 1854, pursuant to the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 92, and it is signed by yourself, by Mr. Ross, and by Colonel Maberly, with a certificate, that "This account transmitted to us, in pursuance of the 2d section of the Act 9 & 10 Vict. c. 92, has been examined by officers under our direction, and that subject to observations contained in the following report to the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, the above is a correct statement of the receipt and expenditure for the Army and Militia Services for the year ending the 31st of March 1854, as compared with the accounts." I understood you lately, in reply to a question of the Honourable Member for Lambeth, to state, that the accounts of the Army were really not audited by your department?—The detailed examination of the accounts is not conducted by our department.

4564. But still what are the Committee to understand by an account certified by you that it is a correct statement of the receipt and expenditure, if you have not examined the vouchers?—We check the mode in which those accounts are posted under those particular heads, and see that the whole of the expenditure is carried to the proper head of service. (Mr. Macaulay.) The certificate must be taken, subject to the first words in the certificate, viz., that the account is transmitted to the Audit Board under the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 92. This Act provides for the nature of the examination which the Audit-office shall give to the accounts of the Army, Navy, and Ordnance. It is obvious from this Act that it was no part of the intention of Parliament that the detailed examination of those accounts should be conducted by the Audit-office. All that the certificate in question attests is, that the duty imposed upon the Audit-office by this Act has been performed by the Audit-office.

4565. Then Parliament is not to understand that the Commissioners of Audit are responsible for the correctness of one single item or payment made in this account?—Not for the detailed examination. Suppose a bill for stores were presented to the Navy for 5,000 l.; that bill would probably embrace a vast number of items, 100 or 200 different items; and the detailed examination of that bill would render it necessary to enter into each item. If for instance one item was 100 yards of sail cloth at so much a yard, and the amount carried out, the detailed examiner must check that amount by making the requisite computation. That computation will be conducted entirely, as I understand it, in the Admiralty. The appropriation auditor sees when he takes up this bill that it bears about it the evidence of examination, that the proper ticks which indicate examination in detail in the Admiralty, have been attached to each item, and the proper signature. He further sees that the order for payment of that bill is signed by the proper officer, and that the various regulations respecting such orders have been complied with; and then he sees to what head of service the sum total belongs. He sees that it is a bill for stores for 5,000 l., and he then charges the vote for stores with this 5,000 l.

4566. Sir James Graham.] If you undertook in addition to the appropriation audit, the detailed departmental audit, going over it a second time, how many clerks would you require to have?—It would be very difficult to say; I am clear that we should require a great many more clerks than the Admiralty; and my own impression is that that examination would not be so effective.

4567. Would it not be indispensably necessary, if any doubt arose upon a voucher, to call evidence from the out-ports at home, and from foreign stations abroad?—Most distinctly.

4568. That would apply to the Army: but if that detailed audit extended over the whole of the Army, Ordnance, and Commissariat Services, and the Navy also, can you conceive any staff within bounds that it would not be necessary to establish at the Audit Board?—That is my impression, and I think that there is a sentence

sentence in which that point is very well put in a paper now before the Committee; that one sentence seems to embrace the whole case. "The Lords of the Admiralty for instance, the Board of Ordnance, or the Secretary at War, so soon as any improper expenditure or irregularity is discovered, can in most cases, stop the improper payment or irregularity immediately; and even when some previous explanations are requisite, they can, the moment such explanations are received, come to a decision thereon, give their orders accordingly, and see those orders executed; the explanations called for being likewise obtained with the least possible delay, as the parties to give them are under their own orders. An independent Audit-office, on the contrary, can scarcely under any circumstances, continue to be constantly so well acquainted with the practical details of the service, and the necessity for any item of expenditure, as to justify them in giving an immediate decision without calling for information, and they have not the immediate means of reference to the different branches of the service in the Executive department."

4569. The audit repeated on the part of the Audit Board would not supersede the necessity of the first, the departmental audit?—I think in no case.

4570. Then if you passed in review the departmental audit, setting aside for the moment the increase of your staff, what would be the probable increase in point of delay of the second audit?—I am sure that it would be very great; I can only say that.

4571. It takes now eight months with a single audit to complete the Navy accounts, does it not?—Yes.

4572. And 12 months as to the Army?—Thirteen.

4573. Supposing you went, on the part of the Audit Board, into a detailed second audit according to strict rules, what additional time would it be necessary to add to the eight and 12 months respectively?—I can scarcely answer that question, except to say, that I am sure it would be very much longer.

4574. Would you say three more years?—(Mr. Romilly.) It is always three years in France.

4575. Then, in a distant colony, it might take a period of something like five years?—Perhaps so.

4576. Mr. Williams.] Do the Commissioners of Audit examine the items?—Not the detailed items.

4577. You mentioned a bill for 5,000 l.?—Our own officer would examine that.

4578. That is the inspector, I presume?—It would be examined either by the inspector or by an officer under him.

4579. By whom is that officer appointed?—The inspector is appointed by the Treasury; the officer under the inspector is placed there by us. Both are officers of our establishment.

4580. He looks over the ledger, and sees that those bills correspond with the entries in the ledger?—He does so; and he examines the bills themselves.

MEMORANDA added at the request of Mr. Romilly.

AS some misconception seems to exist as to the actual course of proceeding in checking the Army and Navy Accounts which are laid before Parliament, it is desirable that a short statement should be drawn up, showing distinctly what the duties are which the auditors are called upon to perform, and the way in which they are performed.

The auditors are required to certify to Parliament annually, on an account submitted to them by the departments in question, and drawn up under the heads of the several grants inserted in the Appropriation Act, the amount expended under each of those heads. In performing this duty, however, they are not to call in question the orders of those departments in carrying on that expenditure, nor to interfere with the examination or audit in detail of that expenditure. Every voucher in those departments is accessible to the auditors; but, provided those vouchers bear evidence of the expenditure having been duly authorised and passed by the proper authorities, no objection could be raised by the Commissioners to any item of that expenditure, except for the purpose of questioning the head of service to which such item has been placed, as expressed in the Appropriation Act. The vouchers therefore are examined with that view only.

only. Accordingly, suppose that a contractor's bill containing different items, which in the opinion of the inspector of the accounts ought to be posted to two separate heads, were posted to one only, he would object to the classification adopted, and if the objection were concurred in by the Audit Board, and were not acceded to by the department, it would appear on the account submitted to the Treasury, and afterwards to Parliament. But if he saw that a payment had been ordered contrary to the express provisions of a Royal Warrant, to an Order in Council, a Treasury direction, or even the provision of an Act of Parliament; or if he had reason to know that a sum taken credit for as paid had not been paid, or that there had been a double payment, or a wrong computation affecting the total, provided the accounts in which these irregularities had occurred had duly passed the constituted authorities of the Army or Navy departments, he would be exceeding his duty if he remarked upon them. His province is to see that the items which have passed the departmental ordeal are posted to the proper heads.

In most instances he has no access to the actual evidence and proof of payment, because that evidence does not even exist in the departments themselves. Except in the case of imprests made to sub-officers at out-stations, who render accounts to the Admiralty or War Department, and with those accounts vouchers in support of the payments they have made, all the payments in the accounts of these departments are made by the Paymaster-general. A bill is given by these departments to the contractor, or other person entitled; that bill is presented by the contractor to the Paymaster-general, who informs the department concerned that he has paid it; but the actual evidence of payment, the receipt given by the person paid, would not be returned to the department, but be retained as a voucher to the Paymaster-general's account.

It is obvious that under these circumstances the examination of the accounts of these departments cannot, strictly speaking, enable the Commissioners of Audit to certify either to the amount or to the fact of the payments actually made; and accordingly the Audit-office certificate laid before Parliament is qualified, as to the correctness of the account, with the words " as compared with the books and vouchers " of the department; and with this reservation, prominently introduced into the body of the certificate, the certificate is perfectly correct, and does, or ought to, prevent misconstruction.

As this principle runs through the whole of the accounts, and affects all those payments made by the Paymaster-general on account of these departments, there appears to be no greater necessity for asking for the actual receipts for payments made into the Exchequer, than for the receipts in support of any other payments, and accordingly the Commissioners have hitherto been satisfied with the statement of the Paymaster-general that the payments ordered by the departments to be made had been made; especially as the certificate of the auditors has reference only to the correctness of the account " as compared with the books and vouchers of the department."

Nevertheless there are, no doubt, means in the Audit-office of ascertaining the fact of the payments into the Exchequer, by comparing the payments taken credit for by the Paymaster-general on proper vouchers, which he produces with his accounts, with the amount accompanying the Admiralty account, and laid before Parliament, of the sums so paid in. With respect to two years' accounts I have made that comparison myself, and find that the accounts agree, and that Exchequer receipts are produced for the payments to the Exchequer; and I have no doubt that they would be found to agree in every other year's account.

The principle, however, involved in this comparison extends to all other payments made by the Paymaster-general; and if the actual evidence of payment be required in the one case, it ought, it may be said, to be required in all other cases; but if this were done, and if in doing it, it appeared that the evidence of payment was not satisfactory, how could the matter be dealt with? If the vouchers of the department are satisfactory to that department, and the auditors are not to question them; and if the certificate of the auditors is founded upon the " books and vouchers of the department," the less they inquire into other vouchers the better. Their production might raise difficulties, but could not solve them, nor could their production be of use, unless the detailed examination of the accounts were vested in the Audit-office instead of being vested in the departments themselves.

Nevertheless, there is this difference between payments into the Exchequer and and all other payments made by the Paymaster-general on account of these departments, that the peculiar business of the Audit-office, that of comparing the expenditure with the votes, seems to be more peculiarly affected by the payments being properly made into the Exchequer; and the actual fact of these payments having been made ought, perhaps, to be ascertained by reference to the Paymaster-general's accounts, and will be ascertained in future. Any further extension of this principle would involve an entire change in the mode of examining, and perhaps rendering the Paymaster-general's accounts, and also in the mode of examining the Admiralty accounts.

MEMBERS PRESENT.

Sir Francis Baring.	Mr. Wilson.
Mr. James MacGregor.	Mr. Henley.
Mr. G. A. Hamilton.	Sir James Graham.
Mr. Williams.	Sir Henry Willoughby.

THE RIGHT HON. SIR FRANCIS T. BARING, BART., IN THE CHAIR.

John Hollings, Esq., called in; and Examined.

J. Hollings, Esq.

17 July 1856.

4581. Chairman.] WHAT office do you hold?—I am a clerk of the first class in the War Department.

4582. Have you, from your position, a knowledge of the time when the accounts are sent in from the different foreign stations?—I have.

4583. Mr. Henley.] Will you state to the Committee at what period of the year the Army accounts close at the respective stations?—The period at which they close at the respective stations should, properly, be about one month after the date to which they have reference.

4584. What is the date in the year to which the accounts are made up?—The regimental accounts are quarterly, and the paymasters are allowed one month for making up their accounts.

4585. To what period of each year is the year's account made up?—The 31st of March, the last day of the military financial year.
